THE LEAGUE.

No. 107.—VOL. III.]

SATURDAY, OCTOBER 11, 1845.

[3d.]

NOTICE TO THE PUBLIC.

LEAGUE FUND.

All Subscribers of £1 and upwards to the LEAGUE FUND will be entitled to, and receive, a copy weekly of this publication for twelve months from the date of the receipt of their subscription.

Subscribers of half-a-crown, and under £1, will have forwarded to them a copy of THE LEAGUE, containing an acknowledgment of their subscription; and it is requested that all subscribers will be kind enough to send their names and addresses to the offices of THE LEAGUE, Newall's-buildings, Manchester, or 87, Fleet-street, London.

N.B. As there is considerable risk in the transmission of gold and silver by post, parties wishing to forward small contributions to THE LEAGUE FUND are particularly requested to make their remittances by post-office orders.

The Council of the League would also suggest to their friends in the country the importance of transmitting their copies of THE LEAGUE newspaper, after perusal, to such parties (more especially farmers) as may be either hostile or indifferent to the question of Free Trade.

The Council of the League begs to announce that the List of Subscriptions for beds, to be presented to Agricultural labourers, is now completed. No further donation for that purpose can be received, as the amount already subscribed is quite equal to the number that can be furnished.

The Council also begs most cordially to thank the subscribers for their ready co-operation, and to assure them that their benevolent intentions will be carried into immediate effect.

By order of the Council,

JOSEPH HICKIN, Secretary.

We beg to inform our subscribers that bound volumes of the LEAGUE newspaper, containing the whole of the first year's Numbers, may be had on application at the offices, either in London or Manchester.

THE LAST AND GREATEST LANDLORD ADMISSION.

Nothing is more worthy of note in the agricultural meetings of this season, than the admission everywhere made, in terms more or less direct and explicit, that the Corn Law has failed of the end for which it was professedly enacted—the ensuring a sufficient and abundant supply of home-grown wheat; that landlords, or farmers, or both, have broken faith with the nation which they contracted to feed; that, after all that has been said and done, the soil of this country does not produce enough for its people; and that, in this thirty-first year of agricultural protection, the real work of agriculture is shamefully behind-hand. The fulfilment of the promises so liberally made in 1815 by the framers and proposers of the Corn Law of that year, is still, it seems, future and contingent. It is admitted on all sides—very superfluously, indeed, with the Custom House returns vouching so intelligibly for the fact—that the soil of Great Britain does not yield a sufficiency of food for the wants of the British people. Sanguine hopes are, to be sure, entertained that some day or other, and somehow or other, it will—provided landlords and farmers can agree to adopt some new and improved system, having no relation to the Corn Law. And then, as his Grace of Rutland tells us—“When the land shall produce as much corn as is required for the home consumption”—i.e., when the fundamental assumption of landlord legislation shall, for the first time, become a truth,—the Corn Law may be “given up.” In the meantime, pending the discovery and working of the new and improved system, which is to do for us what the Corn Law promised it would do, the people must shift as they can. There seems no doubt, on the part of landlords and farmers, that “if” something were done which has never been done yet—and which protection was to have done, but has not done—the land might, could, should, or would produce food enough for the people. But how, when, and by whom this essential “something” is to be done—what security we have that it ever will be done—and what the people are to do until it is done,—they omit to tell us. They only ask us to please be so good as renew their dishonoured bill, and accept the landlords’ “if” as a security for payment.

The prevalence of this tone in the recent utterances of landlordism is really a new feature in a question which one might have thought, by this time, was scarcely susceptible of novelty. The frankness with which the whole case against monopoly is admitted, in these confessions of broken faith and baffled expectation, would be both gratifying and edifying, were it possible to pardon the audacity which taxes our exhausted patience with new demands, and asks our hunger to await the issue of a new experiment. Nothing can be more explicit and straightforward than Mr. Newdigate’s statement on this head, made at the meeting of the South-West Middlesex Agricultural Society, last Tuesday. The hon. member for North Warwickshire said:

“It might, perhaps, be so, that from various causes, and particularly as containing the great metropolis of this country in its centre, agriculture was not the most important interest in the county, but still he deemed it a most important object that those who represented the agricultural interests should be able to prove to the community that it was not beyond their power to supply them with the necessities of life. He knew that those around him were striving with this object.”

The Herald was very angry with us the other day, for taking the Duke of Rutland to mean what he said; and favoured us with a lecture on the impropriety of criticising landlord dicta, which “call for explanation.” What “explanation” our ingenious contemporary may discover for poor Mr. Newdigate’s benefit, it passes our sagacity to divine. To us the above seems perfectly self-explanatory. The sufficiency of British agriculture to meet the needs of British hunger, which is the fundamental assumption on which the Corn Law rests, Mr. Newdigate speaks of hypothetically. It is a thing still to be “proved;” a thing which it is “most important” to get proved; a thing which men are “striving” for. Perhaps the striving may be successful—perhaps not. Perhaps agriculturists may be willing to strive—perhaps not. Nobody knows. We are only told that, after 30 years of protection to agriculture, the thing which protection was to have done, has not been done, and must be begun over again from the beginning, on an entirely new principle; and that while the experiment is in progress—while they are debating who is to try the experiment—nay, while it is actually undecided what exactly the experiment is to be—we are to go on, just as if it had already succeeded. Protection is still to be kept up all the same. We are not to feed ourselves during the next few years, but to wait and see what the landlords can do for us.

A more preposterous and audacious proposal was never made to a people than this of waiting to see the result of an experiment, of which we do not so much as know that it is really going to be tried. For, be it remembered, the whole thing is still in nubibus. It is still a disputed point who is to do it, and who is to blame for its not having been done already? The landlords throw it on the farmers—and the farmers throw it back on the landlords. The responsibility for past failure, and the onus of future exertion, are bandied to and fro, in shuttlecock fashion. The landlords tell the farmers to “keep moving;” and the farmers reply, that the landlords have tied their legs. The landlords ask, “Why don’t you improve?” and the farmers retort, “Why don’t you give us leases?” at which the great Norfolk Squire, Mr. Conyers, “cannot repress a smile,” for “his maxim has always been to rely upon a landlord’s honour to retain a good tenant.” Landlords find fault with bad ploughing, and complain that “hardly one field in ten is ploughed as it should be;” and farmers cry out against game. In one county, we have a peer deploring that “as yet the simple duties of an agriculturist are unfulfilled—in another, we have a gentleman lamenting that “he hears little or nothing of the duties of landlords.” The landlord suggests more capital—the farmer hints at improved tenure. “Draining” is universally approved; but then Mr. Spearman would like to know “by whom shall the draining be done?”—a question which he justly characterises as one of “great pith and moment.” Mr. Trotter, the Member for West Surrey, is clearly of opinion, “that the country might be rendered entirely independent of any supply of corn from abroad, if the agriculturists continued to exert themselves;” and his friend, Mr. Barclay, has “no doubt that if the farmers were to exert themselves in improving the condition of their land, they would be able,” &c.:—an opinion which curiously pairs with that of Mr. Lister, of Yorkshire, to the effect, that “if landlords generally would pay more attention to their estates, it would be better for the nation.”

For the people of this country to wait, and take the chance of the possible and contingent success of a grand agricultural experiment, which must itself wait until the different sections of the agricultural community shall have decided on its nature, and adjusted their controversy as to its preliminary conditions, would be downright infatuation. We have all heard of “the steed starving while the grass grows;” but this pithy proverbial description of the cruel postponement of an urgent need to the completion of a tardy and long-dated process, falls far short of the enormity of the present case. Our “grass” is not growing. It is not so much as sown. It is not by any means clear that it is going to be sown. The very implements of the husbandry that is to sow and grow it, are still—like Adam, in the old monkish drama—“waiting to be created.”

As regards the intrinsic possibility, or probability, of the fulfilment of the expectations of our agricultural improvers, our opinion is sufficiently well-known. Were the Corn Law out of the question—were the “bane of agriculture” removed—were British agriculture left to the free development of its great and untried natural resources, we have no doubt whatever that its productiveness would be rapidly and vastly increased. But “improvement” means “capital;” and capital “shrinks instinctively from insecurity;” and insecurity will be the inseparable condition of all agricultural pursuits and interests, so long as the price of agricultural produce is the subject of Parliamentary promises, whose duration and whose fulfilment are alike precarious. “Agricultural improvement” must stand over until the day when the unnatural union of prices and politics shall be, once for all, repealed—and when landlords and farmers shall, as landlords and farmers, have nothing to do with watching the “state of parties.”

ENGLAND “TEACHING NATIONS HOW TO LIVE.”

The columns of last Saturday’s Times contain a highly instructive, though most humiliating illustration of the way in which the monopolist legislation of Great Britain is corrupting the morality and perverting the policy of other countries, and “teaching nations how to live”—as they ought not. Under the heading “Affairs of Spain,” our contemporary gives the suljoined extract from a Spanish journal, entitled the Fomento, whose editor moralizes in the following strain on “the struggle existing in England between the agricultural and manufacturing interests," and the exalted wisdom of the Peel policy :

"The Government of that country, animated by the most enlightened views, and obedient to the eternal principle of securing the greatness and prosperity of the State, continues firm and unshaken in the prohibitive system. In vain are being exercised the public efforts of the one party, the wily intrigues of the other, or even the promised advantages held out by free commerce. These profound and eminent statesmen are deaf to all, because they are favoured with the genius to foresee that the benefits to England would be passing and illusory, and in the end might produce the total ruin of her colossal power. Let Continental nations learn a lesson, then, from the powerful mistress of the seas. If she, in the zenith of her power, holding a predominating ascendancy over three-fourths of the globe, firmly adheres to her protective system, why should not feeble nations, whose industry is only springing into life, adhere to it also? and they may believe us when we assert that to them it is certain self-destruction to open their ports to free commerce. Should it happen that England were to offer us advice on this head, our answer would be, that we prefer to follow her example to her advice."

Could we afford to amuse ourselves with a subject which presents so much matter for painful and humbling reflection, there would certainly be something diverting in the Spanish journalist's bird's-eye view of our British politics. Even the staid and sober Premier himself—however little he might relish the compliment paid to his "genius," at the expense of the principles which he has repeatedly declared to be "sound" and "enlightened," and which his colleague of the Home Office holds to be those of "common-sense"—would find it hard to keep his gravity at the notion of his "continuing firm and unshaken in the prohibitive system." Sir R. Peel "firm and unshaken" in that prohibitive system which he has been busy these four years past in loosening and shaking, in sapping from beneath and paring down from above, and which he makes it his pride and boast to have done more to destroy than the boldest Free Trader of his official predecessors! It is not difficult perhaps to account for the Fomento's mistake. Our Spanish contemporary looks at the Peel policy only as a Spaniard. The disreputable trickeries of the Spanish Colonial Sugar question are still running in his head. Unacquainted with the ins and outs of our party politics—not knowing, or not remembering, the history of the Sandon resolution—he looks on the great treaty-juggle of last session, not as an exception to the rule of present English policy, but as an example of the rule. He naturally enough ascribes to the author of that shameful repudiation of distinct and solemn national engagements, a blind and obstinate adhesion to the most rigid dogmas of commercial prohibition.

This indication of Spanish opinion and feeling is, however, far too grave a matter to be looked at merely on its ludicrous side. The extract above quoted is a melancholy instance of the perverting and corrupting power of our bad national example. It strikingly shows the mischief which our protectionist policy is doing to other countries and Governments, and the hostility which it is raising up against ourselves, and our own most palpable and urgent interests. By maintaining, in despite of experience and conviction, a confessedly false and vicious system, we suffer our acts to be adduced in refutation of our principles—of the principles which every one of our public men possessed of the slightest pretensions to statesmanship has again and again affirmed to be sound and just; and which we are profoundly solicitous to see adopted by other countries in their dealings with ourselves. And a piece of exploded and superannuated folly, which a year or two more will contemptuously erase from our statute-book, we have the mortification of seeing exalted into an "eternal principle," and lauded as the offspring of "the most enlightened views." We give Spain the strongest encouragement in our power to perseverance in a course destructive to herself, and in its reaction greatly and deeply injurious to us. No country in the world has suffered, or is suffering, more ruinously from the consequence of a "firm and unshaken" adherence to "the prohibitive system" than Spain. That system has there remarkably succeeded in doing its work of turning a great country into a little one. Smugglers intercept her revenue, monopoly has extinguished her trade, and the loss of the civilising influences of commerce, industry, and the arts of peace has gradually sunk her people into a state bordering on barbarism. Yet no sooner does this insane system come to be called in question, than the example of England is cited in proof of its transcendent wisdom; and patriotic editors urge an exhausted and impoverished people to continue firm and unshaken in their adhesion to a vicious policy which English legislation seems to authenticate. Few European countries afford the elements of a more profitable and prosperous traffic than that which the undeveloped resources of this noble country offer to England. A liberal commercial treaty with Spain (minus her colonies) would, we are very sure, be paraded by any English Minister as a great achievement of statesmanship. Yet our Minister expends the utmost resources of a perverse ingenuity in finding arguments for a course that is fatally calculated both to exasperate the passions, and rivet the prejudices most hostile to commercial intercourse. "Let Continental nations learn a lesson from the powerful mistress of the seas. . . . Should it happen that England were to offer us advice on this head, our answer would be, that we prefer to follow her example to her advice."

We cannot wonder at this. The Spaniards can scarcely be expected to be sounder politicians and political economists than ourselves. We cannot exact of them the discrimination to perceive that England has grown great and powerful, not by protection, but against and in spite of protection. It is not surprising that "feeble nations, whose industry is only springing into life," shrink timorously from an experiment which the systematic public acts of the first commercial country in the world announces to be fraught with danger. They do as we do, not as we say. They lean on authority, and our authority is on the side of prohibition and restriction. Our professions may be fraudulent and self-interested; they choose rather to go by our deeds, as the more authentic index to our real convictions. Incapable of philosophising on their own experience, they accept the result of ours as it stands, or seems to stand, on our statute-book and the surface of our diplomacy.

Disagreeable and humiliating as it is thus to hear our own nonsense echoed back to us just as we are beginning to be heartily sick and ashamed of it ourselves—and to see our own exploded follies erected into an "eternal principle" and permanent landmark of policy—these signs of the influence which British legislation wields over the public opinion of nations give a hopeful promise of the future. This influence is operative for good, no less than for evil. Not our commercial blunders and injustices alone, but our commercial reforms are sure, sooner or later, of finding faithful and zealous copyists. The first commercial country of the world must give the tone to the commercial legislation of the world. "I feel quite confident," said the late Mr. James Deacon Hume, in his evidence before the Import Duties' Committee of 1840, "that if we were entirely to drop our system of protection, in a very little time it would be a race with other countries, which should be first, or rather, which should avoid to be last, to come in for the benefit of that trade which we would then open." This indisputable ascendancy of Great Britain, in matters of commercial policy, over surrounding nations, adds incalculably to the grandeur and importance of our Free Trade movement. We are working, not merely to get a particular law erased from our code, but to effect a radical change in the spirit and purpose of our legislators, which will certainly, if not speedily—we believe, speedily no less than certainly—react on the policy of all civilised countries and Governments. We are working, really though not formally, to change the public opinion, and reform the public policy of the world. The League, as an organisation, will, of course, at no very remote period, expire with the attainment of the object for which it was formed; but its real victories will only then commence. That act of the British Parliament which shall totally and finally rescind the landlord's monopoly, will do more for the diffusion of the truths of economical and social science than all the philosophy and oratory in the world. All true Leaguers will thenceforth have the unspeakable satisfaction of witnessing, year by year, new triumphs of their cherished principles, in the successive advances of nation after nation towards the complete adoption of that policy, whose economical expression is, indeed, but the commonplace mercantile formula, "Buy in the cheapest market, and sell in the dearest"—but whose ultimate moral tendency is to "Peace on earth, and good-will among men."

THE ECONOMY OF PRIZE-GIVING.

Much as we sometimes see to criticise in the after-dinner sayings and doings of agricultural meetings, there is one portion of their proceedings which commands our unfeigned admiration. The landlords have completely mastered that great secret in the practical philosophy of philanthropy—how to do the most good at the least cost. They know how to make the minimum of outlay yield the maximum of return. Their labourers' prize-system is, in its way, a masterpiece. The contingent reversion of a 30s. or 40s. prize, to fall due some time in the course of 30 or 40 years, with the accompaniment of a framed and glazed testimonial, guarantees the virtues of a life-time; keeps the prospective and possible recipient off the parish books; preserves the landlord's game from unlicensed sporting; and ensures a willing and hearty, a sober and steady labourer, for the landlord's domain.

We had scarcely been aware, till recently, of the full merits of this system. We had imagined it was merely an affair of the heart. We had no idea that there was anything more in it than "good feeling." We thought it was all philanthropy. It never occurred to us that these annual benevolences had a mercantile aspect. We supposed the labourer's prize to be the simple free-will offering of landlord kindness and gratitude to meritorious industry, having merely a retrospective bearing. That the 30s. or 40s. donation was meant to be in any way prospective—that it possessed the useful qualities of a retaining fee—that it was to be regarded in the light of an investment of capital, was what we never dreamed of. It seems, however, that the frugal and provident genius of landlordism has discovered that this seemingly so simple arrangement is susceptible of new, and before, unsuspected uses. At East Harling, the other day—where they distributed 104l. 5s. among 58 "meritorious agricultural labourers and farm-servants"—after the chairman, Lord Colborne, had discoursed, in the old style, of the "honest pride" with which "the agricultural labourer receives, after a lapse of years, the reward of his steadiness and sobriety,"

Mr. Conyers, described as a large landed proprietor in Norfolk, struck out the novel and gratifying suggestion, that these "rewards" were not only agreeable to the labourer's honest pride, but a singularly profitable investment of the landlords' cash:

"The system of rewarding the agricultural labourer would be remunerative to the landlord in a tenfold degree, as there was that feeling of gratitude in the English character which would not permit a boon to be conferred without a permanent and substantial acknowledgment. Such was the inducement held out by these associations to the labourer; and what could be found that would better preserve the link between the employer and the employed than that best of all bonds—the bond of reciprocal interest?"

The Dorchester Squires carry the economics of prize-giving a step further. They draw the "best of all bonds" tighter still, by the ingenious yet simple expedient of taking twelve months' credit. This year, the labourers have just come into receipt of the prizes awarded in 1845; and when the distribution was concluded, we are told that "the secretary read the premiums awarded to the ploughmen of this year, who, he observed, would not get their money until this time next year." Of the prudence of this arrangement it is impossible to speak too highly. As laziness, drunkenness, insubordination, or poaching would of course, vitiate the inchoate title acquired by industry, sobriety, obedience, and respect for the landlord's game preserves, the twelve months' delay may be regarded as a sort of binding-over. It keeps all the virtues in full force and vigour. During the year intervening between the award and the payment, the happy but solicitous creditor will be more than ever attached to his paymasters, the gentlemen of the prize association, and to their representative, the farmer, by the bond of that description of "gratitude," which consists in "a lively sense of future favours." "Such is the inducement held out by these associations to the labourer; and what could be found that would better preserve the link," &c.

Our manufacturers in the north have, it must be confessed, much to learn. They have never succeeded in carrying the "organisation of industry" this length. They have yet to acquire the art, or science, of turning to so extraordinarily profitable account "the feeling of gratitude in the English character." Their labourers are extremely apt—when bread is tolerably cheap, and trade brisk—to "give themselves airs" (as the Duke of Norfolk has it); and, at this moment, nothing can be done with them in Manchester and the country fifteen miles round without "holding out the inducement" of an extra premium of one hundred and fifty thousand pounds weekly. We may add, however, that no complaints have reached us of the working of this singular arrangement. The extra one hundred and fifty thousand pounds weekly, are paid weekly—cheerfully and ungrudgingly; and no discount is asked for ready money. All parties seem quite well satisfied with the nature of "the link between the employer and the employed."

THE REGISTRATION—NORTH WARWICK.

We shall reserve our remarks upon the progress made in the registration courts until the close of the present revision. In the meantime, however, we may observe, that wherever the directions of the Council of League have been carried out systematically and carefully by intelligent local committees, success more or less triumphant has invariably crowned their efforts. This has been especially the case in the counties, as will be shown when we publish the detailed account of the proceedings in the registrations for Middlesex, North and South Lancashire, West Yorkshire, North Cheshire, and South Staffordshire. But in those cases where, in default of a local organisation for carrying out the instructions of the Council of the League, the task has been left to the desultory efforts of zealous but ill-informed individuals, the result has been either an insignificant gain, or an exhibition of egregious blunders. North Warwickshire is a case in point.

We shall not now inquire why, in a division of a county containing two such towns as Birmingham and Coventry, no efficient committee has been formed for registration purposes. Such is the fact; and the consequences, the natural consequences, of the neglect were exhibited in the registration courts, last week, as reported in the Birmingham monopolist paper. It appears from this report—we have no other authority for the facts—that a Mr. Berry, of Coventry, undertook the task of procuring objections to be signed to several hundred voters on the list; and that he applied to William Worthington, of Cow-lane, Coventry, a freeholder on the register, who agreed to sign the notices. The papers, apparently regularly signed, were then forwarded to an agent of the League, in Manchester, who undertook to put them in the post-office, and to furnish the necessary proofs of service of notice before the revising barrister. Upon the opening of the Revision Court, an objection was taken to the notices by the solicitor employed for the monopolists, on the plea that Worthington's signature was not genuine. Worthington was called. He is described as "an aged, diminutive, decrepid object;" and, from his conduct, we should infer that he is superannuated, and in his dotage. He swore that he signed the objection to William Henry Osborn, the first name called, but afterwards prevaricated a good deal; and, at last, when the monopolist lawyers chucklingly informed him that "Benjamin Stafford was in the Court," the old man confessed that the signature was not in his hand-writing.

From the disclosures that subsequently took place, it appears that Benjamin Stafford called upon Worthington, whilst he was signing the notices, and assisted him in writing his name to a great number of them. It did not appear that the old man had asked Stafford to assist him, nor was it clearly shown who employed or paid him. The matter, so far as the conduct of this man goes, wears a suspicious aspect, and leads one to suspect that he was "planted" upon Worthington. At all events, it was proved that Stafford passed in and out of his house, uninvited by him, during the greater part of the night, and wrote his (Worthington's) name to as many of the notices as he pleased. He then goes and informs the monopolist lawyers of his fraudulent proceedings, and appears in the revision court as the sole witness to prove himself a rascal. The very suspicious familiarity that existed between Stafford and the solicitors for the monopolists, coupled with the fact that the first name called at their instance was a case in which this man was ready in an adjoining room to prove that he signed Worthington's name to the notice paper, goes far to warrant the inference, that there had been some collusion behind the scenes between the parties. The result of these disgraceful proceedings was, of course, that Worthington's notices failed, and he was threatened with an indictment for perjury; and unless it can be pleaded in his behalf, that he is in a state of imbecility of mind, that he was in fact the dupe of mere cunning men, he appears to be deserving of punishment for his conduct.

We have referred to this case, not for the purpose of noticing the absurd accusation made by the monopolist papers, that the League was cognisant of the doings of Worthington. The League has for several months published weekly directions for registration proceedings, which, if they had been carried out by a committee of Free Traders in North Warwick, would have prevented the possibility of such an exhibition of ignorance, folly, and illegality, as we have been describing. Our object in alluding to the subject is to show to our friends, not only in North Warwick, but elsewhere, the necessity of working their registration through intelligent local committees. The Council of the League may render assistance to such local bodies by placing at their disposal the results of much experience, and aiding them in a variety of ways with their efficient organisation; but without the co-operation of intelligent committees on the spot, to look after the character and ability of men who, like Worthington, undertake to sign objections, and to inquire into the legality of the objections before they are made, it is impossible to enter the registration courts with the least chance of success. We have no doubt that when, in a week or two, the results of the well-organised labours of the League in the counties already named shall be known, many other districts will put themselves in a position to carry on their registration upon the same system of efficiency, and with similar success.

It is not a little amusing to find the Standard-Herald—"Goose and Shadow"—taking advantage of this petty incident to revive the old folly of extended conspiracy and dangerous objects. The blundering of a registration court is strangely associated with tales of bribes from Russia and plots for murder. Like Croaker in the "Good-Natured Man," the Editor and echo find treason and assassination in every part of so mysterious an incident. It is surprising that they did not connect it with the earthquake in Syria, or the last eruption of Vesuvius. The reasoning would be as valid in the one case as in the other. "Stafford signed for Worthington; therefore the Emperor Nicholas, the great adversary of Free Trade, has bribed the League to overthrow his favourite system of policy." "Worthington is an aged, diminutive, decrepid object; therefore the League is employed in hiring assassins." Some hundred years ago, Worthington's infirmities might have exposed him to a charge of witchcraft from the old women of his parish. It may be taken as a proof of the march of intellect that the Grannies of the present day are contented with the milder charges of treason and assassination.

Even on the face of the report given by those extravagant followers of Titus Oates, it is evident that the Free Traders succeeded in a fair proportion of the cases that were gone into; and there is no reason to conclude that they would not have been equally successful with the rest, had not the objector vitiated his notices by allowing another person to sign his name for him. It is utterly absurd to accuse the League of designedly vitiating their own notices of objections; such a course would obviously frustrate all their previous labours, and render them as useless to the cause as the bribes of the Russian Emperor or the lamented death of Mr. Drummond.

FAMILIAR LECTURES ON THE ELEMENTS OF POLITICAL ECONOMY.

BY THE EDITOR.

No. VII.

CAPITAL AND LABOUR.

Although the first principles of political economy have been long since incontrovertibly established by the investigations and labours of Adam Smith, Ricardo, Mill, Say, and others, we are sometimes compelled to go back to them and examine once more the evidence on which they are founded, because they have not yet so firm a hold of the public mind as to be received everywhere as axioms. There are, indeed, men, happily designated "the sentimental economists" by the Manchester Guardian, who deliberately set themselves to work to overthrow the deductions of science, to justify artificial interference with the natural order into which the laws of exchange settle down when left to their own independent action; and who seem to think that emotions and feelings—nay, that even passions and prejudices, should have as large a share in legislation as intelligence and reason. We have occasionally noticed some strange doctrines emanating from this school, which have appeared under the head Anti-Leaguer in the columns of the Morning Post. These doctrines, indeed, are far from being clearly propounded, or intelligibly expressed, but we gather generally that the writer wishes to maintain; 1st, That employers, by the command of capital, have such an advantage over labourers, that the latter ought to be protected in obtaining adequate remuneration for their toil.

2dly. That one element of this protection ought to be some restraint on the progress of machinery—a tax is recommended—because machinery displaces human labour, and diminishes the demand for it in the market.

3dly. That cheapness of production is injurious to producers, and tends to increase the injurious supremacy of what he calls "the money-power," at the expense of the industrious portion of the community.

Before entering on any examination of these propositions, we must notice a misrepresentation of history which Anti-Leaguer has very frequently repeated in his effusions. He asserts that the early examples of legislative interference with wages were intended as protections to the labourer; whereas, the two great "Statutes of Labourers" were passed to keep down wages, for they fix the maximum which a labourer had a right to demand, not the minimum that he had to receive.

By the statute of Henry VII., passed in 1496, the following rates of wages were fixed:

AGRICULTURAL SERVANTS, WITH DIET, FOR ONE YEAR.
To a bailiff of husbandry, not more than	16 s.	8 d.	for clothing
A chief hand or chief shepherd	1	0	0
A common servant of husbandry	0	16	8
A woman servant	0	10	0
A child under 14 years of age	0	6	8

WAGES APPOINTED FOR ARTIFICERS, PER DIEM.
A free mason, master carpenter, rough mason, bricklayer, master tiler, plumber, glazier, carver, joiner.	Between Easter and Michaelmas, with diet, 4d. without, 6d.	Between Michaelmas and Easter, with diet, 3d. without, 5d.
Other labourers (except in harvest)	with diet, 2d. without, 4d.	with diet, 1½d. without, 3d.
In harvest, every mower, every reaper, every carter, A woman,	with diet, 4d. without, 6d. with diet, 3d. without, 5d. with diet, 3d. without, 5d. with diet, 2½d. without, 4½d.

If any unemployed person refused to work at these wages, it was enacted that he should be imprisoned until he found sureties to serve according to the statute. It is not necessary to add another word to prove that the design of this law was to fix a maximum of wages for the benefit of employers, and not a minimum for the protection of labourers. From these rates it appears that the cost of food was estimated at one-third of the wages of an artificer, and one-half of the wages of a labourer. Now it is very clear that the cost of food has increased in a far larger proportion than the rate of wages, and this sufficiently demonstrates the interest of the labourer in having cheap bread. But the historical error of the sentimental economist is not of so much importance as the principle that it is designed to support: he insinuates that there is a natural hostility between capital and labour, and he demands that the latter should be protected against the former. In exposing this fallacy we shall make large use of an admirable little work on Capital and Labour, just published by Mr. Charles Knight in his Shilling Monthly Series, and which has been written by Mr. Charles Knight himself.

To understand the relations between capital and labour, we have only to fix our attention on any industrial pursuit, and to see that a great variety of consumption is a necessary antecedent to production. There is a consumption of the raw material; a consumption of the instruments or tools employed in the manufacture; a consumption of the labour of the operatives engaged; and it must be further remarked, that these several consumptions are a kind of outlay or advance, to be repaid when the production is completed.

That there is an actual consumption of the raw material is a very evident fact: when I sow seed in the ground in order to raise a crop, the seed-corn is a product which I consume, and of which I destroy the value; for if I dug it up at the end of a week, no one would give me a farthing for it. In the same way I have consumed the labour of the persons whom I employed in ploughing and harrowing; and a part of the value of the agricultural machines has been consumed in wear and tear. Now the function of capital is to provide for the advance of the values to be consumed before production can be effected; and it can accomplish this result, because it is itself composed of values previously accumulated. This view of the case is very quaintly illustrated by Mr. Knight.

"There is an old proverb, that 'When two men ride on one horse, one man must ride behind.' Capital and Labour are, as we think, destined to perform a journey together to the end of time. We have shown how they proceed on this journey. We have shown that although Labour is the parent of all wealth, its struggles for the conversion of the rude supplies of nature into objects of utility, are most feeble in their effects till they are assisted by accumulation. Before the joint interests of Labour and Capital were at all understood, they kept separate; when they only began to be understood, as we shall show, they were constantly pulling different ways, instead of giving 'a long pull, a strong pull, and a pull altogether;' and even now, when these interests in many respects are still imperfectly understood, they occasionally quarrel about the conditions upon which they will continue to travel in company. In the very outset of the journey, Labour doubtless took the lead. In the dim morning of society Labour was up and stirring before Capital was awake. Labour did not then ride; he travelled slowly on foot through very dirty ways. Capital, at length, as slowly followed after, through the same mire, but at an humble distance from his parent. But when Capital grew into strength, he saw that there were quicker and more agreeable modes of travelling for both than Labour had found out. He procured that fleet and untiring horse Exchange; and when he proposed to Labour that they should mount together, he claimed the right, and kept it, for their mutual benefit, of taking the direction of the horse. For this reason, as it appears to us, we are called upon to assign to one of the companions, according to the practice of the old Knights Templars, the privilege of sitting before the other—holding the reins, indeed, but in all respects having a community of interests, and an equality of duties, as well as rights, with his fellow-traveller."

The sentimentalist endeavours to raise a prejudice against capital by identifying it with what he calls money-power. But that an accumulation of values should become what is strictly termed capital, it is not necessary that the accumulation should take the form of money. The value of capital, as of everything else, is estimated in money simply because the precious metals have been generally recognised as a convenient standard of comparison; but all that is requisite to constitute capital is an accumulation of values which can be used for the production of other values. When a manufacturer is said to have a hundred thousand pounds invested in his business, or when a merchant is said to have a similar sum engaged in commerce, no one supposes that he has the amount by him in hard cash: we have only estimated the sum total of the several values of all his means of production; his mills or his ships, his stock or his cargo. Let us next see for what purpose these values have been accumulated, or rather, what is the important function to which this accumulation is destined.

It is unnecessary to show that without some accumulation there would have been no means of providing for the several consumptions which we have shown to be necessarily antecedent to production. It is of more importance to observe, that when once this process of consumption is commenced, the capitalist must go onwards to production, and must therefore become an employer of labour. Mr. Knight illustrates this very ingeniously, by the example of a heap of coals laid down at a door, which a labourer must be employed to shovel into the cellar.

"The heap of coals was capital. The coals represented a very great and various accumulation of former labour that had been employed in giving them value. The coals were altogether valueless till labour had been employed to raise them from the pit, and to convey them to the door of the man who was about to consume them. But with what various helps had this labour worked! Mere manual labour could have done little or nothing with the coals in the pit. Machines had raised them from the pit. Machines had transported them from the pit to the door of the consumer. They would have remained buried in the earth but for large accumulations of knowledge, and large accumulations of pecuniary wealth to set that knowledge in action by exchanging with it. The heap of coals represented all this accumulation; and it more immediately represented the circulating capital of consumable articles of utility, which had been paid in the shape of wages, at every stage of the labour exercised in raising the coals from the mine, and conveying them to the spot in which the prodigal found them laid. The coals had almost attained their highest value by a succession of labour; but one labour was still wanting to give them the highest value. They were at their lowest value when they remained unbroken in the coal-pit; they were at their highest value when they were deposited in the cellar of the consumer. For that last labour there was circulating capital ready to be exchanged. The man whose course of production we have been tracing imparted to them this last value, and for this labour he received a 'few pence' and a 'gratuity of meat and drink.' These consumable commodities, and the money which might be exchanged for other consumable commodities, were circulating capital. They supplied his most pressing wants with incomparably more readiness and certainty than if he had been turned loose amongst the unappropriated productions of nature, with unlimited freedom and absolute rights. In the state in which he was actually placed his rights were limited by his duties,—but this balance of rights and duties was the chief instrument in the satisfaction of his wants. Let us examine the principle a little more in detail.

"An exchange was to be carried on between the owner of the coals and the man who was willing to shovel them into the owner's cellar. The labourer did not want any distinct portion of the coals, but he wanted some articles of more urgent necessity in exchange for the new value which he was ready to bestow upon the coals. The object of each exchanger was, that labour should be exchanged with capital. That object could not have been accomplished, or it would have been accomplished slowly, imperfectly, and therefore unprofitably, unless there had been interchangeable freedom and security for both exchangers,—for the exchanger of capital, and the exchanger of labour. The first right of the labourer was, that his labour should be free;—the first right of the capitalist was, that his capital should be free. The rights of each were built upon the security of property. Could this security have been violated, it might have happened, either that the labourer should have been compelled to shovel in the coals—or, that the capitalist should have been compelled to employ the labourer to shovel them in. Had the lot of the unfortunate prodigal been cast in such a state of society as would have allowed this violation of the natural rights of the labourer and the capitalist, he would have found little accumulation to give a profitable direction to his labour. He would have found production suspended, or languishing. There would probably have been no heap of coals wanting his labour to give them the last value;—for the engines would have been idle that raised them from the pit, and the men would have been idle that directed the engines. The circulating capital that found wages for the men and fuel for the engines would have been idle, because it could not have worked with security. Accumulation, therefore, would have been suspended;—and all profitable labour would, in consequence, have been suspended. It was the unquestionable right of the labourer that his labour should be free; but it was balanced by the right of the capitalist that his accumulation should be secure. Could the labour have seized upon the capital, or the capital upon the labour, production would have been stopped altogether, or in part. The mutual freedom and security of labour and capital compel production to go forward; and labour and capital take their respective stations, and perform their respective duties, altogether with reference to the laws which govern production. These laws are founded upon the natural action of the system of exchange, carrying forward all its operations by the natural action of the great principle of demand and supply. When capital and labour know how to accommodate themselves to the direction of these natural laws, they are in a healthy state with respect to their individual rights, and the rights of industry generally. They are in that state in which each is working to the greatest profit in carrying forward the business of production."

Now take the case of a manufacturer who has invested a large sum in mills, machinery, and raw materials. He must employ labour, or all that he has thus consumed will be utterly unproductive, and in effect thrown away. If the persons he employs are dependent upon him for labour, he is equally dependent on them for the interest of the money he has invested, that is, in fact, consumed. And the greater and more direct his investment is, the more obvious and perceptible will be his dependence upon those whom he employs. At Oldham the men invite their masters to become their guests, and receive them with that courtesy which always accompanies self-respect; in Dorchester the labourers are invited by the landlords, lectured on the honour done them, and turned out just as the proceedings of the meeting were likely to become most interesting.

The objections made by the sentimentalists against the accumulation of capital evince a total ignorance of its nature and origin; for the rights of capital, and the rights of industry, are co-extensive and identical. If the industrious man has a right to the reward of his labour, he has an equal right to what he saves from this reward out of his daily expenditure; and it is by the accumulation of such savings that capital is formed. But many vague writers find it convenient to denounce the accumulation itself as something criminal or immoral, assuming, perhaps unconsciously, that the process is identical with sordidness. This error enables them to enlist popular prejudice against capitalists, whom they represent as mere money-grubbers. When driven from their bad economy they take refuge in bad morality. We can trace the consequences of this error in the sad history of the middle ages; when a farmer or corn-dealer stored up corn, which was, in fact, accumulating capital, he was sure to be assailed by the ignorant populace for keeping provisions from the markets, and thus raising prices. But such accumulation could alone prevent the dreadful famines invariably resulting from having no stock that might be available in case of a bad harvest. Hence no one ventured to store corn; and such were the fluctuations of price, that wheat often rose just before the harvest from 5s. a quarter to 5l.; and the poor consequently perished by thousands.

The subject of capital is too important to be passed over lightly, and we shall endeavour to present a condensed view of some of its varied operations in a future lecture.

THE LATE THOMAS ASHTON, ESQ.

(From the Christian Reformer.)

Thomas Ashton, Esq., of Flowery Field, near Hyde, died 27th August last, in the 70th year of his age. This excellent and deeply-lamented man must not pass away from us without some brief record of the events of his life and his important public services. He was born December 4, 1775, at Gerard's, a small estate which has been in the possession of the family for several generations, situated in the township of Werneth, in the parish of Stockport. His father, Samuel Ashton, who lived till the year 1812, was a man of strong sense, and brought up a large family, consisting of 10 children, in a truly respectable manner. Thomas was the second of seven sons who grew to manhood, nearly all of whom have raised themselves to an important rank in society. He received a plain but sound education under Mr. Joel Cheetham, the village schoolmaster of Gee-Cross. Possessed of great quickness of observation, a tenacious memory, and above all a very sound understanding, Mr. Ashton made so good a use of his opportunities of acquiring knowledge in his early and after life, as to be always able to take his rightful place in conversation and society. It was not till about his 25th year that he entered into the cotton-manufacture, then in its infancy, now raised to such vast national importance. Till the year 1800, there was but one small cotton-mill in the immediate neighbourhood of his father's house. The second was built at Hyde by Mr. Randal Hibbert, and was tenanted by the three eldest sons of Mr. Samuel Ashton, who had shrewdness to perceive, and talent and industry to realise, the amazing capabilities of the cotton business. The lease was for 14 years. The result showed that they had taken the tide at its flood, and before the expiration of the lease the foundations were laid for the large fortunes raised by this very successful family. Success did not relax Mr. Ashton's close attention to business, or alter the habits of wise economy in which he had been trained. Nothing in the history of trade is more remarkable than the long-continued frugality and resolute self-denial of the founders of cotton-spinning in England. Untempted by great gains and the possession of ample means to change their simple habits and devote a portion of their time to pleasure, they with untiring assiduity devoted gains, time, and every energy to the increase of their manufacturing establishments. There were many in Lancashire and Cheshire who had advantages equal at the outset to those of the Ashtons, and other great capitalists. Whatever distinction these have attained is attributable to the energy and self-denial of a few men, possessed of clear heads and strong character, in the early parts of their career. Mr. Thomas Ashton in every respect deserved his success. He desired that his servants and all around him should feel the advantages of his prosperity. He was sedulously attentive to the comfort and health of those who worked for him. On this important point, impartial testimony has been borne by two journalists possessed of good opportunities of knowledge—the Editors of The League and the Manchester Guardian.

The writer rejoices to know that there are now many manufacturing not inferior to Mr. Ashton's in whatever can contribute to the health and comfort of the operatives. At this time of day, it is happily not necessary to combat the once-popular prejudice, that every cotton-mill is a den of filth and pollution, moral as well as physical. In establishments where the proportion of fixed to floating capital is as four to one, and where the principal labour is expended on piece-work, and in which the master's profit will chiefly depend on the amount of work done, enlightened self-interest alone, without regard to higher and better feelings, would induce the owner to attend diligently to the personal comfort of his workpeople. Mr. Thomas Ashton proved that he was influenced by the highest motives in the zealous and costly efforts he made to promote in those around him, sound knowledge, good morals, and practical religion. In respect to education, he earned the distinction of being in advance of his order. The school-buildings which he erected many years ago at Flowery Field are an enduring monument of his philanthropy. No cost was spared by him in building and furnishing them. He was especially desirous to procure the assistance of the best teachers. The principal school-room is a very spacious building, excellently lighted and ventilated, fitted up with an organ and other conveniences, so as to make it suitable for a lecture-room, a place for public meetings, or a chapel. In the latter capacity, he, with true catholicity of spirit, allowed it to be occupied by Christian ministers of all denominations whom his people might wish to hear. At Christmas-time, this spacious room was the scene of an annual festival, at which Mr. Ashton and his family collected together, for a social meal and for a variety of amusements, as many of their poorer neighbours as the room would hold. The aged people, and especially such as did not often sit at feasts, were sought out on these occasions, and their comforts personally looked to by this benevolent family. It was a pleasant sight to see the kind-hearted master presiding over these festivities. He had not the gifts of the orator; but the few words of welcome and kindness which he was wont to utter, were better than eloquence. From his habitual shrinking from public speaking, few persons out of the circle of his intimate friends were aware how large a share he took in public business. He was through life a consistent upholder of Liberal politics, cherishing to the last with undiminished zeal the principle, that Government ought to be for the protection and good, not merely of a class, but of all. From a very early period of life, he saw the importance of Free Trade to an insular country, like England, possessed of a limited territory, and occupied by a daily-increasing population. His counsel, his purse and his heartiest sympathy were freely given to the energetic band of men who, under the guidance of Richard Cobden, a few years ago devoted themselves to the task of popularising the principles of Free Trade. During the latter years of his life, Mr. Ashton, in addition to his manufacturing, embarked a large capital in foreign commerce; and the writer of this tribute of respect well remembers upon one occasion, when the conversation turned on the unsatisfactory prospects of the harvest, Mr. Ashton spoke of the various articles he was importing—tea from China, diamonds from India—and added emphatically, "I import almost everything except corn; that no merchant in his senses will touch while the Corn Laws last."

In the election struggles of Manchester and North Cheshire, Mr. Ashton zealously supported the Liberal candidates. At the county meeting at Knutsford, in the election of 1837, he proposed to the freeholders of North Cheshire the Hon. E. J. Stanley, who was then elected. But notwithstanding his well-known character as a member of the Liberal party, he was ever ready to hold intercourse and to maintain the most friendly relations with men of all parties. On many occasions was his counsel taken, and more than once his opinion was quoted in Parliament by Conservatives, and by members of the Government. His knowledge of all matters of trade was extensive and accurate, and even his political opponents knew that they could rely on his sincerity and honour. He was pleased during the latter years of his life to spend some weeks in London during the Parliamentary session. He was often to be seen in the gallery and lobby of the House of Commons; and when there his opinion was as anxiously sought on commercial topics before the House, as it was on the Exchange of Manchester. He was well known and respected at the Board of Trade and in other Government offices.

Mr. Ashton was placed in the commission of the peace for the counties of Chester and Lancaster, and in his native county diligently discharged his magisterial duty. He was merciful in administering the law; and where little cases of litigation brought parties before him, he knew how to blend the neighbour and the friend with the magistrate, and by a timely word of counsel to both, or a happy personal appeal to one, sometimes brought about a reconciliation.

In his family relations, Mr. Thomas Ashton enjoyed comfort and happiness in no common measure. He was in any circle a cheerful companion, but his kind, and hopeful, and affectionate temper shone brightest when the members of his own family and his friends were gathered together in his hospitable dwelling, or when he and the beloved partner of his happiness were visitors at the homes of their married children.

During the last two years, Mr. Ashton's health had been giving way. Till within a week or two of his decease, the decline was very gradual. Those who love him are consoled by the knowledge that he was spared acute suffering; and though his death was at the last sudden, his dismissal was very tranquil. When the tidings of the sad event spread through the mill, it is said scarcely a dry eye was to be seen amongst the many hundred workpeople. This was a spontaneous tribute to a good man's worth, which fear could not extort nor gold buy. On the day of the funeral and on the Sunday following, the chapel at Gee-Cross (although the funeral was strictly private) was densely filled with a congregation of sincere mourners. Amongst those who attended on the latter occasion were Thomas Thornely, Esq., M.P., Richard Cobden, Esq., M.P., Edmund Buckley, Esq., M.P., and many gentlemen from Manchester, Dukinfield, and other places, of different sects and parties. We close this imperfect memorial of a good man's life with the words of the writer in "THE LEAGUE."

"Fortunately for the district which owes so much to Thomas Ashton, the inheritors of his name and fortune are also worthy representatives of his virtues; his spirit will still direct the establishment at Hyde; his name be upheld as a bright example in the manufacturing districts; and his memory have a living monument in the continuation of his noble principles, developed in equally noble practice."

TITCHFIELD.—TESTIMONIAL TO MR. BRIGHT.—We have just seen a beautiful piece of plate about to be presented to John Bright, Esq., M.P., on which is the following inscription:—Presented to John Bright, Esq., M.P., by a few of the inhabitants of Titchfield parish, as a small token of their approbation of his zealous endeavours to expose the injustice and iniquity of the game laws. September 15th, 1845.—This testimonial was the result of a subscription originating with a few disinterested individuals, who have on many former occasions accelerated by their influence and contributions the cause of freedom and justice. We beg to refer our readers to our last number, under the Christchurch head, for information on the oppressive working of the game laws.—Hants Independent.

THIRTEENTH ANNIVERSARY OF MR. ANDREWS'S COACH ESTABLISHMENT.—On Wednesday last Mr. Andrews gave his thirteenth annual festival to the workmen employed in his extensive coach manufactory at Southampton. It has been our pleasing task to record the proceedings of these festivals for several years past, and this one differed but little from those of preceding years. There was the same manifestation of cordiality between the employer and employed, the same commendable decorum of conduct on the part of the artisans, and similar statements of increased and increasing prosperity in the establishment, to the lasting credit of Mr. Andrews's genius and perseverance, and the skill of his ingenious workmen. According to the established custom, a holiday was given to the whole of the workmen, employees, and labourers, which was spent in the old English game of cricket, at Day's Ground. At six o'clock the company assembled in the spacious octagon gallery in the Coach Factory, Above Bar, where tables were laid for the whole of the workmen, and gentlemen, and friends invited by the worthy host to join in the evening's festivity. The gallery was very tastefully fitted up with evergreens, flowers, and flags, and inscriptions were hung around the walls, consisting principally of sentences expressive of the advantages of unrestricted trade. Mr. Andrews took the chair, supported by Lord Dudley Stuart, E. Stuart, Esq., Capt. Townsend, R.N., R. Beste, Esq., of Botleigh Grange, H. Drew, Esq., of the firm of Randson and Drew, Mr. H. Lowe, of Birmingham, Mr. F. Mulliner, coachmaker, of Northampton, R. D. Corderner, Esq., of Dublin, Mr. Murcott, of Long Acre, London, Messrs. Wright and Ibbotson, of Hammersmith, Mr. Middleton, coachmaker, of Long Acre, Mr. Palfrey, of the Patent Wheel Works, Pimlico, Mr. Bran, coachmaker of Christchurch, Mr. Underwood, of Bristol, and several friends of Mr. Andrews's, of Southampton, Winchester, and other places. The vice-chairs were filled by the foremen of the different departments. In the course of the evening Lord Dudley Stuart proposed the health of Mr. Andrews, whose character he warmly eulogized.—Hants Independent.

ADVANCE IN WAGES.—Yesterday week, Messrs. R. and J. Anderson, cotton spinners, Collier Vale, near Garstang, advanced the wages of their spinners, &c., $\frac{1}{2}$ per cent., without any solicitation.—Preston paper.

THE PROGRESS OF OUR EXPORTS.

(From the Economist.)

It is generally known that the declared value represents the actual value at the time of shipment, and that the official value is the quantity of goods of each kind estimated at uniform prices which were affixed to them in 1694; while, therefore, the declared value is an indication of cost, the official value is an indication of quantity, and the two compared at any period shows the changes which takes place in the price of goods. Previous to 1844, the year to which the largest amount of goods, according to the declared value, was exported, was 1836. In that year our exports amounted to 53,368,572*l.*, according to the declared or real value, and to 85,229,837*l.*, according to the official value; showing, therefore, that the price of goods had fallen from the official standard of value by 36 per cent. In 1844 (last year), the real value of our exports exceeded any former year, and amounted to 58,584,292*l.* of which the official value was 131,564,503*l.*; showing that, now the price of goods has fallen below the official standard by no less than 55 per cent., or, in other words, showing that, while the quantity of goods exported has increased since 1836 by 54 per cent., their value has increased barely 10 per cent. This a striking evidence of the low price of goods at the present time, as compared with 1836, and of the great improvement and economy introduced into their manufacture during that period, by the improvements of machinery and otherwise. And there can be no doubt that it is chiefly to these improvements, and the lower price of our goods, that we are able to command such an increasing demand in the markets of the world.

The whole value of exports to all our own possessions, including those in Europe, is not one-third of the whole, and our exports to foreign neutral markets are consequently more than two-thirds. This shows how fallacious is the general opinion that ascribes to our colonies the great bulk of our export trade. The amount exported to the British possessions in 1836, was 13,721,379*l.*, out of a total amount of 53,368,572*l.* Last year the former had increased to 16,504,060*l.*; but more than the whole difference arises in the trade to the East Indies and Gibraltar, the latter being almost exclusively for Spanish consumption. Our exports to India during that period have increased from 4,285,829*l.* in 1836, to 7,695,666*l.* last year, and, therefore, alone shows a larger increase than the whole aggregate colonial exports; so that, leaving India and Gibraltar out, the remainder show a considerable diminution. With so satisfactory a progress under the recent system of low duties, it is, indeed, much to be regretted that any cause has arisen to induce the Indian Government to increase the rates of duty. It is true the prices of goods are now so very low, that it is hoped that step will cause no sensible diminution of that valuable trade; at the same time we much fear it will materially check the progress which might otherwise be expected. The following statement shows the comparative progress of our trade to the various geographical divisions, thus:

Northern Europe	£9,999,861	£14,326,797
Southern Europe	9,011,205	11,294,388
Africa	1,468,062	1,615,530
Asia	6,750,842	11,273,721
United States	12,425,695	7,936,079
British N. America, Colonies and W. I.	6,518,744	5,592,348
Foreign West Indies	1,338,785	1,173,931
Central and S. Amer. including Brazil	5,555,468	5,439,502

This comparison shows a very large decrease to the whole of the western world, including our own colonies, while the largest increase is to Europe, and the next to the eastern markets. It is not a little curious and instructive, to find that, in spite of hostile tariffs, made more and more stringent, on the Continent of Europe, the greater liberality exercised towards the produce of those countries here, has had the effect in so striking a way of increasing our exports. It will further be observed, that the greatest increase of our exports has taken place to Russia, Prussia, Germany, Belgium, and France, which are just the countries that have imposed the highest duties in order to exclude our goods.

THE AGRICULTURAL SCAPEGOAT.

(From the Examiner.)

The farmer is blessed with more counsellors than Job, but he is worse off than the man of Uz, for he has not the small solace of reply. It is his hard lot to be semper auditor tantum. We marvel greatly at his patience. We wonder that he does not find a voice, and break into speech, as the dumb have been known to do upon mighty provocation. The burden of advice upon him is more than mortal man can bear. It is a very remarkable fact that in the agricultural system, so nursed by the Legislature, only one part is sound and as it ought to be, and that the landlords. There are bad labourers, there are bad farmers; there are no bad landlords. There are reedy soils, there are no reedy rents. There are soils which want draining, but the draining of tenants by landlords has been brought to the greatest possible perfection. The landlords see with grief that the farmers do not improve. The population is increasing at the rate of 100,000 a year, and the farmers are not exercising the skill by which the produce of the land might be proportionately augmented to supply the enlarged demand. The farmer, tenant-at-will, is so ill-advised as to be indisposed to improve the land mainly for his landlord's profit, or else to take a lease adjusted to the existing Corn Law, and with every prospect of a change or abolition of them. But there are farmers who happen to have leases, leases framed by wise landlords with various conditions, some that cannot possibly be performed, others that would compel the worst cultivation of the soil. A farmer of this class was lately made an example of by no less a personage than Her Majesty's Secretary of State for the Home Department. This farmer had violated the terms of his lease in improving the cultivation of the land. His excellent landlord treated the improvement as a defiance of his authority, and tried hard, but unavailingly, to punish it. Proof was adduced that the "Farmers' Friend" had awarded prizes for the very improvements he was attempting to punish as breaches of engagement, but Sir James Graham stood on the letter of the bond, and insisted on the penalty for the advantageous infraction. In this righteous attempt he was defeated; and if wise and good landlords want the power, under the law, of compelling tenants to conform to the rules that seem best to them, however bad for the cultivation of the soil, can we wonder that agriculture is in a defective state? We must not omit to mention the circumstance that the tenants against whom Sir James Graham proceeded for improvements, in defiance of his authority commanding a faulty cultivation, had voted for a Liberal candidate—a thing not to be endured in Netherby head-bushy. Besides the rapid increase of population, there is a circumstance requiring the redoubled exertions of the farmers to augment the productiveness of the soil (subject only to persecution or prosecution if they vote for Liberals), which has not been noticed, namely, the very considerable quantity of land which will be withdrawn from agricultural uses by the railroads about to intersect every part of the country. The soil is lessening, while the population is so enormously augmenting, and the poor farmer is to make up for both by his improved skill. If he does not shortly raise as much corn in a flower-pot by the light of science as he now does in a rood of land, we all know where the fault must lie. The farmer is to make up for everything under the blessed Corn Laws; cut away the soil as much as you please, let the population augment as you cannot help, and the farmer's skill is to provide for all; and yet, wonderful as the capacities of the farmer must be, the landlords, who have no such wonderful capacities, set up for his instructors and directors in everything. It seems odd that the farmers don't retaliate, and form some association for teaching the landlords. What excellent speeches might be delivered, deploring the absence of improvement in landlords, showing the barbarism of maintaining high rents, and the stupid impolicy of not granting leases, and that final settlement of the corn question without which tender of leases is a sheer mockery.

THE LEAGUE AND ITS ENEMIES.

(From the Liverpool Chronicle.)

The League is beginning to make itself terribly felt even by those who at one time affected to treat it with the most profound contempt. Some of the monopolists, indeed, having once pronounced it dead, still, for the sake of consistency, stoutly assert the same self-delusion, as if they believed that the most sturdy ghost could inflict the heavy and hearty blows continually dealt to them. But others of them are wiser. They tremble before "the great fact" which they sorrowfully admit. They recount its progress and its victories and confess its influence, in the vain hope that the bare recital of them will stimulate the agriculturists to defeat the full-grown giant before whom they quailed and fled when he was an infant in the cradle. Thus, for instance, a Gloucestershire monopolist paper, now lying before us, blows the trumpet of alarm and strives to rouse its paralysed friends to courage and exertion—

"All the daily journals except the Herald, Standard, and Post, advocate Free Trade: the vast majority of the London journals, and at least half of the provincial. In addition to these, the League publish a paper of their own, which is said to have a virtual circulation of nearly 40,000 copies weekly."

There is small and miserable comfort for the terror-stricken monopolists in such confessions as this. They are much more likely to create a panic than to give encouragement. But this is not all. In the very next number of the same paper the subject is again returned to in an article headed in large letters, "THE REGISTRATION: THE AGGRESSION OF THE LEAGUE." The League, it appears, giving its help to the Free Trade party in East Gloucestershire, has objected to a number of voters, supposed to be fagot or fictitious, and this very proper proceeding is very modestly pronounced to be "an aggression." The Tories, forsooth, never attempt to improve their position on a registration, either by striking off, if possible, the names of their opponents, or by putting on increased numbers of their own friends! They never think of doing anything of this sort, nor yet of manufacturing votes by the dozen by cottage building or buying! They never force their tenants to vote against their consciences, nor perpetrate anything to gain or keep power against the free choice and will of the people! Naughty, naughty League! To make war against innocence like this! To sow discord and dissension in this more than earthly and almost heavenly paradise! Could crime go farther? Could hostility be more bitter? Could "aggression" be more unprovoked? The vested rights of monopoly not respected! This is the climax. The ne plus ultra of iniquity is attained! The League has out-Leagued itself in its horrid and dreadful attempts to give prosperity to the country and employment and labour to the people. This is droll and laughable. But there is more of it yet. Thus continues our comical opponent, calling on his friends to fight to the last, and "support and uphold the Church and State in their integrity, and oppose the wild and visionary doctrines of Free Traders in corn and religion, which would be subversive of the social arrangements of an ancient country, and would bring ruin on a class of the community—the cultivators of the soil—entitled to consideration and protection." We never met with a prettier jumble nor yet a more impudent one. According to the writer's idea of it, the Corn Law is a much more comprehensive affair than many people have an idea of. With him Corn Law is "church." Corn Law is "state." Corn Law is our guardian against "the wild and visionary doctrines of free-traders in religion." Corn Law is the security "for the social arrangements of our ancient country," although, in very truth, social arrangements existed, and our country was somewhat ancient before Corn Law was ever heard of. But what comes next? Here we jump into the pith and marrow of the whole affair. Corn Law "would bring ruin on the cultivators of the soil." It would do no such thing. But the writer thinks so, and hinc ille lachrymæ, hence his cries and lamentations over the oddly combined interests of religion and monopoly. But even this conjunction of opposites is not original. The world has seen it before. This is not the first Demetrius who has sounded the alarm, "Great is Diana of the Ephesians. Her worship is threatened, and our craft is in danger. Her magnificence must be upheld, and the source of our wealth must be maintained." So it was in times of old, and so it is now. Human nature is ever the same, unchanged and unchangeable. To attack the Corn Law is, therefore, declared to be to assault religion.

They say religion, but they mean their pelf, They shout Diana, while they think of self. But let them go on. We love to hear these howlings of despair. Their cause must be, indeed, a bad one and on the point of expiring, when they are thus driven from all show of argument to take refuge in the outpourings and ravings of senseless folly. The flying vermin must be nearly at its last shift when, throwing Bedlam into the shade, it puts forth, as a rallying cry, the solemn announcement that Corn Law is "Church and State in their integrity."

THE SMALLEST IMPROVEMENT THANKFULLY RECEIVED.—The difficulty, it seems, with railways, is to invent a whistle that shall give intimation to another train of approaching danger. We are sure the public would be too grateful for any improvement of the kind, especially as they now find that, if they lose their lives on a pleasure excursion, it is paying rather too dearly for their whistle.—Punch

NORTHAMPTON.—The following is the result of the revision for this borough:—Objections made by monopolists, 40; sustained, 15; objections made by Liberals and Free Traders, 26; sustained, 14; new claims by monopolists, 7.

new claims by Liberals and Free Traders, 20; sustained, 16; Liberal and Free Trade majority on revision, 8.

CHIPPENHAM.—The revision of the lists of voters for this borough took place on Friday, Oct. 3, before Geo. Poulton, Esq., T. A. Fellows, Esq., and — Pinniger, Esq., appeared for the Monopolists; Mr. Huggett, of Westminster, for the Free Traders. The Free Traders made one claim, which was allowed; but made no objections. The monopolists made no claims; but they made four objections, all of which were rejected. The claim of Job Obern, a Free Trader, was allowed. On the name of George Barnes being called on, the barrister desired Mr. Huggett to produce his appointment to appear for the parties objected to. Mr. Huggett said he appeared at the request of the parties; but did not conceive it necessary to produce a written appointment. After some opposition on the part of Mr. Fellows, Mr. Huggett was heard in support of the votes. On the party appearing to support his vote, the objector withdrew the objections. Mr. Huggett applied for costs; no intimation had been given to the party of intention to withdraw the objection. The barrister inquired if the parties had incurred any expense in attending the court. Mr. Huggett contended that the object of the Legislature was not to defray expenses incurred, but to prevent groundless and speculative objections. In answer to questions by the court, it appeared that the party paid exactly 10*l.* per annum to his employer for the premises; the barrister thought this was not a case for costs. Charles Spiers was objected to on the ground of non-residence. John Spiers (brother of the voter) proved that his brother resided in Spital-square, London; but had a room on his premises in Chippenham, which he had furnished with a bed for his own use. He had never slept there; witness had slept there, but had no right except as Charles Spiers's servant. Mr. Huggett contended that it was not necessary the party should actually sleep on the premises to constitute a residence, but that the means of doing so was sufficient. He cited several decisions of Committees of the House of Commons in confirmation of this position. The vote was ultimately allowed; the barrister observing that the case was not altogether free from doubt.

FROME.—On Tuesday, Sept. 30, the court for revising the list of voters for the borough of Frome was held by G. N. Oxenham, Esq., revising barrister. The following is the result of the revision:

	Monop.	Free Trade.	Dblful.

WHAT IS SCOTLAND DOING?—The Montrose Review, speaking of the success of the League in its registration operations in the northern counties, Middlesex, and other places, says: "But the same party is working in other quarters, and producing, we fancy, equally remarkable results in smaller constituencies. Their perseverance should be a lesson to others. They are practical, laborious men. They have sat at the feet of Peel, and heard words of wisdom from his lips. They have been told that the battle of the country is to be fought in the registration courts; and they have taken the hint, and fought the battle there. In Scotland, we merely think of these things. Our counties are left in the possession of the aristocracy. They are quietly handed over to some one of the sections. The natural influence of property, we are told, must be respected; but no effort is made to raise property of a different kind. Since the date of the Reform Bill, the working classes of Forfarshire might have taken the representation of the county into their own hands, through the agency of building societies, if one or two honest and intelligent men from their own body had directed their proceedings. There are very few Scottish counties where the same achievement could not have been accomplished. It is one that requires time and perseverance; but, meanwhile, the outlay is profitable—property is secured—the stake in the country is provided—and the power of the millions would be very strikingly exemplified. In many English and some Scottish towns, an operation of this nature is already well commenced. The parties who conduct it have probably no view in the matter beyond the profitable investment of small savings; but, as a contingent result, it will greatly change, in ten or twelve years, the complexion of political parties in this country, by introducing into the constituencies a large body of artisans, with the feelings of their order, and the endowment of property, even if, in the meantime, no change shall be accomplished in the qualifications for the franchise."

SOUTH CHESHIRE REVISING BARRISTERS' COURT.

(To the Editor of THE LEAGUE.)

SIR,—Having attended the South Cheshire Revision Court, presided over by — Townsend, Esq., I was much surprised to find he was generally acquainted with the persons summoned before him, as I always understood the judges did not appoint any barrister to revise for any borough, division, or county, where he had local connections. In this instance, I had clear proof of the necessity of such a course, as the barrister above-named made it a practice to select persons for a hearing from his acquaintance with them; whilst scores of others, remaining long in court, had to wait their regular turn.

On inquiry, I was informed that he is legally connected with Macclesfield, and regularly attends the county sessions. Whether he would adjudicate differently amongst strangers, I do not know; but it is not in accordance with popular ideas, to see the judge of any court giving precedence to his acquaintances (or, it may be, his clients in another court), and marking his decisions by strong expressions of sympathy and regret, where negligence or want of qualification prevented his giving costs.

I select a few of the many cases that might be instanced, where the conduct and decisions of the barrister appear extraordinary.

In the Birkenhead Court he complimented a Mr. Peers for his zeal and ability, allowing him an extra sum for expenses (from parish funds, of course);—Peers's attention consisting of his objections to Free Traders, against whose qualifications he could not say a single word. Some of these were admitted on their appearing in court; but others, not being able to leave their business, lost their franchises. He also asked, and was allowed time to canvass for the attendance of monopolist claimants.

This treatment of Peers was the more conspicuous when contrasted with that suffered by one of the most upright, attentive, and well-conducted of the district overseers, Mr. A. Kerr (Seacombe), whose appearance before the barrister occasioned an outburst of judicial ill-temper. Mr. Kerr's expenses were disallowed, under a pretext that was set aside in the very next case (Harwood's); Harwood had but twenty yards to come—Kerr five miles; yet the former was allowed his expenses, while the latter was not!

The next case is that of the Rev. Joshua King, Rector of Woodchurch. On his appearance in court, the barrister turned to his name, called him up, inquired if he was objected to, and being answered in the negative, informed him that if he had been objected to, he must have been struck off, as the word "Rector" was the only qualification given in the third column; then, to the evident surprise of all in court, the barrister, without either claim or objection being before him, expunged the word "Rector," and substituted a freehold qualification, promising to give the utmost extent of costs, in case any one objected to the name next year.

The next case was that of a Mr. Stanton, of Thelwell, in Lancashire; the objector finding no such township in Lancashire, sent his objection. Mr. Stanton made his appearance, and stated that he lived more than twenty miles distance—namely, at the village of Thelwell, in the Hundred of Bucklow and north division of the county of Chester; yet a fine of 20*s.* in favour of Mr. Stanton was levied, and his name was retained for a residence that has no existence. In addition to all this, more than half-a-dozen times a day the barrister announced what fines he would give next year. The general belief is, that he expects to be appointed to revise for this district again; and it is therefore hoped that the Judges who have the appointments will take care that, if appointed at all, it shall be beyond the limits of his political or other partialities.

A CORRESPONDENT.

WIGAN.—On Monday evening, Mr. Falvey, of the Anti-Corn-Law League, delivered an admirable lecture in favour of Free Trade, and on the propriety of supporting such principles at the approaching election. The large room of the Buck-lit-Vine Inn was crowded to excess; and, although men of all political parties were invited, and, what is more, attended, there was not a murmur against the arguments of the lecturer. He was much applauded during his address, and at its close three cheers were given for the Free Trade candidate, and one hearty cheer for the lecturer. The canvass of Mr. Thicknesse is proceeding very satisfactorily, and if any judgment can be formed from the acknowledged principles of those who have made no promise of their votes, the election is certain in his favour. The total number of registered electors, after making deductions for deaths, and of those who cannot vote from other causes, is about 530. It is very probable that upwards of twenty will be neutral—in deed, if 500 voters should poll, the constituency will be worked well. Mr. Falvey delivers a series of lectures during the week.—Leeds Mercury.

REPRESENTATION OF WOODSTOCK.—The good people of Woodstock seem to have been taken a little aback by the sudden occurrence of a vacancy in their representation, caused by the elevation of Lord Loftus to the peerage. The town still retains its usual appearance of quietude and repose; and betrays no indications of an approaching election. Even busy rumour has scarcely yet begun to whisper the names of those who are likely to present themselves as candidates for the favour of the "free and independent" electors of Woodstock. No official intimation of the vacancy has yet been received, and probably will not be for some days; for before such notification is given it will be necessary for Lord Loftus to prove his title to the peerage, which he is not likely to do until after the funeral obsequies of the late Marquis have been performed. It is probable, therefore, that a period of two or three weeks will elapse before the election takes place.—Times.

PRESENT WORKING OF THE SLIDING SCALE.—It will be seen from the return of the average prices of wheat for the last six weeks, given in another column, that that kind of grain appears to be falling rapidly, and that, according to the last weekly return, the average price of wheat in the United Kingdom was not more than 52*s.* a quarter, a decline of 4*s.* having apparently taken place since the return of the week before last. Now it is a fact as notorious as the shining of the sun at noon-day, that there has been a rise of at least 8*s.* per quarter during that period in the price of wheat, and that good wheat cannot at the present time be bought for less than 58*s.* to 60*s.* per quarter. This is the result of the sliding-scale, which, as we stated last week, causes the bad quality of the wheat brought to market to produce precisely the same effect on the averages as an abundant supply. Owing to the wetness of the season, some of the wheat now coming forward is a little better than food for pigs; and scarcely any of it is really good. All of it, however, enters into the averages; and thus the duty is kept up, because a large portion of the grain now on sale is scarcely fit for human food.—Liverpool Times.

NORWAY.—The people of Norway, with their legislation entirely in their own hands, without a nobility or privileged class in their Legislature, and with the power of the King limited constitutionally to a mere suspensive veto in the enactment of laws, and without any exclusive right to the sole initiative, are prosperous and thriving in a remarkable degree—that they have, by the economical measure of their Legislature, paid off their national debt, have reduced their taxes, have, notwithstanding, provided for military, naval, and civil establishments suitable to their just position in the political world; are removing gradually and judiciously, not precipitately, restrictions on the freedom of industry and trade inherited from their Danish masters; are allowing no superfluous functionaries, military, naval, or civil, Swedish or Norwegian, to batten upon the means of the industrious classes, and are evincing the most unquestionable and enlightened loyalty to the monarch to whom they have sworn allegiance, although steadily, firmly, but respectfully, exposing and denouncing his want of loyalty to the Constitution he had sworn to accept and maintain.—Lang's "Notes of a Traveller."

MISCELLANEOUS.

FLOODS IN THE NORTH.—NEWCASTLE-UPON-TYNE.—SATURDAY.—A great quantity of rain has fallen in this district within the last few days, which has swollen the rivers, and done considerable damage to property on their margins. On Thursday the rain descended in torrents all day, and yesterday the Tyne, at high water in the afternoon, overflowed its banks for several miles, covering all the low grounds near Hexham and Newburn, carrying away the corn produce of several fields in stock, and doing serious injury to the potato and turnip crops. The quay at Newcastle was covered with water, and the cellars in the neighbourhood completely inundated. During the ebb tide the current was so strong as to carry away several vessels from their moorings; and the damage done among the shipping in the harbour was very extensive. The Ocean brig was driven on the Fleet sands, and the sea is breaking over her in such a manner that it is feared she will become a total wreck. The Drach, of Yarmouth, had her mainmast carried away, and the Dove steamer lost her foremast. The mate of the Atlantic, of Shields, was killed by the breaking of a warp, and the Blossom steamer was driven against the brig John with such violence as to stove in her quarter, and she was only kept from sinking with the greatest difficulty, her funnel being also carried away. It is impossible at present to enumerate the casualties that have occurred, as the extent of damage is not yet fully ascertained. The harbour was a complete scene of confusion from the vessels adrift; several wharves were sunk, and indeed it was impossible for a small boat "to live." The police boat had a narrow escape, having just got out between two vessels, when they were driven together with great violence. A great number of bowsprits have been broken, and an immense pile of broken warps have been collected in Young's dockyard by the police, who are protecting it till claimed by the owners. The ebb-tide today has brought down large quantities of hay and corn, a cow, several sheep, and a horse, and from these indications it is apprehended the damage done in the west, of which only very partial accounts have been received here, will be very great. The Blaydon station of the Newcastle and Carlisle Railway was knee-deep in water, and the line for several miles was covered. The garden grounds about Hexham are still under water, and it is feared that the entire potato crop in those places will be destroyed.

CATTLE AND FRUIT IMPORTS INTO HULL.—We have this week received from Hamburg, by the Leeds, 30, and by the Helen Macgregor, 44 oxen. The Victoria, from Hamburg, has also landed 36 oxen and 9 cows; and the Emerald Isle, from Rotterdam, 37 cows and 50 sheep; and on Sunday last a large ox bred in Fifehire, whose dead weight is estimated at 100 stone, was landed with 40 moor sheep and 25 swine from the Martello steamer, from Leith. Upwards of 1240 baskets of plums have been landed from the Helen Macgregor, and 1800 ditto from the Leeds. The Helen brought 20 baskets and 10 boxes of apples. The Victoria brought 1150 baskets of plums, and 5 baskets and 13 cases of apples; and the Emerald Isle, from Rotterdam, 949 baskets of apples and pears, 240 casks of plums, 83 baskets of walnuts, 71 bags of filberts, and 23 baskets of pears.—Hull Advertiser.

HESSE CASSEL, SEPT. 25.—From this day the exportation of corn from the Electorate is prohibited.

NEW RAILWAY PROJECTS.—The number of new schemes, announced for the first time during the last fourteen days, is seventy-nine; and the aggregate of their estimated capital is 81,535,500*l.* We place these facts before the public, believing them to merit the serious consideration, not only of parties engaged in railway speculations, but of all men interested in the commerce and manufactures of the country.—Manchester Guardian of Saturday.

The brick-making business has been unusually brisk this season, owing to the increasing demand for building additional cotton-mills, arching tunnels, common sewers, and other public works around the city. The consumption of bricks has been greater this year than for many years past; consequently prices have advanced from 25*s.* to 35*s.* per 1000, at which price they are now sold in general. On account of drain tiles being now generally preferred and adopted for draining lands in this country, that branch of manufactures is fast increasing also. There has been a great increase in the pottery business of late. The demand for glazed ware, brown ware, and Staffordshire ware, has been unprecedentedly great in this part of the country.—Glasgow paper.

His Highness Saeid Hilal Ben Saeid, the eldest son of the Imam of Muscat, and heir apparent to the throne of that principality, has arrived in town from Arabia. The Prince visits England for the purpose of getting information regarding our government and institutions, and personally inspecting our works of art and science, with the view to their gradual introduction amongst his subjects in Arabia and East Africa.

A great meeting of the iron-masters was held at Birmingham on Thursday, when, after some discussion, it was resolved to advance the price of iron, the demand for which has become unusually great in consequence of the rapid extension of railways. The price was fixed as follows: Bar iron, 10*l.* per ton; pig iron, from 5*l.* 10*s.* to 6*l.* per ton; sheet iron, 12*l.*; and hoops, 11*l.* At Glasgow, last week, 2500 tons were purchased at 95*s.* net cash, being the then price of the day.

On Tuesday night the keenest frost of the season was experienced in this quarter. Still waters were found covered with a pretty thick coating of ice next morning, and the havoc wrought among the vegetable kingdom was very perceptible. In particular, the dahlias were cut down at once. Upon the whole, however, the past week has been favourable for the ingathering of the later harvest; and to-day the weather is beautiful, and seems set fair.—Manchester Herald.

The great Ballinasloe fair for the present year is said to be one of the best held for many a previous year. The number of sheep sold in two days amounted to 66,061. The average of the first class of wethers is stated to be 4*l.* 13*s.* In 1845, it was 2*l.* 1*s.*; in 1837, 2*l.* 1*s.* 6*d.*; in 1832, 2*l.* 1*s.*; in 1843, 2*l.* 5*s.*; in 1844, 2*l.* 7*s.* On the average, the prices exceeded those of last year about 4*s.* or 5*s.* all round.

The Dublin Evening Post alleges, on authority, it is not disposed to question that it is not the intention of her Majesty's Government to dedicate the Quit Rents of Ireland to the building and repairs of Catholic places of worship.

A farmer named Lady, at Llan-tymon, county of Denb., has just completed the sowing of the fourth crop from the same land within the year. The first was barley, and the other three, each better than the preceding one, were hay.

NATIONAL ANTI-CORN-LAW LEAGUE.

In consequence of the expiration of the period for which the building was engaged, the late Bazaar in Covent Garden Theatre terminated, leaving unsold a great number of articles of considerable value; and the Council of the League have therefore to announce, in harmony with an intimation made at the time, that a BAZAAR will open in the FREE TRADE HALL, Peter-street, MANCHESTER, on the 15th of OCTOBER for the purpose of disposing of the same.

The Interior of the Building will be converted into a TUDOR HALL, around which will be placed the various Models, Articles of Curiosity and Vertu, together with a Large Collection of Paintings.

The Bazaar will open at Eleven o'clock in the Morning of each day, and remain open till Nine in the Evening.

Admission, on Wednesday the 15th, Two Shillings and Sixpence each; on the remaining days, One Shilling.

The magnificent support received in connexion with the late demonstration, which enabled the Council to make it one of the most imposing and influential exhibitions of public feeling ever seen in the Metropolis, demands their acknowledgment, while, at the same time, it forbids their making any urgent appeal to the friends of Free Trade for support in the present instance.

They have, however, received communications from several parts of the country, from persons who have for some time past, without solicitation, been actively engaged in forwarding the interests of the present undertaking; and in courtesy to these, and to any others who may, unknown to the Council, be engaged in a similar manner, they have to add, that any contributions will be most gladly received, and will be exceedingly useful in giving variety and increased value to the collection of articles of which they are already in possession.

To those who had not an opportunity of co-operating with them on the previous occasion, the present is a suitable mode of expressing their interest in, and devotion to, a cause which time has not robbed of any of its importance.

The following classification of articles suitable for presentation has already been published, but is again subjoined:—

1. Articles usually contributed to Bazaars.
2. Articles of Manufacture, British and Foreign.
3. Models of Mechanism, &c.
4. Designs, Architectural and Fancy.
5. Specimens of Coins, Minerals, Birds, Insects, &c.
6. Books and other Publications from Authors, with Autograph.
7. Autograph Letters from celebrated Men and Women of present and former times.
8. Portraits, Pictures, and Illustrated Works.
9. Philosophical Instruments.
10. Music.
11. Original Poetry and Tales.
12. Pecuniary Contributions.

All communications to be addressed to the Chairman, 5, Newall's-buildings, Manchester, or 67, Fleet-street, London.

By order of the Council,

September 23, 1845.

GEORGE WILSON, Chairman.

CONTRIBUTIONS TO THE LEAGUE FUND.

Subscriptions received during the week ending Wednesday, Oct. 8, 1845.

N.B.—As the Subscription List is made up from Wednesday to Wednesday, contributions received on Thursdays and Fridays are not published in the LEAGUE of the Saturday immediately succeeding, but are included in the list of the week following.

LETTERS ON THE CORN LAWS, No. XLV.

TO TENANT FARMERS.

The useful and honourable occupation in which you are engaged ought to be a profitable one. A people's food-producers have a natural claim on its grateful and liberal regard. You should not be rewarded grudgingly. Nor is there any disposition in the inhabitants of this country to undervalue your toils, or to repine at your successes. They are not such fools. It is not expected by them that any body should work without pay. They know that no stuffs are so needful as bread-stuffs. They sing "Speed the plough" for their own sakes. They are also ready to admire the triumphs of industry; they like to see it rising to wealth and station; the gratification is certainly not diminished by the intimate connection of such success with their own means of sustenance; and some strange disturbing force must intervene before the sight of fortunes made by farming is otherwise than a pleasure to the public.

In the natural course of things, you are, then, the objects of sympathy and respect. Your toils are associated with our enjoyments. The more you work, the better we fare. And there is a further bias in your favour. Your occupation, in itself, is alien from tricks of trade. It seems remote from the gambling and over-reaching of which commerce is accused in some of its operations. You labour with nature's materials. The fertile earth is your factory. You live in the eye of heaven. What you realise is the meed of skill and patience, and not the lottery-prize of daring speculation. With you, more than in almost any other mode of life, is merit the measure of success. Your lot should be a safe and happy one; alike desirable in itself, and in its social relations and estimation. I need not ask whether you find it so. But if it differ widely from this pleasant picture, you may be wise in asking yourselves how it so happens?

Do not commit so egregious a blunder as to say that manufacturers are malignant, and the League a contrivance for holding you up to hatred. There is no innate aversion to agriculture in human nature for declamatory breath to fan into a flame. There is no popular hostility to you or your interests. Your injury is nobody's good. Your ruin would be nobody's riches. Every tradesman and manufacturer in the kingdom would rather have you as a thriving than as a bankrupt class of customers. There is no old nurse's tale of ghost, hobgoblin, or old bogie more preposterous than the spectre sometimes raised in broad daylight at your meetings, of manufacturing animosity towards native agriculture.

The great secret of what is most uncomfortable in your position is this: you have been led to identify yourselves with a law alike unjust, pernicious, and obnoxious. By your support of the Corn Laws, you assume a character not less odious than that of the farmer is naturally popular. You present yourselves to the public not only as cultivators of the soil, but as leviators of taxation. While the supply of our wants is augmented by your land, it is diminished by your law. Your honest labour tends to fill the belly—your dishonest legislation to plunder the pocket. In the one capacity, you are the producers of natural plenty; and in the other, of artificial scarcity. You make with the right hand, and mar with the left. This causes you to appear as starvers, when you should only be seen as feeders. Those who would bless you for the loaf, only curse you for its littleness or its cost. And what has this monopolist identification done for you? Have you reaped a money reward for the iniquity? Has any one of successive Corn Laws made you proportionately successful? Has any one been true to the promises of its proposers? Has any one shielded you from distress and suffering? You know that, as to your profits, all have been deceptive. Under eminent "protection," your trade has become pre-eminently bad. Many of you are paying rent out of capital, instead of realising profits to purchase the fee-simple of your farms. Under Corn Law legislation, your brief glimpses of prosperity have been times of national calamity. You have been an alienated class, whose joys were the measure of others' sorrow, and your sorrow of their joy. Your thriving has been the signal of tumult; and your sliding-scale has commissioners of bankruptcy at one end, and incendiary paupers at the other.

You have sold yourselves to monopoly for nothing. The production of food cannot become a permanently unprofitable occupation, if law does but let it alone. You are sure of the demand. Famine will never be a fashion. Could you grow counties as well as corn, a new county every year would only supply the increase of our population. Consumption is competitive, and the consumers can pay you, if the law allows them to work for the world. And you lend yourselves to their hindrance, for fear the world should sometimes pay them with a peck of corn, which you fancy would leave as much of your own unsold. You don't know your customers. A nation's appetite is not easily gauged. With double our consumption of corn, it would not cry, "hold, enough." There are the five millions of potato people to come in yet. There is a market for you! Only let the restrictions come down. Free trade would then raise crops of consumers; a golden harvest for you. The foreigner must be a clever fellow to feed them cheaper than you can. Who fears lest he should clothe them cheaper? The unprotected cotton or cloth manufacturer hires his factory as you hire a farm. He needs a building wherein to spin his yarn, as you need land whereon to grow your wheat. He calculates prices and profits; and you must do the same. He will not run the risk of being turned out at the year's end, nor should you. He will not have his hands tied up to prescribed processes, nor should you. He will not engage for a rent estimated by the prices at which cottons are valued in Acts of Parliament; nor should you be guided by a Parliamentary price of corn. Calculate, as he does, by the world's market; measure your rent by your means; find your true and honest position; and neither ships, colonies, nor commerce will render the plough unprofitable.

The great fault finding with you, of late, comes not from the League, but from the landlords. Agricultural meetings have become a continual reprimand. One noble president scolds your short horns, and another your high hedges. One says the plough is badly driven, and another that the field is badly drained. My Lord This twits your neglect of guano, and my Lord That is not satisfied with the application of your home-made manure. In every landlord you meet a lecturer. They are as unsparing with you as Mrs. Caudle with her spouse. And you cannot sleep it off. It comes round with the next cattle show. My Lord Stanley does not deign to look at your prize ox, but he deals you hard knocks. He says, it is your "duty" to feed the population. How stomach you these ethics? How like you to be stuck up, in sight of the League and all the world, like a dunce at school, with a fool's cap on your head, to be lectured on the laws of farming by rent-receiving lords? And what does it all mean? Simply this: that by increased exertion and outlay you are to stave off the repeal of a monopoly, the profits of which never rest with you, but pass over into the pockets of the proprietary. The conductors of no other sort of business are talked to in this way by their landlords. They would speedily be told to mind their own concerns, take their due, and hold their tongues. You can afford to be as independent as other people, when corn sells at its natural price, and the outlay of capital has the security of a lease. If improvement have advanced less rapidly in your occupation than in others, the fault is in the factitious system created by your law-making landlords. They may be hereditary legislators, but they are not hereditary ploughmen. The science and practice of cultivating the soil are not instinctive in its owners. When estates are purchased, agricultural knowledge is not thrown in to better the bargain. All this interference, insolent even when it is not ignorant, if it be uncalled for, is only a galvanized kicking of monopoly against Free Trade. Farming will elicit skill, energy, and enterprise, when it repays them. Men need no admonition to make the most of their time and money. Give you fair play and equable prices, and you will work your own way, without all this badgering. Profit is the best premium for a well-cultivated farm. You will learn all you want of the mechanical powers, when free from the annual turning of the machinery of the rent-screw. Are you not too old for leading-strings? Must baby be petted and patted, to be good when it wears top-boots? Every other British class is proud of defying the world's competition. All that any of them claim is a fair field and no favour. So would it be with agriculture, left to itself. It would thrive amongst the sturdiest. But it is disgraced and crippled by this legislative juggling, which, under the name of "Protection," makes a tool of the farmer and a prey of the consumer.

A NORWICH WEAVER BOY.

LETTER FROM ANDOVER.

ABOUT PAUPERS AND CONVICTS.

Andover! The very name of this place must be to the public by this time like a well-picked bone; a bone which, falling to the daily newspapers at a season of scarcity and dearth of news, has been snapped up—The Times carrying it off for its own use, to gnaw it in its own corner, and growl over it as it gnaws—a bone which is now so bare, so old, so emptied of its marrow, a disagreeable bone of contention from the first, that even a pauper in the workhouse would hardly gnaw it.

Still, I think it possible that the "dailies," keenscented as they are, eager and industrious as they have been here, may have overlooked some little morsels of fact, which a "weekly" may take up and turn to a useful purpose.

The name of Mr. Hugh Munday, of Down-farm, has been frequently mentioned in connection with the Poor Law inquiry at Andover. It was his petition to Parliament, praying for an inquiry into the allegation which he set forth, that the dietary was so low in the workhouse, as to starve down the paupers to the necessity of eating the rotten gristle off the bones, which they got to break for manure, that led to the recent inquiry after much delay, much cavilling, and some attempts on the part of the Poor Law Commissioners to wriggle out of it. Personally, Mr. Munday has taken no active share in promoting the charges against the late master of the union. These charges have been taken up as secondary thoughts, but promoted and proved so far as they have been proved as primary objects by other parties. Some of the parties may have been very honest, very pure, very humane in their motives; but if so, I must confess that so far as I can see, the honesty, the purity, the humanity, seem sadly obscured by personal ill-feeling, political partizanship (aye, even political hatred, strange as it may seem), and by a rather large amount of that cowardice which affects the bravo to hound on the public indignation against one man's deeds, that it and its own misdeeds may escape. The honesty, purity, and humanity of the promoters of the charges against Macdougall, the late master of the workhouse, have been sadly clouded by such moral impurities as these; and also by the fact that some of the persons who gave evidence against him on the score of immoral character, and others who did not give evidence against him personally, but who worked hard behind the scenes to get up damning evidence, ransacking the memories of themselves and neighbours over a period of nine years for everything that would tell against the man whom they once called friend; making friends of paupers, and of persons who had been paupers, and had always been odious to their new friends of to-day, and scornfully kept at a distance because they were paupers—prompting these persons, cramming them with stories which they were to remember the dates of, but which they could not remember the years of, when they came to be sworn—I say the fact of such opponents of Macdougall being now candidates for his vacant situation, throws an additional cloud over the alleged purity and humanity of their motives, in getting him removed from his situation.

It has always seemed to me a grievous error in the national economy to shut people up within workhouse walls because they sought employment, and could not get it, and that in a country whose soil has treasures buried and wasted in it for the want of labour—a grievous error in moral economy to think of making the idle industrious by shutting them up where they have no useful thing to do, and where they can learn, and feel, and understand nothing but how to hate their fellow-men. It has always seemed to me a grievous error to deny out-door relief to families in temporary distress, whereby they are compelled to undergo the most cruel privations, or submit to break up their little homes, sell off their furniture (their houses and gardens it may be, as in the parish of Heysham, in Sussex, and in numerous other parishes), and become thorough, confirmed, irredeemable paupers. To me it has seemed cruel, terribly cruel, to take the aged and infirm from the cottages they have laboured to keep above their heads, and which they have sanctified with their affections, and shut them up in the workhouses, drilling them in their old days under the discipline of a barrack-yard, conducted by some non-commissioned officer of the army, whose fitness for keeping the workhouse in order is estimated by his success on the drill-ground and in the barrack-yard over a long period of years (Macdougall's service in the Royal Horse Artillery was 30 years, 27 of which he was a non-commissioned officer, and five of which regimental serjeant-major); terribly cruel to break up "the old house at home" of an old couple whose eyes see "home" written in every corner of it, in every crevice of the walls, whose affections rest upon the old stools where their young babies sat, on the old table where many ascanty, yet many a happy frugal meal was eaten; to part them from all and from each other, and drill them in their old days into military habits, under military men, as if they were young recruits! The impolicy of shutting up the able-bodied who cannot get work outside, compelling them to do worthless, profitless, filthy work inside, merely to punish them, is only surpassed in enormity by this cruel treatment of the aged and infirm, whose helplessness only compels them to submit. All others leave the workhouse walls as soon as they can. They only leave to go to their graves. And to put the deeper shame on age and poverty, most workhouses present them with graves within the walls, as prisons do to the most felonious of criminals. All, save the aged and infirm, and the incapable of acting for themselves, can escape, and do escape, from the stupid punishment of the workhouses. They escape to kill game, steal sheep, rob hen-roosts—to do anything, to take any chance rather than be punished in the workhouse for seeking parish relief; they escape from the dietary of the unions to the better fare of the prisons and the hulks, and the better fed convict gangs of the Bermudas, Gibraltar, and New South Wales; but the old—the venerable fathers and mothers of the villages, cannot escape, save into their graves; and, that even the hope of the grave may not be too comfortable to them in the imprisonment of their old age, they have the certainty placed before them that since they are such vile creatures as to be old and poor, they will not be buried in the old churchyard with their kindred, but will be consigned to pauper's ground.

Say the best that can be said for the workhouse system, and even then there is a frightful balance of ignorance of human nature, irrational efforts to reform the idly disposed, and of cruel irreverence for the holiest affections of mankind left in it.

Strange, that in an age that boastfully calls itself the nineteenth century, and boasts of reforming its criminal code, of banishing the criminal code; of banishing the birch from its schools; of working upon mind rather than upon matter; on hopes rather than fears—an age in which even the cruelties of naval and military discipline are relaxed and amended; and which promises at no distant period to abolish capital punishments in obedience to the progressive cry of charity and peace, and tolerant rationality instead of intolerant barbarism: strange, that in this age called the nineteenth century, and in this country called England, a systematic code of punishment for the aged, the infirm, and the unfortunate should for the first time in the world's history be adopted and rigorously applied.

And the strangeness of the fact does not seem less when we call to mind that many of those public men who have been foremost—most sincerely and earnestly in the front, as I believe—in softening the rigours of the criminal code, for the better reformation of criminals, and in advocating a more comprehensive and rational system of education for the young, that they may be led and induced to imbibe education as a pleasure, ceasing to be treated as ill-used brute-beasts, and beginning to be treated as rational beings,—that such moral reformers should at the same time be foremost in making industry compulsive, not by leading the idle to work, but by driving them in one common herd, idle, unfortunate, aged, infirm, and sick, as the worst-used of brute-beasts are driven, to compel them to work or die quickly at little expense. Strange that men, foremost in civilising and humanising and leading on the moral armies of the nineteenth century, conquering old prejudices and old barbarities, should turn back to use cruelty and coercion in the rear of their moral army, upon the aged, the infirm, and unfortunate—upon the helpless, who in all ages and countries, the most ignorant and barbarous, have been spared and protected.

This is no idle sentimentalism: it is but a feeble expression of what I have found during the last three years in my travels through almost every parish (two or three unions excepted) in the south and south-west of England.

I have said that Mr. Hugh Munday originated this inquiry by a petition to Parliament. The inquiry had thus a respectability of birth which gave it a higher character throughout with those who know Mr. Munday than it might otherwise have had. He is a practically liberal man. I paid a visit one day to Down Farm, and found, nestled among some trees on the left-hand side of the Basingstoke-road, between two and three miles from Andover, Mr. Munday's residence. He at one time, after succeeding his father, had 1800 acres of land in occupation. As his brothers grew to manhood, and got married, and needed farms, he parted the land with them. He occupies now, I think, about 500 acres, quite enough for one management, and has yielded up the parental house, with the best portions of the farm, to his brothers, he being a bachelor, betaking himself to a smaller house; also to the worst portion of the land. This is mentioned to show that the gentleman whose genuine humanity led him to interfere in behalf of the famine-stricken paupers, has kindly feelings in him for other uses, and at other times, than to be exhibited for holiday show.

I found his work-people more comfortably provided for than is common on many other farms. But what pleased me still more, I found them greater in number, in proportion to the acres, than on most other farms; and Mr. Munday answered me that all the progress he had made towards this increase of employment on his farm had been attended with additional profit. He does not believe that his agriculture is by any means perfect; he expects to advance; but, as he now stands, he is far enough to say, that if all farmers employed as many hands as he does on the same number of acres, there would not be an idle hand in Hampshire, nor in rural England. And if every employer encouraged and assisted his work-people, as he does, to feed pigs, keep bees, grow their vegetables, and live regularly, soberly, and be industrious, there would be no need—at least less need—to ask relief from the poor-rates at times of sickness and temporary distress.

Walking in the garden and orchard behind his house, I observed a row of beehives, five-and-twenty in number I think, and made the remark to him that he had a goodly share of them. He said they were not his; they belonged to two of his work-people, who had not a convenient place for so many elsewhere; and he had invited them, as he kept no bees himself, and had a good garden, to put them there. The bees belonging to these two persons produced 12*l.* last year, being 6*l.* each; a small matter to people whose honey and money are always overflowing, but a great matter to agricultural labourers.

The current wages are 9*s.*, 10*s.*, and 11*s.* a week; but with such employers as Mr. Munday, other advantages, some of them not to be estimated by money—I mean the moral advantages of being always cared for—are additional to the current rate of wages.

It being on a Friday when I was at Down Farm, I observed that Mr. Munday had established the good and convenient custom of paying his work-people on Fridays.

The readers of this paper know that it is an axiom with Mr. Cobden to say, "Show me a good farmer; a man cultivating better than his neighbours, and I will show you a man not afraid to part with protection." Such a man is Mr. Munday. He is not a political man; and, I believe, neither an orator in practice nor in ambition; but being at Winchester on the occasion of Mr. Cobden and Mr. Bright's well-known visit to that city, he was asked, as a tenant farmer of Hampshire, to take a part in the proceedings. He consented, and proposed and supported a resolution to the effect that the Corn Laws had been of no benefit to the farmers, and that agriculture and the agricultural labourers would have been in a better condition than they ever have been in, had there been no Corn Laws.

Being at Winchester the other day, I returned to Andover—the regular distance being about 11 miles—by way of Sutton Scotney, which made the distance four miles farther. Sutton Scotney is a goodly-sized village—a thousand people in it, or thereabout. It has the village of Newton, in which parish it stands, half-a-mile eastward, and Barton Stacey, a parochial village, a mile westward. It was in these villages conjointly that the Swing riots of 1830 first began. Several persons belonging to them were convicted and transported, and one hanged. One of those who had been sentenced to seven years' transportation, but got off with two years' imprisonment at Portsmouth, was mentioned to me, and I sent for him, and drew him into familiar conversation. His account was to the following effect:

"My name? my name be's Joseph Carter. Ees, I had seven year on't for them mobs; but they let me off with imprisonment at the hulks for two years and one day. That was the exact time. The way I got off was this: they found out when they put me to school there that I never could read none; no reading nor writing. I never had a book put afore me never in my life, not as I minds on, till I went aboard ship a prisoner to serve my seven year at Portsmouth. I wish I had ha' served my seven year. They would ha' made me a scholar by this time. They learned me to read the Testament a bit; but did not make me much of a scholar, 'cause, why you see, I wor only but two year and a day there. But they finding out as how I had never been no scholar, they knew it could not have been I, as Old Barrowman called in to see if it wor a good ten-pound note. That old Barrowman was the father of young Barrowman as was hanged. The old one was transported. Both they were from Barton Stacey.

"Well, about the ten-pound note, it was in this here way. The mob goes up to Mr. Callander—he is Sir Thomas Baring's steward—and they said they must have money, or they would do mischief. Well, he said, don't do mischief, come in with me, and I will give you money. Old Barrowman went in to get the money; but he could not read a word of figures or writing, and he did not know if it were a good note. So he comes out and gets another man to go in with him, to see if the note were a good one. Mack was the man who went in. He be here now, and everybody knows he wor the man as went in. But he be a tall man like myself; and i' faith, somebody swore it wor me; and they took me. But when they found I wor no scholar, they believed it might not be me.

"Oh, ees, ees, I wor with them. But then, everybody was forced like to go. There was no denying. I be an old man now. I was not young then. It was the young men as did it. They worked, you see, for little wages, as they do now. They suffers most. They get but 4s., and 4s. 6d., and 5s., and one or two may get 5s. 6d. a week. At that time the married men got 9s. and 10s. a week. But it was the young men as led the others and forced them into it. I was took afore Squire Wickham and the other gentlemen, for the squire to show as how I had no business to be mobbing. I was a hurdle maker and thatcher, and jobbed at hedging. The squire showed as how I got 64l. a year from him for work of that kind for seven years. But then he did not show that I had most times a man to help me, and two women besides at times. He did not show that. I paid as much as 20l. some years, for helpers. Oh, I did not say I paid the money away that way, because they would ha' thought I complained, and would ha' taken that as guilty of going out to mob. I said that I wor forced out agin' my will. And so I wor.

"But you see, I wor at the meeting across the street there, in that corner house, the night as Joe Mason read the letter to us all, that came from Overton. There was no name to the letter. But Joe said he knowed who it came from. Joe was a good scholar. The letter, I know came from old D——'s; he be dead; and it came out of Newton; never came from Overton. It said we was all to leave off work; and the Sutton men was to go out and stop the ploughs. They was to send home the horses for the farmers to look after them themselves; and was to take the men with them. And they was to go and turn the men out of the barns. And they was all to do and break the 'sheens' as the farmers had got to do the threshing. That was what they was to do. They ha' got three sheens now in this place, now at this very time; and one farmer borrows one; and them four sheens does the work of eight men. They be a doin' of that in Sutton at this moment; and men be again doing nothin'.

"Well; about the letter. Joe Mason read it. We did not then know who it came from. But we knows, all on us now in this here place, that old D——'s had a hand in't. He was a great friend of Mr. Cobbett. He used to write to Mr. Cobbett. He never got into no trouble about it. He was too good a manager to get other people into trouble to get in himself. No; I do not blame this on Mr. Cobbett. I mean old D——'s, the shoemaker. Mr. Cobbett was a good master. I ha' nothing to say agin' he. I lived with him at Botley, and would never wish to serve a better master.

"About the letter; well, it was this: I was there at the reading on't, and that came all out, and you see that went agin' me. And then some of them told as how that I carried the money; and, eed, you see that was true. Joe Mason was by far the best scholar, but they would not trust Joe with the money; nor yet old Barrowman. They said I wor honest, and they gave it to me to carry. I had 40l. at one time,—40l., every shilling. Some people ha' told me since that I should ha' gone off with it. I did think of doing that once. The coach came by when we was up on the London road, and it did come into my head to get on the coach, and get away from the whole business, with the 40l. But I thought about leaving my wife behind, and about what a vagabond they would all call me, and the coach was soon past. I never had another chance. But had I ha' knowed I was to be tried, and sentenced to be transported, I'd ha' got up on the coach.

"I needn't ha' been tried at all. They came to me times and times after I was in Winchester gaol, to get me to speak against the two Masons. They offered to let me clear, if I would only tell what I knowed agin' them. Had I told what I knowed, they'd ha' been hung, as sure as Barrowman, and Cooke, and Cooper, was hung. I was took out with the other prisoners to see they hung. They tried to frighten us by it to tell all we knowed on one another. But I wouldn't split. So the Masons' was only transported, and they transported me, too.

"Ees; the mob took me agin' my will; but then that wa' enough to make me split, 'cause, you see, I staid with them. They took many a man agin' his will. They took Harry Mills, of Barton Stacey, and carried him a mile and a half. Harry Mills be alive now. He wor yesterday. I seed him in this here place. He have a pension of 1s. a-day, he have. He were in the 63rd regiment, and stood guard over Bonaparte at St. Helena. The mob carried Harry Mills a mile and a half, and forced him to go with them. It wor the young fellows did it. The worst on them never got nothing done to them. Some of those as got most done to them, some as got hanged, never did half so much as some I knows on in this here parish."

"Were you ever in a workhouse?"

"Was I ever in a workhouse? No, thank God, I never did no harm to be put in workhouse."

"But I do not mean a prison; you have been in a prison. I mean a union workhouse; were you ever an inmate of the union?"

"No; I never did nothing to be sent to the union."

"Do you mean by that answer that they send people to the union as a place of punishment?"

"I don't know, I ha'n't been in; but I hear tell it be a terrible place; and I knows this, that if a man does not please his master here with his work, the master says he'll be d—d but he'll send him to the union. An' if a man seeks more wages, and the master ben't willing to give more, and the man say he can't live on what he be getting, the master says 'D—n ye; I'll send thee to the union; see how ye like that!' No, I never was in the union myself; hope I never shall be so bad as ha' to go."

"What kind of food had you on board the hulk at Portsmouth the two years and a day you were there?"

"Why, Sir, not always good alike; and not always bad alike. The bread was mostly always bad, 'cause one man, who had great favour, had the contract all the time I was there. The butchers took the contract for six months; and there was a great deal of difference in one six months from another six months, according as to who might have the contract. The worst on't was better than I can get now in Sutton Scotney. I do not mean but there be's good meat to be got in Sutton by them as have money; but it ben't no working man like me as can get it. I wish I had as much meat now as I had in the hulk; and I wishes the same to every poor hard working man in Hampshire.

"The allowance we had, Sir, was this:—We had 4 oz. of biscuit a day—the best of biscuit. The bread was 1 lb.; it was black, and not good. We had oatmeal too, and pea soup; and we had garden vegetables that we bought with the money we worked for. We had 14 oz. of meat each time, four times a week; one six months the meat was beautiful. That man gave always good meat when he had the contract. We had plenty of victuals. The only thing was the bread. I wishes every poor, hard-working man in this here parish were as well fed with meat, and myself with them, as I wor in the hulk."

"Oh, Sir, you are very kind. You need not say you are sorry to have troubled me. A man once came from Winchester and took down in writing, like you, all I had to say. He was a shoemaker, somebody told me. I do not know his name, but he said he was going to make a history of the mobs. I never heard no more of him."

"Oh yes, Sir, you are welcome to know all as I know; but to tell you the truth, I thought, at first, when you sent for me, it was about that old horse. You see I was to pay one shilling a week, and that for 26 weeks, and it only lived a month. So they want to make me pay the whole price for it. I thought it was about that, and I was rather afeard. But I ben't the least afeard now."

So much for a Hampshire peasant in the year 1845.

ONE WHO HAS WHISTLED AT THE PLOUGH.

ATHENS, SEPT. 20.—A Russian ukase has just been published here, which has caused great sensation. It is to the effect that vessels belonging to Powers having no commercial treaties with Russia will have to pay an immense duty on entering her ports in the Black Sea. Now Greece has no treaty with Russia, and all her trade is with the Black Sea. Several Greek merchants and proprietors of vessels are seriously thinking of quitting Greece (and becoming Russian subjects) for Odessa and Taganrog; the third article of the enforced on Greek vessels, would ruin them:—"Foreign vessels to pay a silver rouble per last, import and export duty." It is, however, also stated that this is to last until the reasons for which it is imposed are removed.—Times.

AGRICULTURE.

PRIZE FARMING.

DO FARMERS REQUIRE TO BE DANDLED?

We have for some years watched attentively the proceedings of "agricultural associations," not because they have been of much value to practical farmers, but because they have afforded indication of the current of landlord-opinion. Now the landlords, as a class, have exercised great and usually most pernicious influence upon agriculture; and these societies being occasionally their toys, and sometimes their political engines, the after-dinner talk affords a clue to the policy of the landocracy. There was a time when it was grievous to see the monstrous and mischievous errors palmed off upon the farmers; and there have been times when the ludicrous so strongly predominated, that the malicious intent of the "protectionist" squires was almost overlooked. But a new sensation has been excited by the speeches of many of the landed grandees at the agricultural meetings of the present autumn; namely, one of absolute nausea. To hear a dull lord, or an ignorant squire, abuse the League, or denounce the Prime Minister, was tolerable; for one might hope that in the midst of passionate vituperation some glimmerings of intellect would be elicited. But the complacent, self-sufficient twaddle wherewith the aered magnates have entertained (!) their tenantry during the present season is literally hopeless. It is unmitigated stupidity. That active, intelligent men of business, such as the best of the tenant-farmers of England are, should feel compelled by their position to listen with apparent patience to such stuff is truly lamentable. There are, however, two sources of consolation to be derived from this monopolist drivel; first, that it amounts to a plea of guilty to all the charges of impeding agriculture we and others have made against the landlords; secondly, that it is exciting deep and universal disgust in the minds of the tenant-farmers.

In this country, men are too apt to bow down instinctively to an estate of so many thousand acres, or to a rent-roll of five or six figures, whether the possessor of such advantages be a man or a monkey. But we should like each solemn twaddler to hear his pompous inanities freely discussed at the market-tables the succeeding week. We doubt whether even squirearchical complacency could afterwards venture on another exhibition.

We cannot pretend to give our readers one-half of the sayings at these meetings which bear out our remarks, but we shall offer them a few, and they must judge of the sack by the sample.

It should seem that the first qualification for the Presidency of an agricultural society is to know nothing of agriculture. Thus, at the "East Norfolk Agricultural Association," the Earl of Orford, who presided at the dinner, said, "I blush to confess that I do not know the A B C of farming;" yet "no one was more deeply imbued with the necessity, or more intent upon the means of encouraging it," than his lordship; and his avowed ignorance did not prevent his lordship from delivering a long string of generalities on Norfolk farming. All this has since been much laughed at by the farmers present. So Lord Hastings said, "I did not see that improvement in the stock exhibited to-day which might have been expected after the existence of the association for four years." This was, perhaps, a just reproof; but let us tell his lordship what a first-rate judge of stock said in answer to an inquiry about his lordship's cattle. "Lord Hastings has some well-bred animals, but they are sadly underfed." And we believe that as a rule the stock of enterprising tenant-farmers is far better kept than that of landlord-farmers. And the reason obviously is, that the farmer feeds for profit, the gentleman for fancy or "example."

Later in the evening, Lord Orford stumbled upon the following praise of "competition," which has a wider application than he probably intended:

"That in bringing together such meetings, COMPETITION WAS THE SURFEST BASIS OF THEIR SUCCESS, and without that they might consider their own beasts very good, continuing to pursue the same plodding career since 1745. He thought that COMPETITION WAS OF ALL THINGS THE MOST DESIRABLE, and the more they amalgamated with strangers, who were better informed than themselves, the better would it be for the country."

No doubt that competition is the grand stimulus to success in farming as in other businesses; but then the farmer wants to be free from landlord-created trammels.

Foremost amongst the lordly twaddlers stands the Duke of Norfolk, who at the "Arundel and Bramber Association" thus poured out his not very gentle dullness:

"He was aware, and he thought proper to state it, and he stated it fearlessly, that since he had come into possession of this property, he had dealt hardly, and brought forward rules, and desired his tenantry to improve their farms in certain ways."

His grace's passion seems to be for "neat hedges:"

"He asked of no one more than was asked of the tenants of other great estates, and he should require it of them. He prided himself on those farms where there was a neat hedge-row. If they went into Norfolk and Suffolk, they saw every farm had neat hedge-rows, but that was completely neglected in this part of the country. He was sure that any tenant of his, or of any other person, if they had been recommended to keep up their fences, would have done it, but now he was under the disagreeable necessity of begging them to do it. Indeed it was a disgrace to them all, to them and to him, and to those who looked after them, that the fences were not in a very good condition. Of those who came into this country, who did not say, 'What a dreadful state their fences were in?'"

We do not yield to the sapient Duke of Norfolk himself in our respect for a "neat hedge-row," when it is an indication, as it commonly is, of good farming; but dictatorially to insist on the yearly tenants of the heavy undrained soils of Sussex trimming their hedges lest the rude hedgerows should be a disgrace "to them," to their ducal landlord, and "to those who look after them," is simply absurd. A neat hedgerow thus enforced is about as much evidence of good farming as the smart livery-coat on his grace's footman is proof of the lacquey's taste. Both are merely badges, marking the ownership of his grace of Norfolk. And who "looks after them?" Is it the steward or the nursery-maid? the butler or the gamekeeper? His grace "regretted seeing so small a number of farmers" at the meeting, and "that so small a number of cattle were shown for prizes." And he admitted that "it required a stout heart to go on with this institution." We do not wonder at the ducal bile being excited by the fact that only two farmers competed for a prize of 50*l.* he had offered.

"They would remember that this time last year he proposed a premium of 50*l.* to the farmer who employed the greatest number of labourers. That he did, that they might have a greater number of labourers employed; and then he proposed another, for the best-cultivated farm, and several of his friends were kind enough to make out the sum of 50*l.* for that also. He regretted exceedingly that there were only these very few candidates for these prizes. He regretted that the number was not five times as great, because that would have shown some enterprise and spirit."

What a notion of enterprise and spirit his grace of Norfolk must have! He seems never to have outgrown that intellectual stature when the first prize for nonsense-verses might have been a laudable object of his ambition. But let us tell his grace, in confidence, that the common people who rent farms really do outgrow their boyhood somewhere about the age of 21. But his grace very properly resolved no longer to cast his pearls before—the Sussex farmers:

"Finding there was this want of competition, he must withdraw his premiums this year. If he had found there had been anything like competition, he would have gone on with it, but he must withdraw it."

Weep, farmers of Sussex, weep! Mourn "Arundel and Bramber," in sackcloth and ashes; the two prizes of 50*l.* each for the farmer who employs most labourers, and for the best cultivated farm, offered by the Duke of Norfolk, are withdrawn! Adieu all hope of competing with Norfolk and Suffolk. Even cut hedges will be visible only where the farmers are well "looked after." His grace then went mauling on about the "drinking," "rick-making" and miserable drilling of the district, to correct which, nothing daunted by former failures, he proposed to offer prizes of 2*l.* and 1*l.* We suppose his grace imagines that by diminishing the amount of his prizes he will increase the "spirit and enterprise" of competitors. Really such nonsense, addressed to grown men as an inducement to them to follow with spirit the business upon which the livelihood of themselves and their families is dependent, and in which they have probably embarked every farthing they possess, is worse than ridiculous—it is childish trifling. If the Duke of Norfolk and others of his class really wish to promote the employment of "the greatest number of labourers," and the good cultivation of farms, we can offer him a simple and certain plan for effecting his object; let him grant 21 years' leases, unencumbered with reservations and restrictions beyond such as may be necessary to secure the regular payment of rent. The duke will then find no lack of candidates. We could quote much more from his grace's talk of equal value; but, like an over-dose of James's powders, its very tastelessness produces nausea.

At the Wokingham Agricultural Association, Sir John Conroy, having quitted his "public duties" in the antechamber of a palace, and "pitched his tent amongst them as a farmer—he hoped in time to be a practical farmer"—was, of course, called upon to preside. His ignorance of farming seemed to be of that perfect kind as to fit him exactly for the post. It is fair to Sir John, however, to say, that his theory of farming is more hopeful than the Duke of Norfolk's; for instead of limiting his aspirations to cut hedges, well-trimmed ricks, and straight drills, he said "he had no doubt that as he went for double produce he should be successful;" and that he looked for "remuneration from plenty, not from scarcity." Let him follow out this, and he won't go far wrong.

Lord Barrington, one of the county members, after stating also that "he was not a practical farmer," launched into a long and minute disquisition "on sowing or dibbling of wheat," which was literally "a tale without an end," for "it [the said wheat] would not be thrashed until the spring, and consequently he was not able to tell the result." How wonderfully the practical farmer must profit by such intellectual communings with his county member! Again, we have Lord Stanley at the Liverpool meeting lecturing the farmers in his off-hand and haughty style on the way in which they should benefit by the assistance afforded by their landlords.

"He saw, with satisfaction, landlord and tenant co-operating together to improve the agriculture of this county; and unless the landlords did so co-operate and combine, he was satisfied it was not reasonable to expect improvement from the farming and agricultural population of the country. (Hear, hear.) When landlords did come forward and lend their assistance, they had a right to expect that the tenants should go hand and hand with them. They had a right to expect that assistance given by the landlord was not an excuse for slovenly conduct to the farmers."

And his Lordship referred to the increasing population, the necessity "for fresh exertions and renewed applications of capital, science, and skill." We wonder whether it ever occurred to his imperious lordship that the shortest road to agricultural improvement would be to make the farmers independent?

And it is remarkable, that the only gentleman whose farming has been mentioned at any of these meetings with unqualified approbation, is Mr. W. Marshall, M.P., for Carlisle, one of the well-known firm of Marshall and Co., of Leeds. At the Penrith Association, the chairman, in giving Mr. Marshall's health, said—

"He did not know any man amongst those of his friends, in that part of the world, whose opinion on farming matters he would sooner take than that of Mr. Marshall. (Applause.) He had given his mind to agriculture, and had improved his land in a spirited way, worthy of imitation. He only wished that all Members of Parliament would do the same."

In a subsequent part of the evening, the Free Trader, Mr. Marshall, added his testimony to that of the monopolist, Mr. Wames, that British farmers might profitably cultivate the unprotected article, flax.

Mr. Marshall said—

"He went over this year to Belgium, with his brother, to observe the cultivation of flax. In that country it gave the farmer the greatest profit, and the finest flax was produced. The result of their observations was, that there was no doubt but the introduction of the cultivation of flax on a large scale into England would come on rapidly."

This, from the largest consumer of flax in this country, is an important testimony. Such a practical suggestion is, however, a mere drop of sense in the ocean of nonsense which the reports of these meetings afford; and we suspect that the greater part of the agricultural associations will soon become extinct, unless the farmers themselves take them up. At present, except perhaps as mere cattle shows, the farmers, as a body, regard them with mighty small respect.

FARMERS HEED THE VOICE OF ONE OF YOURSELVES.

At the recent meeting of the South Beds and North Herts Agricultural Association, Mr. C. H. Lattimore was called upon by the unanimous voice of the company, to respond to the toast of the "Labourers."

And who could so fitly respond to the toast as one of the most intelligent employers of rural labour in the kingdom—whose example, if followed, would not leave an unemployed peasant throughout the land? We extract from the Hertford Mercury some of the passages in Mr. Lattimore's speech, which was a most telling one. He first referred to the practical character of the meeting, and said:

"He had always been of opinion that at gatherings of this kind they ought to discuss fully and fairly all matters relating to the interests of the farmer and of agriculture generally. (Hear, and cheers.) He believed that candour—open, manly candour—and the full expression of the farmers' sentiments on these occasions, would be better than that secret fires should be allowed to lurk and smoulder in their breasts. He was of opinion that it was better to discuss what they believed to be their grievances, and thus get rid of the danger, than that they should suffer from concealed injuries, whether those injuries were imagined or real."

He then alluded to the circumstance of the manufacturers of Luton being the chief givers of funds for agricultural prizes, and he thanked them for the kindly spirit it indicated:

"But he was jealous for the honour of his own class; he felt and he hoped the agriculturists generally would feel also, that the necessity for this assistance ought not to exist. If one class was in want of encouragement, and another class was able to give it, this was an indication that the class which could afford to give aid was in a more prosperous condition than that which required to receive it; and then they came to the question, 'How is it that agriculture is not carried on with the same spirit and success as manufactures?' The simple answer was, that the manufacturing class felt that they were working for themselves, while the agriculturists, at least the tenant-at-will farmers did not feel certain on that point; they did not feel certain that the improvements they might make would be to their own advantage, or that they would not ultimately be called upon to pay, in the shape of increased rent, a premium on the improvements which had been effected by their own skill, their own labour, and their own capital. (Hear, hear, and loud cheers.) That was one reason why the agriculturists did not evince the same spirit, and did not realise the same success as the manufacturers."

Mr. Lattimore then brought out the sentiments of the meeting, when he added:

"Then, who were the gentlemen who took away the prizes on these occasions? Those who had the most capital on their land. (A cry of 'No!') He did not say in all cases; but the prizes taken were generally by those who held leases, and who thus had security for the expenditure of their capital. (Cheers, and a cry of 'That's better.') The great evil in connection with the cultivation of the land was the want of capital. The manufacturers who had raised the town of Luton, in which they were then assembled, to its present state of prosperity, did not do so without capital; and the stock exhibited at these annual agricultural meetings were not brought to their present state of perfection without capital. (Cheers.)"

He then referred to the fact, that in Worcestershire Mr. Woodward had quoted with approval the speech of Mr. Cobden, in which he attributed the defects of agriculture to insecurity of tenure and want of capital:

"This was what Mr. Woodward said, and he (Mr. Lattimore) entirely concurred in this opinion. It was not likely that a farmer would lay out a large amount of capital on his land, unless security were given him. There was no instance of a manufacturer building up costly premises to carry on an extensive trade without having some security that he himself would enjoy the fruits of it. (Hear, and cheers.) There was no dissimilarity in the cases. What the manufacturer could do, that the farmer could do under the same circumstances. (Cheers.)"

Mr. Lattimore then, in some detail, went into the statistics of landed property in England, in the course of which he remarked, that of the 28 millions of acres of cultivated land in England and Wales, not more than one-third had sufficient capital expended upon it; "that is, as much as could be profitably employed upon it." And at least 3*l.* an acre was required in addition, or 60 millions sterling.

"The employment of the labourer," said Mr. Lattimore, "would come with this additional expenditure of capital; but before necessary labour could be employed, sixty millions of capital must be laid out. (Hear, hear.) Were the landlords able or willing to lay out this sum? and if not, were they ready to give security to those who were able and willing? Till this point were cleared up, they would have to rely on and permanent good, although they might make some partial and local improvements. (Hear, hear, and cheers.)"

And forty millions more might be profitably invested in the improvement of land in Scotland and Ireland.

"Were they then sincere in their desire to employ the poor? (A cry of 'Yes!') If so, he would take it as a proof of their sincerity, if they advocated the principles best calculated to bring into effect the alterations he had pointed out; for whatever solitary efforts might be made to employ the labourer; whatever individual kindness might effect employment could never become permanent unless it were profitable; and without security of tenure, the outlay necessary to make the employment of labour profitable, could not and would not be made. (LOUD CHEERS.) Some might be staggered at the amount of the capital he had stated to be necessary; but if, when they went home, they quietly thought over the matter, he had no doubt that they would agree with him that there was ample room for a very large outlay, if not for quite so much as he had represented. (Hear.) Why, the tenant-at-will was but the occupier of the day, and had no permanent interest in the inheritance, or we might liken him to a passing traveller who might see and project the improvements required, but did not stay long enough to carry them into effect. (Loud cheers.)

He warned the farmers against empirical remedies, and royal roads to farming.

"The medium through which they should alone expect to secure agricultural prosperity, was the independence of the farmer. (Cheers.) Improvements and inventions were carried out by means of energy and activity; but he never heard of their being carried out by slaves in prison; and he thought that whatever placed the farmer on his knees when he ought to stand upright, tended to throw back agricultural improvement. (Hear, and cheers.) Without security of tenure, the farmer could not pry for labour on the soil; and without labour he could not make those improvements which every lover of his country must desire to see carried out. (Hear, hear.)"

Having referred to Capt. Rous's speech, in Suffolk, and his reference to the Chinese, Mr. Lattimore said—

"He did think it very odd that it should be necessary for Christian England to take lessons in moral, social, and political economy from the Pagans of China. (Hear, hear.) He believed that there was ample capital in the country, but without security of tenure it never would be devoted to the cultivation of land. Agriculturists were like other men; they had the same spirit—the same energy and activity—the same bias and impulse—but they required to be treated like other men; they wanted security! (Hear, hear.) Let them have this, and then their skill and their energies would be exercised—improvements in the cultivation of the land would be carried out, and there would be ample employment for labour for another generation."

And he then stated the value of such improvements to the labouring classes.

"There was enough of capital in the country. We were making railroads for Australia and the East Indies, and upon the Continent of Europe; and the capital thus employed we could devote to the cultivation of the land at home, if we had security of tenure. (Hear.) If we had this, there would be no need of the rewards to the labourer for good conduct, which had been given that day; for we should then, like the manufacturers, be able to give him the best of all rewards—namely, full and constant employment at remunerative wages. The manufacturers of Lancashire have lately been thus distributing 150,000*l.* weekly in extra wages. (Hear, hear.) In the reception of this kind of reward there would be no degradation; the recipient would lift his head aloft in the consciousness of honest independence, and feel that he was a free and useful citizen, giving a full equivalent for the support of himself and family to his country at large. (LOUD CHEERS.)"

This useful speech was very well received; indeed such observations come with great weight from a farmer whose own practice so fully bears out his precepts. Yet will it be believed, that Mr. Lattimore was lately turned out of one of his farms by a little Hertfordshire Squire, in consequence of his sound and able public advocacy of the best interest of the farming body?

THE CANT OF MONOPOLY.

The following most exquisite bit of humbug was delivered by that pattern monopolist, Mr. George Bankes, at the Dorchester Agricultural Association. It seems that the labourers who had received premiums were allowed to dine in the same room, though at a separate table with the gentry and farmers, in avowed imitation of that prince of pretenders, the Duke of Richmond. Mr. Bankes, addressing these labourers, said—

"It has been said, I know, with respect to meetings such as this, What good do they do? And especially with reference to the industrious and deserving labourers who appear on such occasions, it is said—Well, and what good do these meetings do them? The pecuniary value of the premiums which they receive is of no great consideration, it is true. Is there then no other good to be derived from these meetings? Now, my friends (addressing the labourers) I will consider the question for a moment with you, and I will suppose the question put with reference to myself. There are those who are, in rank, power, and condition, high above me in station of life, as I may, by the ordinances of Providence, be in station above you. And if those who are greatly my superiors should, not on account of rank, not on account of wealth, not on account of brilliant talent, for I have none of those qualities; but if the great and worthy should select me as deserving of their notice, because I had in my station endeavoured with faithful industry to discharge every duty incident to that station; if I had been found willing in my services to my fellow-subjects, and proving myself if an humble yet a useful member of the community, I think I should derive good from being selected on such terms, and on such a recommendation, and that an invitation on such terms may do good as well to those who invite, as to those who are the objects of the invitation. (Loud cheers.) Nor is this good confined to the hour when it occurs, nor yet to the individual who receives it. I return to my family, and my children gather round me, and inquire the incidents of the day; and when I tell them of the notice I have received from the great and the worthy, in whose company I have been treated as though I had a right to be there (cheers), I think the lesson of the night will not be forgotten on the morrow. And many who are here now will, I trust, live to see your children emulating those characters which we are so happy to record for you. (Cheers.) This, then, is one source of good from such meetings as these."

Now, unless Mr. George Bankes is a most consummate hypocrite, the above speech indicates a degree of mental servility which we firmly believe the poorest labourer present would have despised. The reporter says—

"The labourers then rose, and gave three cheers for Mr. Bankes, Lord Stavordale, and the gentlemen and farmers present; after which they retired, it being about seven o'clock, having conducted themselves with the greatest propriety and order."

And this is the way in which the 'squires seek to raise the labouring classes. But the fact is, the gentry do not desire to raise the rural labourers beyond the point of bowing to the parson and the 'squire.

And then Mr. Bankes affects to consider the entertainments given by the intelligent operatives of the manufacturing districts to their masters as imitations of such re-unions as that at Dorchester!

Probably the force of assurance never went further than in the following passage of Mr. Bankes's speech:

"Now, that we have tried the experiment, I think we may consider that the new regulation is quite practicable. It gives me great pleasure to find that meetings are not falling off, but that those who were once in the habit of thinking very little of anything done by the agriculturists, if not of sneering at us and our societies for encouraging the labourers, and uniting the different classes together, are now imitating us, and indeed going beyond us. I saw in a newspaper the other day, that at Oldham the workmen are going to give a fête to the masters, and that a ball is to be included. I do not stop to ask what good it will do. I think it will do the masters good to mix with their men, for a little friendly enjoyment. I am glad to find that there is a good spirit springing up between the employer and the employed. I never did encourage a feeling of hostility between agriculturists and manufacturers. I was never one of those who encouraged a bad feeling on the part of workmen against their masters."

Of the real value of the landlords' good will towards the industrious agricultural classes, some notion may be gained by the fact mentioned by Mr. Churchill, with reference to a proposed prize for good cultivation of farms. He said—

"They had now the addition of a very useful prize offered by Lord Stavordale, for which also he hoped there would be much competition, although he had been told in the market that day that such was not likely to be the case, as there was a disinclination on the part of renting tenants to permit such an inspection as would be required, from the supposition, as he understood, that the landlord would take advantage, and raise the rent on the next lease."

And the market estimate of landlord liberality is pretty accurate. For it will be found that notwithstanding all the high-flown sentiment expressed about the labourers, the 'squires of Dorsetshire are most anxious to pull down every cottage they can lay hands on, so as to drive the "surplus" labourers into the towns. And yet the greatest want of the rural population of Dorsetshire is decent cottage accommodation. We commend to the reader's attention an admirable article on this meeting, which we reprint from the Morning Chronicle.

A DELICATE INQUIRY.

At the Dunmow Agricultural Meeting, Mr. Low, one of the farmers used by the Duke of Richmond's clique to get up "protection societies," said:

"He was inclined to think, from what he saw in one of our manufacturing towns, that they were as blind to agricultural matters as it was possible to be; but the information put forth by the Protection Society was spreading better views; and he alluded to this society because he had the honour to propose the first resolution at the first meeting, when Essex took the lead, and her example was quickly followed throughout the kingdom at large."

Mr. Low may be excused for reviving the memory of his short-lived and rickety bantling; but we thought that the "Central Protection Society" had not only been dead and buried, but totally forgotten, until we saw in the Morning Post—et tu brute!—the following delicate inquiry, by a correspondent from Spilsby, near Boston, who signs himself "A Tenant Farmer":

"Two seasons ago, there was formed in London a society, called the Society for the Protection of Agriculture, or the Agricultural Protection Society of Great Britain and Ireland, and which society, after passing several very excellent resolutions, agreed to appeal to the then very numerous local associations for liberal support to enable them to carry out their very extended scheme of operations against the efforts of Free Traders. Among the many plans proposed by this very admirable association, was one of offering prizes for the best essays upon three subjects they gave out; and which essays were to be sufficiently conclusive, in a very few pages, of the whole question. As one of the members of a local society, seeking for information, in reply to the gradually persuasive arguments of Free Traders, who really have a method in their madness, and who do begin to persuade us there are other interests than those of the landlord, I have looked for some time with much anxiety for these tracts. The only answer I can get from the secretary to this society is, that he is not able to say how soon they will appear. My object in addressing you is to ascertain, if I can, what has been done by our parent association, or rather our father-in-law society, for it assumed this name after the birth of many of us, and subsequent to the death of our real parent, who formerly lived in Regent-street. I am told, up and down the country, that large sums, say nearly 50,000*l.*, have been subscribed to this society, and I rather want to know what they have done with it besides paying rent and salaries. Their report said that three subjects of importance to agriculture came before Parliament; but, on consideration, they thought it better to pass by one of them as of secondary importance; the next they thought of an individual character, and consequently not within the range of their operations; and the last they thought it better to leave alone! But then it went on to say they had distributed 30,000 tracts of various kinds—perhaps a few more—all of which they had reason to believe had been read."

"Now really, Sir, I do think the subscribers hereabouts have reason to ask what these gentlemen are about? You know the movement began with us tenant farmers; and it was bravely backed by your efforts, and has been ever since. But the gentlemen who form this Peel-supporting society thought, I suppose, we were likely to assert our rights too plainly, and stepped in in time to 'Burke' the expression of our opinion. When next the tenants arouse themselves (at all times, by the way, a slow process), they, the landlords, may rest assured our silence will not be so easily obtained. I have said this society, with 50,000*l.* at its back, has succeeded in distributing 30,000, say 50,000 tracts. Why, Sir, I hold in my hand now a little pamphlet published by one of your London houses (the name is torn off), which purports to be the ninetieth thousand. Now I never heard that there was any subscription set afloat, to the amount of a thousand pounds even, to aid this effort; therefore I am justified in asking what has been done with our funds by this Agricultural Protection Society of Great Britain and Ireland?"

THE BERKELEYAN THEORY OF GAME-PRESERVING.

We last week copied from the Hampshire Independent an account of Mr. Grantley Berkeley's doings in Hampshire, to vindicate the majesty of the hare; and as that gentleman has addressed a letter to the Morning Post, which he supposes to be a contradiction of the local report, we feel bound to give our readers the benefit of the effusion. Here is the letter, with the honourable game-preserver's own italics:

THE GAME LAWS.

To the Editor of the Morning Post.

Sir,—My attention having been called to a statement copied from the Hampshire Independent into the Examiner of last Sunday, and other of the London papers, headed "Game Laws," in which statement my name has been introduced, may I beg of you to afford me space for this, as a public contradiction to the falsehood therein contained. A tissue of falsehood founded on a circumstance.

I did convict two notorious poachers, named Burrey and Purchase, of beating for game in standing barley, with a lurcher, and for cursing a hare, on the testimony of two credible witnesses; and they, the poachers, brought forward three of their gang to swear they were not poaching; one of whom, a man twice previously convicted of poaching by me, with the most iniquitous effrontery swore that he himself had never been in goal, when at the same time he was standing face to face with the Justice who committed him, but who, from the man's utter disregard to the obligations of an oath, thought that he must be mistaken in the man's identity, until I represented the fact.

I did, as prosecutor, put a few questions through the Bench, to elicit the above fact, as well as others, but I did not take my seat between the two magistrates, and I did not remove from any place I occupied upon any complaint or suggestion made by the attorney who attended for the poachers. This paragraph to which I allude, would have been treated by me with the contempt it deserves, but that I recognise in it a hair of the dog that pulls the Anti-Game Law barrow.

It is of itself an excellent example of the way in which the designer gulls an Editor, whom I am bound to believe would not publish a falsehood, if he knew it, and, through the editor, a susceptible public, into the most erroneous views and opinions.—Your most obedient, G. F. BERKELEY. Beacon Lodge, October 6, 1845.

The elegant reference made to those who are endeavouring to relieve the farmers from the scourge of the game-preserving, and the rural labourers from the persecution of game-preserving justice, is quite as characteristic as it is elegant. If Mr. Berkeley would know the "dog that pulls the Anti-Game Law barrow," he must look at the universal yeomanry of England.

AGRICULTURAL CORRESPONDENCE.

A very good Norfolk farmer, writing to thank a friend for a copy of THE LEAGUE which had been sent to him, says: "It contains a brief but interesting account of West Norfolk farming; also many other topics important to agriculturists; indeed, it is becoming quite a farmer's paper; and if published on the Monday instead of Saturday, so as to contain the latest accounts of Mark Lane, I think it would soon meet with a greater circulation amongst the latter class. I for one would immediately become a subscriber." And he afterwards adds, "The corn markets are again rising; and now is the accepted time for the repeal of the Corn Laws. There could not possibly be a more favourable opportunity; a Free Trade at the present moment could scarcely prevent a rise in prices. Farmers would therefore get a fair starting, and be fully prepared for the future."

IMPORTANT TO LEASEHOLDERS.—By a decision of the Court of Queen's Bench in the case of Doe Muston v. Gladstone, reported in the Jurist of the 21st of June, 1845, it is apprehended that about 80 out of every 100 of the leases throughout the United Kingdom may be declared legally void; and the unhappy persons who have laid out their money on the lands of others, may be disinherited at the free will and pleasure of the ground landlords. This is another of the late Lord Egremont's cases, of such notoriety; and clearly points out the gross and iniquitous manner in which the judges (with the law as it is) are necessitated to administer the laws of one of the greatest kingdoms of the earth. Leaseholders should take care that their covenants to insure in the joint-names of themselves and their landlords are complied with, or they may be ousted, as in the above cited case, at the pleasure of their landlords.—Western Times.

ALLOTMENT SYSTEM.—The practice of allotting little bits of ground to agricultural labourers to diminish their ground of complaint, and by employing them on small plots of earth preventing them from entering on plots of a more dangerous character. The system is said to have worked well, and the labourers have worked well wherever it has been adopted.—Punch.

DORCHESTER DINNER—AN EXPERIMENT.

(From the Morning Chronicle.)

The gentlemen of the Dorchester Agricultural Society have, we observe, been trying an "experiment." It was not an experiment of the class usually recognised as coming within the scope of an agricultural society's operations. It was not an experiment on the fertilising qualities of guano, nor on the virtues of sub-soil draining, nor on the comparative merits of different descriptions of ploughs, nor on the weight of fat which a well-educated ox can be trained to without choking. The great Dorchester experiment had nothing to do with the arcana of agricultural mechanics, or agricultural chemistry. It simply consisted in inviting a few labourers to take dinner in the same room with a few gentlemen.

With what precise object this experiment was tried, does not clearly appear. In fact, there is nothing to show that it was an "experiment" at all, except the enthusiasm and unanimity with which the gentlemanly section of the dinner party in question voted it such. The more obvious experimental uses to which so novel a juxta-position as that of landlords and labourers in the same dining-room might be applied, were altogether neglected. Nothing was done towards eliciting from the peasant guests those views which they would doubtless have been happy to offer to the meeting, as to the facts of their own every-day condition, and the means of its amelioration. No use was made of the frank garrulity with which the labourers, as well as lords, are apt to be inspired in their convivial moments; they were not asked to speak out their honest thoughts on Game Laws, Poor Laws, wages, and the duties of landlords and farmers. We do not know whether such revelations of the peasant mind were desired, or would have proved acceptable; they certainly do not seem to have been in any way invited. The labourers were there, not to talk, but to be talked to. With the exception of "three hearty cheers for the gentlemen," they were silent guests at the gentlemen's table—or side-table. Neither was the experiment designed to ascertain the fitness of farm-labourers for the convivial companionship of gentlemen. At least, if such were its purpose, we must, while applauding the caution of the experimenters, lament a timidity which has prevented it from yielding any certain result; for, long before that period of the evening when the experiment would have become most delicate and critical, the labourers were "sent away." On the whole, we must confess ourselves quite in the dark as to what doctrine of agricultural science, or of social and moral philosophy, our Dorchester savans designed to establish or confute.

Of course, not knowing what the experiment was for, we are not in a condition to pronounce any opinion on its success or failure. The authorities are somewhat conflicting. The president, Mr. Bankes, was clearly of opinion that the experiment was successful; but other accounts are less satisfactory. The editor of the Sherborne Journal, writing coolly, after a few days' interval, and with the command of the best sources of information, speaks hesitatingly—qualifies the "experiment" rather ambiguously, as a "novel"—and suggests that "it would be unfair, as well as unjust, to pronounce an opinion upon it, when it has been barely tested." From one very important statement made by this journalist, we should fear that the experiment has created a strong under-current of dissatisfaction among the gentlemen, of which courtesy only precluded the loud public expression. It seems to have completely spoiled the dinner, as a dinner. "The only visible effect produced by it was that it considerably deteriorated the character of the dinner, the price of which had been lowered from 10s. to 3s., that the labourers might partake of the same viands as the rest of the company." Whether the gentlemen of Dorsetshire will submit to eat another 3s. dinner, for the more perfect solution of a great agricultural or social problem, remains to be seen.

It would, however, be doing great injustice to the Dorchester Agricultural Society, to omit all notice of the elaborate speech in which their president justified this novel and important proceeding—expounded the principle of it—and suggested a further extension of that principle for the benefit of himself and family in particular, and society in general. When the appointed time came for giving the assembled labourers their prizes for last year (it seems to be the Dorsetshire practice to make the poor fellows give 12 months' credit), the recipients were "desired to stand up," and were regaled with the following exquisite moreau of moral philosophy:

"It had been said of meetings of this kind where they thus recognised the services of the labourer—the award, it was true, as far as the amount was weighed in money, only in a small degree acknowledged their long and faithful services—it had been said, what good do these meetings do? He would suppose he might be invited to the tables of those who were higher than he was in the world, as by the dispensations of Providence he was higher than they, and, if he should be selected, not for his rank, not for his high talents, not for his wealth (for to none of these could he pretend), but merely because he had discharged his duty in the ranks in which it had pleased Providence to place him—because he had endeavoured to prove serviceable to his fellow-subjects in as high a degree as he was capable of—if, on account of claims like these, he were invited to the tables of the highest and most eminent in the land, he thought he should consider that he derived some considerable good from the distinction thus conferred upon him, and that those who had invited him might also derive some good in return, and he thought the good would not stop even with the events of that particular day, for when he returned to his home where he had children, and those children were to ask him of the events of the day, he should tell them that he had been in the society of those by whom he had been selected on account of the conduct which he had pursued, and he thought he should thus bring home to his family a lesson which those children would not forget, and in turn he might hope they also would endeavour to sit at the tables of the great on the same terms on which he had been sitting."

We trust the honourable gentleman's ingenious and original suggestion for regenerating society by dinner parties, will not be lost on "the highest and most eminent in the land." We had, certainly, not been fully aware of the moral efficacy of an occasional invitation to "sit at the tables of the great." We had not the slightest idea that being asked out to dinner was the best reward and incentive to virtue. An annual invitation to Windsor or Buckingham Palace will, it appears, ensure the virtues of the house of Bankes in secula seculorum. Never was a finer opening for doing much good at little cost, than that which the Member for Dorsetshire here offers to his Sovereign. If her Majesty would but have a few Dorset squires to dinner now and then—selecting them not for their rank, talents, or wealth, but purely on moral grounds—the advantages would be incalculable. They would be both immediate and enduring. The good done would descend from generation to generation; and children, and children's children, would industriously emulate their sires' virtues, in hopes of one day participating their sires' reward. We warmly recommend this proposal to the consideration of the proper authorities. The thing will cost little. There need be no disagreeable mixing and confusion of ranks. It will not exact of royalty any painful or humiliating condescension, to copy the Dorchester precedent. The "sitting at the tables of the great" need not be taken literally. Mr. Bankes and his party can be put at a side-table—there need be no talking—and they can be "sent away" immediately the cloth is removed.

Seriously, this is sorry stuff for an English gentleman to address to a body of English labourers. Rejoiced, indeed, should we be to witness any symptoms of a disposition to kindly and natural social intercourse—any signs of a real and genuine union of feeling and interest—among different classes of the agricultural community. But we confess that, beyond the simple fact that certain Dorsetshire labourers got a dinner, which we venture to say they did not deem "deteriorated," we can see little cause for satisfaction in this exhibition of twaddling condescension on the one side, and mute servility on the other. A more tasteless and clumsy attempt in the "condescension" line, we do not remember ever having seen.

Of the sort of social intercourse between employers and employed which yields really and permanently beneficial moral results to both, we had a gratifying specimen, a few days since, in the Operative Cotton Spinners' Festival, held at Oldham, in honour of the liberality with which the manufacturing capitalists of that town and its vicinity have lately acceded to the request of the workmen for an advance of wages. Mr. Bankes, we observe, speaks of this, and very pleasantly calls it "an imitation of their proceedings," which "he thinks will do a great deal of good." The imitation is singularly unlike the original. The working men of Oldham gave the entertainment. They were there, not as humble and silent guests, but as proud, free-spoken, and delighted hosts. The masters had, it is true, a "special tea-table set apart for their accommodation;" but this was by the voluntary courtesy and good taste of the men. For the rest, they were not "sent away" early in the evening; they did not "stand up" to be lectured on the moral advantages of eating and drinking in the same room with rich people; nor did they sit tongue-tied to hear great men talk. An operative took the chair, and operatives were among the speakers who "addressed the meeting on the present position of the industrious classes, and on the vital importance of maintaining good feeling between employers and employed."

We shall heartily rejoice when such meetings of employers and employed become possible in the agricultural districts. But we beg to assure all well-meaning and kind-hearted landlords, that like effects can only come of like causes. When agricultural labourers have an independent status in the labour market, when they find themselves wanted, when steady employment at liberal wages become the habitual condition of their existence—which will be when capital is freely and largely expended on agriculture—which will be when agriculture is relieved of the uncertainties of political prices and political tenures—there will be a solid basis laid for the gradual development of those feelings between different sections of the agricultural community, which would find natural and graceful expression in festive meetings of landlords, farmers, and labourers. When that day arrives, we may be quite sure that nothing will be said about "experiments;" the labourers will not be put at a side-table—will not be "sent away"—and will find some more articulate mode of utterance than "three cheers for the gentlemen."

THE WEATHER AND THE HARVEST.

(From the Mark Lane Express.)

We had comparatively fine weather in the neighbourhood of the metropolis up to Thursday; since then a considerable quantity of rain has fallen, and though there is little corn abroad in the south, the wet must be regarded as unfavourable, inasmuch as that portion of the potato crop which may have escaped the disease, regarding which so much has been said, is likely to receive further injury from wet. In the northern and eastern parts of the kingdom there is still a good deal of grain in the fields; and, as the weather seems to have been quite as unsettled there as with us, the conclusion of the harvest must be still further delayed. The chances of the remainder of crops in the later districts being secured in even tolerable order are, therefore, very slight. In early seasons the northern counties sometimes fare better than the south; such was the case last year, and the enormous produce of wheat in Lincolnshire and Cambridgeshire did much to swell the general yield. This season the deficiency is likely to be much greater in the backward than in the early counties; the corn was not ripe there till the weather became decidedly broken, and the quality will, we fear, prove even worse than the yield. We cannot, therefore, calculate on anything like the large supplies we have been in the habit of drawing from the east coast. The western side of the island has been the more favoured this season, but even there the produce of wheat to the acre is complained of; whilst the weight per bushel is certainly 2½ lbs. less than last season. It is, therefore, to be certain that the total produce of the kingdom must be regarded as short of usual years, and a steady and progressive rise in the value of bread-stuffs must be expected. The upward movement may, and probably will, from time to time receive checks; but, on the whole, wheat will, we think, advance in price until next spring. After that time much will depend on the then appearance of the crop, the probable extent of the spring shipments from the Baltic, and other causes of which nothing can at present be known. That considerable importance is still attached to the weather may be readily seen by the influence it has had on business during the week; the few fine days experienced in the early part had the effect of causing a depression in prices, and giving a generally dull tone to the trade at most of the markets held previously to Thursday; whilst the return of wet restored confidence to holders, and rendered buyers anxious to add to their stocks.

By our advices from Scotland we learn that harvest operations have been very much impeded by the unsettled state of the weather. A letter from Glasgow, dated 1st inst., states that more than half the crops were then still abroad, and much corn霉. Wheat was on that day quoted 1s. to 1s. 6d. per boll higher at the town named; and at Edinburgh, on the same day, fine qualities of old were worth 70s. per qr. Oats, Beans, and Peas were from 1s. to 2s. per qr. higher than the week before at both places, and flour and oatmeal were also held at enhanced rates.

In Ireland the weather appears to have been fine up to about the middle of the week, but a similar unfavourable change as that experienced here on the 2d also took place on that side of the Channel. In the southern parts of the island the harvest had previously been nearly concluded, but in the more backward localities a considerable quantity of corn is yet abroad. Many very unfavourable rumours as to potatoes were afloat, but the complaints are not of so decided a character as to cause us to feel much apprehension. Still it is pretty certain that the disease so prevalent in England has manifested itself in the sister isle.

THE POTATO DISEASE.

Although the almost universal failure of the potato crops has not yet been much felt by the humbler classes of society, in consequence of the abundance of cabbage, carrots, and other vegetables available at this season of the year, yet it is to be feared, as the winter approaches, that the poor will be great sufferers by the calamity. Mr. Funnell, of Southsea, near this town, who has for many years been an extensive cultivator of potatoes, which from their excellent quality have been in great repute, and who has annually supplied the leading families of Lewes and Brighton with their winter stock, has been compelled to intimate to his customers his inability to do so this year, in consequence of the failure of his entire crop from the effect of the prevailing disease.—Sussex Advertiser.

We hear that the disease amongst the potatoes is disappearing—that it is assuming the appearance of a mere scab upon the skin, the potato being restored to perfect health. Should this turn out to be the fact generally, the case will be one of the most singular on record. That it has occurred we have several instances upon the most undoubted authority.—Carlisle Journal.

Among other ingenious theories by which this disease is sought to be accounted for, is the practice of using potatoes for seed, instead of the potato apple. It appears, however, to be quite immaterial which of the two is adopted for that purpose, for Mr. Wm. Marsland, of Quernmore, near this town, has this season grown from 80 to 100 varieties of the potato, and all of them have been affected with the prevailing distemper, though grown from the apple.—Lancaster Guardian.

The disease which has been this year deteriorating the quality of the potato crop has made its appearance in Switzerland.

The Prussian Government has prohibited the exportation of potatoes from Westphalia and the Rhenish provinces.

A letter from Frankfurt in the Cologne Gazette, states that the different Governments of the Zollverein are to decide in common how far it will be useful to prohibit completely, or only to restrict, the importation of potatoes and corn at the present conjuncture.

HAMBURG, OCTOBER 2.—PRICES OF CORN.—Wheat: Polish, 130 to 155; Anh. Magd. red, 125 to 145; ditto white, 126 to 148; Marks and Brunswick, 125 to 145; Silesian yellow, 125 to 145; ditto white, 125 to 145; Meck. and Pom., 125 to 145; Holstein, 120 to 140; Lower Elbe, 115 to 136. Rye: Anh. and Magd. 97 to 107; Danz. Elb. and Königs., 90 to 105; Marks, Meck., and Pom., 95 to 106; Holstein and Lower Elbe, 98 to 102; Danish, 95 to 100. Barley, Meck. and Oderbruch, 67 to 77. Oats: Upland, 45 to 50; Meck. and Holstein, 45 to 51; Lower Elbe, 39 to 45.

THE TRADE OF BRADFORD.—Notwithstanding the failure of two or three persons in Bradford, in a large way of business, within the last few weeks, we may truly say that Bradford trade on the whole is in a prosperous state. Within the last few months a very large factory has been built at Shipley, another at Bowling, another by Messrs. Harrop and Craven, at Thornton, and another at Clayton is in course of being built. A mill at Clayton Heights, which has been unoccupied four years, has been taken and filled with looms. We do not know of a single mill in Bradford or the neighbourhood that is not let.—Leeds Times.

SCREW-AUXILIARY VESSEL, MASSACHUSETTS.—The screw-auxiliary vessel Massachusetts, Captain White, arrived in the Mersey Friday afternoon. She left New York on the 15th ult., and from wharf to wharf, her passage may be put down at 17 days 11 hours. She had the whole way head-winds and calms, and her run may therefore be considered excellent. She brought 10 passengers. She is, without doubt, the most extraordinary vessel, as a specimen of consummate engineering skill, that ever crossed the Atlantic, and will, we think, excite more attention and admiration than any craft that ever left the American shore. She is the first of a screw-auxiliary line to sail between this port and New York, built at Boston by Mr. Samuel Hall, for Messrs. B. Forbes and Co., of Boston; and has already made one voyage from that port to New York. She is 800 tons burden, American measurement, 155 feet on deck, 178 feet from billet-head to taffrail, 33 feet beam, has engines of 280 horse-power, and is ship-rigged with a few exceptions, the most striking being that her topmasts are fixed abaft the mast. The lower masts are also unusually tall, and the funnel of unusual lowness, even in screw steamers. Her cabins are capacious, well fitted up, and ventilated in a new, most ingenious, and strikingly effective manner; and she can accommodate 40 passengers. Her screw is of a novel construction; it can be drawn completely out of the water at pleasure, by a most simple process, and placed in a perpendicular position against the stern; and, in such circumstances, the Massachusetts is, to all intents and purposes, a sailing-vessel. The screw works most powerfully, and insures a speed, with sail, of 12 knots an hour. The sails and rigging abound in the most curious contrivances to ease the labour of reefing, shortening sail, &c., perhaps the first instance in which modern machinery has been carried aloft. All sail has been repeatedly set in 25 minutes. She has four life-boats; and, what will be found the most extraordinary proof of American ingenuity yet known in ships, every bench, every seat, stool, &c., is a life-boat, made of iron, with air-tight compartments, and adapted to swim, even with the weight of a man. So many contrivances for safety were never yet brought together. Between the quarter-deck and fore-castle, both of which are raised to an unusual height, there are, figure-fashion, between the deck itself and the top of the bulwarks, a kind of stages, found to be vast improvements on the plan in general use. For all these particulars we are indebted to the chief-mate, Mr. J. R. Gordon; but it would be an impossibility to enumerate the various novelties and wonders to be found in the Massachusetts, and it is an inspection alone which can teach an appreciation. On the water she is a beautiful-looking craft, with sharp bows, and an unexceptionable run fore and aft. She is consigned to Messrs. Harnden and Co., and goes into Waterloo Dock this morning.—Liverpool Journal of Saturday.

REVIEW.

Legends of the Isles, and other Poems. By Charles Mackay, Esq. Edinburgh, Blackwood.

We have read the poems collected in this little volume with great delight. Mr. Mackay's previous publications had prepared us to expect beautiful sentiments in graceful and flowing verse, but we did not anticipate such a union of the wildness of old romance with the sweetness and tenderness of lyrical poetry, as we have found in the Legends of the Isles. The author is a perfect master of the melody of versification; his poetry seems to tell its stories in the varied music of its measures. The Sea-king's Burial is a funeral march, mingled with swelling notes of triumph; the Witch of Skerrievore is a plaintive wail, where every tone is anguish. The unearthly course of the steed of the Kelpy of Corryreckan is echoed in the following lines:

He mounted his steed of the water clear,
And sat on his saddle of sea-weed ere;
He held his bridle of strings of pearl,
Dug out of the depths where the sea snakes curl.

He put on his vest of the whirlpool froth,
Soft and dainty as velvet cloth,
And donn'd his mantle of sand so white,
And grasp'd his sword of the coral bright.

And away he gallop'd, a horseman free,
Spurring his steed through the stormy sea,
Clearing the billows with bound and leap—
Away, away, o'er the foaming deep.

A more ambitious legend, and of more general interest, is the creation of the poet's own mind. It describes the congress of War, Intolerance, and Ignorance, the three worst despots of mankind, plotting to maintain their iron rule over the human race. The catastrophe is powerfully described:

"Rejoice! Rejoice! the world is ours!"

And hell, in all its lairs,

Repeated by a myriad tongues—

"Rejoice! the world is theirs!"

But high above the festal din,

A sudden sound was heard—

A noise as of a mighty storm,

When earth and heaven are stirr'd.

'Then all was still—In dread suspense

The myriads held their breath—

And a loud voice, pervading space,

Pronounced their doom of death.

"Tyrants!" it said, "of human kind,

For ages drunk with gore,

Another era dawns for man—

The world is yours no more.

"The film that hid, for ages long,

Your hideousness from sight,

Has fall'n from human eyes, that now

Behold a dawning light.

"In the refulgence of its beam

Your tottering thrones shall fall,

And men shall wonder that their hearts

Ere bow'd beneath your thrall.

"Peace shall descend to bless the world,

And CHARITY shall smile,

And bounteous KNOWLEDGE pour her fruits

To ocean's furthest isle.

"Though you have reigned o'er human hearts

Since Time's primeval day,

Your hour is come, your doom pronounced,

Your empire pass'd away!"

Mr. Mackay joins his voice to the protest against the system which renders food dear and labour cheap. The Lay of the People is a stirring appeal, which will find an echo in every honest heart:

Our backs are bow'd with the exceeding weight

Of toil and sorrow; and our pallid faces

Shivel before their time. Early and late

We labour in our old accustomed places,

Beside our close and melancholy looms,

Or wither in the coal-seams dark and dreary,

Or breathe sick vapours in o'ercrowded rooms,

Or in the healthier fields dig till we weary,

And grow old men ere we have reach'd our prime,

With scarce a wish but death to ask of Time.

For it is hard to labour night and day

With sleep-defrauded eyes and temples aching,

To earn the scanty crust, which fails to stay

The hunger of our little ones, that waking

Weep for their daily bread. 'Tis hard to see

The flow'rets of our household fade in sadness,

In the dank shadow of our misery.

'Tis hard to have no thought of human gladness,

But one engrossing agony for bread,

To haunt us at our toil, and in our bed.

And many of us, worn with age and pain—

Old wither'd leaves of men, who, fading, cumber,

Long for that pleasant fosse, six feet by twain.

Impervious to all grief, where we may slumber.

And others of us, more unhappy still,

Youthful, warm-blooded, with a life to cherish,

Offer in vain our sinews and our skill

For starving recompense, and yet must perish

In our young days, and on a fruitful soil,

Because our food is dearer than our toil.

Oh, it is bitter-hard to roam the earth,

Alien to joy, with sad thoughts overflowing,

To hear the young birds carol in their mirth,

To feel the sunshine, and the warm winds blowing,

To see the beauty in the fields and floods,

The plenty of the meadows, green or golden,

The fair full orchards redolent of buds,

And know that we, by a hard fate withholden,

Must keep our appetites aloof, nor dare

To taste the stores which happier birds may share.

We shall conclude by quoting the closing stanzas of this protest against the oppression produced by the Corn Laws.

But these we sigh for all our days in vain,
And find no remedy where'er we seek it;—
Some of us, reckless, and grown mad with pain
And hungry vengeance, have broke loose to wreak it:
Have made huge bonfires of the hoarded corn,
And died despairing. Some to foreign regions,
Hopeless of this, have sail'd away forlorn,
To find new homes and swear a new allegiance.

But we that stay'd behind had no relief,
No added corn, and no diminish'd grief.
And rich men kindly urge us to endure,
And they will send us clergymen to bless us;
And lords who play at cricket with the poor,
Think they have cured all evils that oppress us.
And then we think endurance is a crime;
That those who wait for justice never gain it;
And that the multitudes are most sublime

When, rising arm'd, they combat to obtain it,
And dabbling in thick gore, as if 'twere dew,
Seek not alone their rights, but vengeance too.
But these are evil thoughts; for well we know,
From the sad history of all times and places,
That fire, and blood, and social overthrow,
Lead but to harder grinding of our faces.
When all is over: so, from strife withdrawn,
We wait in patience through the night of sorrow,
And watch the far-off glimpses of the dawn
That shall assure us of a brighter morrow.
And meanwhile, from the overburden'd sod,
Our cry of anguish rises up to God.

CHEAP TRAIN FROM NEWCASTLE, SUNDERLAND, SHIELDS, &c., FOR THE LEAGUE BAZAAR, MANCHESTER.

THE COUNCIL of the LEAGUE having determined that a BAZAAR should be held in the FREE TRADE HALL, MANCHESTER, commencing on the 14th of October, the Public are respectfully informed, that arrangements have been made for

A SPECIAL TRAIN

to accommodate Visitors from this District. Fares, there and back

First-Class-Passengers 15s.

Second-Class-Passengers 12s.

The Fares from Darlington will be—1st Class, 15s.; 2d do., 9s.

The Train will leave the GATESHEAD Station on the Morning of TUESDAY, October 14th, upon the arrival of the Morning Train from CARLISLE, or at HALF-PAST NINE o'Clock.

Passengers from SUNDERLAND and SHIELDS will leave these Stations by the QUARTER-TO-NINE o'Clock Train from Brookley Whins, where they will join the Train from Gateshead.

Passengers from DURHAM will leave that Station at QUARTER

PAST TEN o'Clock, to join the Train at Belmont.—To guard against a delay on the Line, and inconvenience to Passengers, the Train will stop, between Gateshead and Darlington, at Brookley Whins, Fence Houses, and Belmont Stations only.

The Carriages will leave the MANCHESTER STATION, to RETURN, on FRIDAY, the 17th inst., at ELEVEN o'Clock in the Morning.

As the number of Carriages is limited, an early application for Tickets is necessary.

POSTSCRIPT.

LONDON, Saturday Morning, October 11, 1845.

The accounts that reach us from Belgium, Holland, and Western Germany, describe the panic produced by the failure of the potato crop as rapidly increasing and extending; indeed, the pressure of distress from scarcity is already felt in several of the Belgic departments. So general has the demand become for an abolition of the import duties on corn and other provisions, that the Belgian government has conceded their suspension, and will most probably grant their entire abolition; but as there is nowhere a surplus produce in Europe, it is a very difficult question to determine whence supplies can be obtained. Other articles of provision have been affected by the failure of potatoes; the prices of corn are gradually but steadily rising in the provinces of the Upper Rhine, and the influence of the rise has extended to the Danube, and the countries along its banks, even to the borders of Hungary. Dread of the approaching winter is the prevailing sentiment throughout Central Europe, and the precautions that should be taken to prevent apprehended scarcity engage the earnest attention of princes and people. Buyers from the Netherlands have appeared in the rice-markets of India, and America; and it is feared that the competition of the Belgian for the food of the Hindoo may seriously affect the grain-markets of Asia.

Taking the entire of Great Britain, it appears that we have not suffered quite so severely as our neighbours; but that there has been a partial failure of the potato crop is now an ascertained fact, whatever difference of opinion may exist as to the extent of the injury. An average corn-harvest will not, therefore, suffice to meet the wants of the country; because, in addition to providing for ordinary consumption, it will be necessary to have a surplus to meet the deficiency of potatoes. Even had there been no failure of any kind, the demand on the produce of the present harvest must be greatly aggravated by the circumstances of the country. Labourers on the railways cannot be fed on potatoes; the proportion of nutriment in the root is so small, when compared with bread, that its bulk impedes its transport. A cargo of potatoes from America, however cheap and abundant they may be there, would hardly remunerate the importers, unless potatoes had reached a famine price in this country. There is solemn warning in this visitation of Providence; it points out the peril of rendering a large mass of the population dependent on the most precarious of crops, and the least nutritious of the vegetables used for human food.

We have been told by the reverend head of an Oxford College, that "seven millions of our countrymen rejoice in potatoes." Never was there a more emphatic exposure of the iniquity of the Corn Laws than is contained in this simple sentence; seven millions of human beings are dependent on a crop always uncertain and variable, affording at its best insufficient nutriment—so perishable, that it can rarely be preserved from the conclusion of one harvest to the commencement of the next, and so bulky in proportion to its nutritive qualities, that it can hardly ever be imported from abroad in case of a deficient supply. Instead of rejoicing in such an esculent, the seven millions would be much better described as sorrowing, or almost despairing.

Those who imposed restrictions on the importation of food, virtually undertook the task of feeding the people from domestic produce, and they cannot evade this responsibility. That the country does not raise enough of corn for the support of its population, is undeniable; if it did so, there would be no seven millions, and indeed no one million, either rejoicing or sorrowing in potatoes. It is true that some protectionists declare that agricultural improvements have kept pace, and will keep pace, with the progress of the population. They are palpably wrong in the fact, and miserably mistaken in the prospect. It is notorious, that the quality of the food of the labouring classes has been much deteriorated since the imposition of the Corn Laws. As the Times justly remarks, "As far as regards a vast proportion of the empire, there is and always has been an actual dearth of corn. There is not enough of it, so long as it bears a price above the means of any fairly industrious class of men."

So much for the fact of the monopolists. Let us now glance at the probability of the performance of their promises. More corn can only be grown by a larger previous expenditure of corn, by employing more labour on the cultivation of the land, and supporting that labour by abundant food. It is by impeding, or rather preventing, this previous expenditure of corn, that the Corn Laws have interfered with the extension of corn-cultivation in our land. Let us grant that they do in some years enhance the immediate profits of the farmer, from an existing harvest, and even then they will be found in a still greater degree to fetter the energies and limit the capital which is necessary for the production of the next crop. The agriculturists place fetters and clogs on themselves, and then expect us to believe that they will march as rapidly and advance as fast as if they had been wholly unencumbered.

We should not murmur very loudly against a temporary pressure, if it compelled the attention both of the government and the people to the uncertainty and insufficiency of the esculent which those who limit the supply of corn proffer to us in its stead. The nation that becomes dependent for its supply of food on potatoes, must have retrograded from the march of civilization and gone a long way back towards original barbarism. As a variety of food, no one, save an enthusiast like Cobbett, would object to its cultivation; but as the sole means of support, it is foredoomed by the laws of Nature to be the most insecure of aliments. "It leaves the cultivator," says the Times, with equal force and truth, "always on the verge of an actual famine, not to speak of a yearly taste of the evil, in the interval between the

PREFACE TO MUSIC!
PRA DIAVOLO for 2s. SONNAMBULA for 2s.
THE PIANISTA, Part 57, is enlarged to the full folio music size, and contains the Overture and all the Airs in "Pra Diavolo." Part 58, for October, contains 8 new copyright songs, by John Har-net and Charles Hara; and No. 59 contains the Overture and all the Airs in "Sonnambula." These Operas may be had complete for 2s. each, or each Opera in six portions of four pages each at 1d. per page. Each Opera contains 24 large pages, which is equal to 30 pages of other music. The Pianista has been published monthly for the last five years, and "The Times" says, "is the most charming, the most correct, and the cheapest musical work of its kind ever published." The back numbers, from 1 to 56, contain 12 complete Operas, 48 sets of Quadrilles and Waltzes, 30 Polkas, 24 Mazurkas, and upwards of 200 copyright songs, besides Marches, Galops,
&c. &c.; all of which could not be purchased of a music seller under Fifty Pounds! As an inducement for parties who have never seen the work to purchase a complete set, the Proprietors will send the whole 56 numbers and 12 supplements at half-price, provided the application is made direct to the Editor, at the Windsor Office, 67, Pall Mall, N.W. Thus, for 56s., a whole musical library may be had of the most popular Music of the day.
Catalogues gratis. A specimen sent for 12 months.
* * * The Proprietors of this work were the cause of foreign Music being thrown open to the Public, and broke the monopoly of the Music-sellers!

considerable Additions to the Author's Text, numerous Notes, and a CON-TINUATION from the Revolution in 1688 to the present Time. Edited by the Rev. BRADLEY TITMUS, M.A.
* * * Besides the CONTINUATION, which extends to 140 pages, and the Additions to the Author's Text (inserted within brackets), where further illustration seemed necessary, thirteen new Sections have been added, which include an outline of Jewish History, and other subjects hitherto wholly omitted. The Dates of important events have been also almost uniformly inserted in the Text, an advantage which will be fully appreciated by the student of history. All these additions, together with the Notes, are about equal in extent to the original work.

CAUTION.—FRAUD.—BERDOE'S WATERPROOF OVER-COATS and SHOOTING JACKETS. It having come to the knowledge of W. B. that certain parties are offering for sale as true above, garments, which, although having attached to them W. B.'s name, and resembling of his label, have not been manufactured by him; also various other attempts, similarly, and fraudulently, to mislead; Intimation thereof is (to prevent disappointment and vexation) thus publicly given. The above well-known and reliable waterproof garments have now been in extensive use several years, and by those who have tried them are regarded as superior to any others. They are made, and sold, in London, only at 60, Cornhill (north side), and by W. B.'s Agents in various towns throughout the kingdom.

CAUTION.—All persons advertising Succedanea for stopping decayed teeth, fraudulently attempt to imitate Mr. Clarke's Original Succedanea; and if any Succedanea than Mr. Clarke's be purchased, it will be discovered useless. Mr. Clarke can say, without the slightest exaggeration, that he has sold 3000 bottles of Succedanea within 16 months; and 2800 individuals have been able to use it successfully, and in use of the confidence have been to Mr. Clarke, at his residence, 61, Lower Grosvenor-street, London, to have their teeth stopped, without any further charge than the original cost of the Succedanea, price 3s. Sold wholesale to all the chemists in town and country; and none is genuine unless had through Messrs. Barclay and Sons, Wholesale and Retail Vendors, 15, Abchurch-lane, Street: Edwards and Son, 67, St. Paul's Church-yard; Hanney and Co., 63, Oxford-street; Colbeck and Mosely, 139, Upper Thames-street, London; and other respectable Wholesale Medicine Warehouses; or Mr. Clarke can send it by post to any part of the United Kingdom, on receiving a Post-office Order.

FOR STOPPING DECAYED TEETH, however large the cavity.—Patented by Her Majesty the Queen, and by the Duke of Wellington, and the principal Nobility.—MR. CLARKE'S SUCCEDANEA M, for stopping decayed teeth, is far superior to anything ever used before, as it is placed in the tooth without any pressure or pain, becomes as hard as the natural enamel, and is perfectly permanent, and remains firm in the tooth for life; it does not rendering extraction unnecessary, but also making them again useful for mastication. All persons can use MR. CLARKE'S SUCCEDANEA themselves with ease, as full directions are enclosed. Price 3s., and sold by all respectable Medicine Vendors in town and country, and can be sent by post on receiving a Post-office Order. Prepared only by Mr.
CLARKE, Surgeon-Dentist, 61, Grosvenor-street, Bond-street, removed from 63, Harley-street, Cavendish-square. LOSS OF TEETH.—MR. CLARKE still continues to supply the loss of teeth, from one to a complete set, upon his beautiful system of Self-denudation, which has procured him such universal application in more thousands of cases, and recommended by Sir James Clark, Bart., M.D., and Dr. Leocock, Physicians to Her Majesty, and numerous other Members of the Medical Profession, as being the most ingenious system of supplying artificial teeth hitherto invented. They are superior to all other systems, and are most tender upon the gums, and require stumps, without causing the least pain, rendering the operation of extraction quite unnecessary, and in order that his system may be within the reach of the most economical, he will continue the same moderate charges. Mr. CLARKE, Surgeon-Dentist, No. 61, Grosvenor-street, Bond-street, London. At home from eleven till six.

NUMBER ONE, ST. PAUL'S CHURCHYARD.—
It is strength, richness of flavour, and excellence of quality, combined with unparalleled smallness of profit, that recommend, to all classes of society, the old-fashioned fine TEA, at 1s. 6d. per pound, sold by DAKIN and COMPANY, Tea-merchants, Number One, St. Paul's Churchyard; and visitors to London may consider it as one of the most judicious of their wayward expenses by purchasing TEA and COFFEES at Number One, St. Paul's Churchyard.
Orders from the country delivered CARRIAGE FREE.

THE AUTUMN OF LIFE.—A phrase fraught with meaning, and suggesting the gravest reflections—bringing in review the elasticity of youth as contrasted with the sober bearing of declining years; yet if the progress of medical and chemical science can obviate one of these symptoms, and stay in a manner the swift hand of time, such results must change the current of sad reflection, and be productive of the highest gratification. The loss of hair, one of the most annoying proofs of the inward ravages of time, has been most successfully supplied, and the success of OLD BRIDGE'S BALM OF COLUMBIA in these cases has been no less remarkable than important to thousands who have experienced its powerful effects in encouraging or reproducing a fine growth of hair with 3d., 6s., and 11s. per bottle. No other hair oil or cream is genuine. Old Bridge's Balm, 1, Wellington-street, the second house from the Strand.

GEORGE and JOHN DEANE'S COOKING STOVE has been adopted at the Madras and Guy's Hospitals, the New Hammam Hotel, Covent garden, and the Gray's Inn Coffee House, where, as at all the principal establishments, it is the only one of its kind, and the most unqualified satisfaction. In operation daily at Deane's Warehouse, Show-rooms and Manufactory, opening to the Monument, 46, King William-street, London-Bridge.

JONES'S £4. 4s. SILVER LEVER WATCHES, warranted not to vary more than half a minute per week, are selling at the Manufactory, 338, Strand, opposite Somerset-house. They combine the truth of the instrument with the elegance of an ornament of taste. On receipt of a Post-office order for 1s. above the price, a Watch will be sent free to any part of the kingdom. Road Jones's "Sketch of Watch Work," sent free for a 3d. stamp.

FENDERS, STOVES, and FIRE-IRONS.—The LARGEST ASSORTMENT of STOVES and FENDERS, as well as GENERAL IRONMONGERY, in the World, is now on Sale at RIPPON and HUTTON'S extensive warehouses, 39, Oxford-street, corner of Newman street (just removed from Wells street). Bright steel fenders, to 4 feet from 36s. each; ditto do., with ornamental ornaments, from 60s.; rich stained steel do., with steel bar, 10s. 6d.; iron fenders, 3 feet, 3s. 6d.; 4 feet, 6s. do., 10s. do., and fitted with standards, 3 feet, 9s.; 4 feet, 11s.; wrought iron kitchen fenders, 3 feet, 18s. 4d.; 4 feet, 6s.; bright register stoves, with ornamental ornaments and two sets of bars, from 5 guineas; do. do., with ornola ornaments, from 49 10s.; black dining-room register stoves, 2 feet, 20s.; 3 feet, 28s.; bed-room register stoves, 2 feet, 16s.; 3 feet, 24s. The new economical Tierney stove, with fender and radiating hearthplate, from 28 5s.; fire-irons for chimneys 18d. per set; handsome do., with cut heads, 6s. 6d.;
newest pattern, with elegant bronzed heads, 11s. A variety of fire-irons, with ornola and rich cut heads, at proportionate prices. Any article in furnishing ironmongery, 50 per cent. under any other house, while the extent and variety of the stock is without any equal. The money returned for every article not approved of. Detailed catalogues, with engravings, sent (per post) free. Established in Wells-street, 1820.

Patroned by HER MAJESTY, H.R.H. PRINCE ALBERT, the Royal Family, and Nobility, and the several Sovereigns and Courts of Europe.

ROWLAND'S MACASSAR OIL, for the Growth and for Preserving and Beautifying the Human Hair. Price 3s. 6d., 7s., Family Bottles (equal to 12 small bottles) and 12s. 6d. each size, 21s.

ROWLAND'S KALYDOR for Improving and Beautifying the Skin and Complexion. Price 4s. 6d. and 8s. 6d. per bottle, duty included.

OR PEARL DENTIFRICE, renders the Teeth beautifully White, and preserves the Gums. Price 2s. 9d. per box, duty included.

CAUTION.
Unprincipled shopkeepers, for the sake of gaining a trifling profit, will pass off cheap and inferior compounds as the genuine "MACASSAR OIL," "KALYDOR," and "DENTIFRICE." It is therefore necessary on purchasing either article to see the word "ROWLAND'S" is on the Wrapper, and that "A.
ROWLAND & SON, 20, HATTON GARDEN," is on the Government stamp affixed on the KALYDOR and DENTIFRICE.

T H E L E G.
Reader, in following up our views, we beg to say a word or two upon "The Leg."
The human "Leg" by Nature is supplied
As a support of support on either side.
The "Leg" it was which first gave man the notion
Of gaining any part by locomotion.
Man with the "Leg" can move about at will;
And, but for this, he must, indeed, stand still.
With show, then, should such use him he deek it?
We ought to treat the "Leg" with great respect.
From MOSES many lessons may be learned
So far as "gentleness" may be concerned.
MOSES and SON have trousers at their Mart.
Which make the "Leg" look elegantly smart.
The human "Leg" may move with perfect ease
With such superior coverings as these.
They give the "Leg" new beauty in its form;
And in the winter they will keep it warm.
Then come all ye who have a "Leg" to walk,
And purchase trousers which are all the talk.
MOSES and SON your favours humbly beg;
And in return they'll not forget your "Leg."

THE LEAGUE.

No. 108.—VOL. III.]

SATURDAY, OCTOBER 18, 1845.

[3d.]

NOTICE TO THE PUBLIC.

LEAGUE FUND.

All Subscribers of £1 and upwards to the LEAGUE FUND will be entitled to, and receive, a copy weekly of this publication for twelve months from the date of the receipt of their subscription.

Subscribers of half-a-crown, and under £1, will have forwarded to them a copy of THE LEAGUE, containing an acknowledgment of their subscription; and it is requested that all subscribers will be kind enough to send their names and addresses to the offices of THE LEAGUE, Newall's-buildings, Manchester, or 67, Fleet-street, London.

N.B. As there is considerable risk in the transmission of gold and silver by post, parties wishing to forward small contributions to THE LEAGUE FUND are particularly requested to make their remittances by post-office orders.

The Council of the League would also suggest to their friends in the country the importance of transmitting their copies of THE LEAGUE newspaper, after perusal, to such parties (more especially farmers) as may be either hostile or indifferent to the question of Free Trade.

The Council of the League begs to announce that the List of Subscriptions for beds, to be presented to Agricultural labourers, is now completed. No further donation for that purpose can be received, as the amount already subscribed is quite equal to the number that can be furnished.

The Council also begs most cordially to thank the subscribers for their ready co-operation, and to assure them that their benevolent intentions will be carried into immediate effect.

By order of the Council,

JOSEPH HICKIN, Secretary.

We beg to inform our subscribers that bound volumes of the LEAGUE newspaper, containing the whole of the first year's Numbers, may be had on application at the offices, either in London or Manchester.

QUALIFY! QUALIFY! QUALIFY!

Now that the proceedings of the Revising Barristers' Courts are everywhere drawing to a close, we entreat all Free Traders in the counties, who are not in possession of the vote, to look out at once for qualifications. Those who have already placed their names upon the county lists, must canvass their neighbours to do likewise. There is now no doubt or difficulty about the possibility or the right of securing a county vote, either by single property or joint ownership. Everywhere the revising barristers have decided that the bonâ fide purchase of a freehold property, yielding a clear annual income of 40s., entitles the owner to a county vote. Some of the barristers have even declared their opinion that it is a commendable act to purchase property with the view of possessing the franchise. Not only is it praiseworthy to do so; but, in our opinion, it is disgraceful to every man above the rank of an unskilled labourer who does not aim at possessing a 40s. freehold. From what has been already done on a small scale in a few counties, we are satisfied that, by this simple and all but universally accessible avenue to power, the people of this country can secure for themselves the right to make good laws, and thus put down peaceably and constitutionally the undue ascendancy of a particular class. To be entitled to be upon the register next year, the freehold must be possessed before the 31st of January. The sooner the property is looked after, the better will be the chance of making a good bargain. We shall not enter into detailed instructions for the purchase of freeholds, but simply recommend our friends to intrust the business to lawyers who are known to be friends to Free Trade.

SOUTH LANCASHIRE OUR OWN!

Never, since the commencement of our seven years' struggle, have we had a more cheering and heart-stirring announcement for our constituents and friends, the Free Trade public—one sealing the labours of the past with a more decisive success, or giving more significant presage of the triumphs of the future—than that which the result of this year's registration now enables us to make. SOUTH LANCASHIRE IS OUR OWN! The battle of the Registration Courts is here fought and won. The untiring exertions, the unsleeping activity and vigilance, the admirable organisation, with which the Free Traders of South Lancashire have sought those constitutional franchises which guarantee social and industrial rights, are now crowned with victory. Once for all, South Lancashire belongs to the League. Rather, we would say—as South Lancashire “belongs” only to itself and the empire (it is counties like South Warwickshire that recognise proprietors)—South Lancashire is identified with the League—is the League. South Lancashire has, once for all, adopted, in the most formal and authentic manner, the principle of which the League is the exponent and organ. The monopolist majority of 600, which 15 months ago made Mr. Entwisle a monopolist legislator, is now, under the present registration, turned into a Free Trade majority of THREE THOUSAND. Never again will South Lancashire witness or enact the stupendous absurdity of a contest on the question of chaining or unchaining her own industry. The question is a question no longer, and there can be no contest without two parties. Come the next election when it may, South Lancashire will quietly return two Free Traders.

The industrial power of this country has now fairly measured its strength with feudalism, and gained a victory as brilliant as it will be fruitful of results. The “great families” which for centuries have ruled and represented South Lancashire, are now politically no more than the poorest of those artisans who constitute our new democratic landed interest. The Stanleys, the Egertons, the Scarisbrooks, the Gerards, just count as so many units. They have their votes—such of them as are commoners—like the rest of us, and that is all. As leaders and rulers of the people, they are extinct. They have set themselves against the spirit of the age, and they have found their master. They have pretended to stem the flood-tide of public intelligence, and they are swept away. Their attempt to crush the principles of commercial liberty, and obstruct the course of public right, has reacted in their own political annihilation.

This magnificent success of the popular power is virtually decisive of the Free Trade struggle. It is not merely that two monopolist members of the House of Commons are about to be replaced by two Free Trade members. South Lancashire counts for more than two in the House of Commons, as the landlords, and Sir Robert Peel, and the Post, and the Herald, and the Standard (poor Standard! which told us, fifteen months ago, that Mr. Entwisle's return was “decisive of the fate of the League”) are thoroughly well aware. In Parliament, and in the empire, South Lancashire counts for that which it really is—the type and embodiment of that commercial and manufacturing industry which makes Great Britain a first-class European power. How long, we should like to know, will any Minister—how long, especially, will such a Minister as Sir Robert Peel—dare to carry on the government of this commercial and manufacturing country on principles which are explicitly condemned by the numbers, wealth, intelligence, mental activity, and public spirit of South Lancashire? How long will any portion of the public press set itself in opposition to the voice of the county which supports nearly one-fourth of the popular literature of the age? Why, there is more of the empire in South Lancashire—more of everything that makes us an empire—than in half the southern counties together. South Lancashire is the seat of the great staple manufacture that supplies half of our exports—that sustains half of our external force and greatness. It is the home of the steam-engine, the birth-place of the locomotive and railroad, and the cradle of the League. Mechanical inventions which are changing the face of Europe, and a political organisation which is acting on the public opinion of the world, have alike their origin in South Lancashire. In its industrial organization, its free and active intellectual life, its triumphant applications of science to the arts, South Lancashire is the very type of modern progress—the condensed and epitomised expression of that industrial civilisation which all European nations are striving to imitate and rival. For any man to dream that the voice of South Lancashire, on an industrial question, only tells for as much as that of South Wilts or South Devon—or that South Lancashire, with its two Members of Parliament, exercises only two-thirds of the political power of Dorsetshire, with its three Members—would imply a state of mind, the correction of which we are contented to adjourn until the first week of the first session of the next Parliament.

We are perfectly sure that Sir Robert Peel comprehends the import of a registered Free Trade majority of 3000 in South Lancashire. Nay, more than this, we verily believe that underneath the husk and shell of political formalisms, trickeries, and conventionalisms in which the Minister is encased, “Sir Robert Peel has” (at times) “a heart after all,” to which these tidings of the triumphant course of the principles that he deems “sound” and “enlightened” will impart as lively an emotion of satisfaction as a hacknied Parliamentary politician and party tactician is capable of enjoying. There must be enough of the blood of old “Parsley Peel” still running in the Premier's veins to enable him to forget, for the moment at least, the entanglements of monopolist pledges, monopolist speeches, and monopolist party-ties, in the manly pride of seeing his own county head the movement for commercial and industrial enfranchisement. If it only reach him at a moment when Hansard is out of his head, we are quite certain Sir Robert Peel will regard the news from the South Lancashire registration courts as good news.

Most heartily do we congratulate all Free Traders on the successes of this year's registration; successes which, though most striking and decisive in the case of South Lancashire, are not by any means (as we shall take other opportunities of showing) confined to that district. The “virtual annual election” of the Registration Courts has yielded results which—whether viewed in their direct bearing with reference to the next great electoral conflict, or indirectly, as signs of the progress and tendencies of opinion—sufficiently indicate that the classes with whom rests, in the last resort, the sovereignty of the empire, are preparing themselves for the approaching and final struggle with the powers of feudalism.

REPORTED FAILURE OF THE POTATO-CROP IN IRELAND.

We have placed among our literary notices a historical account of the introduction of the potato into Ireland. Since that article was written, we have received the following letter from a resident landlord, the proprietor of extensive estates in the south of Ireland, who has been long and eminently distinguished for his intelligence and his patriotism.

“The accounts from various quarters of the state of the potato-crop are really fearful. The disease prevails extensively in the county of Cork; and since they have begun to dig the main crop, it is also found to prevail in this county (Waterford). Potatoes appearing sound when dug, in many instances have rotted in the heaps. If there is anything like a general failure, the consequences in this country will be awful. I have advised my tenants not to send their corn to market. Even if the failure is not very general, still from what already appears, the price of corn will be very high. If the failure is general, we shall want all our provisions at home to save the lives of our own people. In this case, to send corn to England will be out of the question. Our own corn will go but a short way in feeding the multitudes hitherto supported by potatoes. The Corn Laws can no longer be maintained. They have done too much mischief already by driving vast numbers in England as well as here to adopt potatoes as their principal food. The state of the potato crop here must seriously affect the subsistence of the people of England; but with us there is too great probability of absolute famine. As is truly observed in the last Number of THE LEAGUE, "Lower than potatoes, there is nothing but death by hunger."

The melancholy intelligence contained in this letter is confirmed from all quarters; every Irish paper contains fresh intelligence of ravages committed by the potato-disease in quarters where its presence was not suspected. So great is the alarm in Cork that several of the citizens have requested their chief magistrate to convene a public meeting on the subject; and his letter, in reply to this and some other suggestions, is well worthy of attention.

"I shall, as in duty bound, communicate to Government the very general opinion entertained here, that the potato crop is very much damaged; and not with a view to create unnecessary alarm, but to induce forethought, and a deliberate preparation for whatever events may result. In the time of the cholera the citizens of Cork experienced that awful affliction in a mitigated form, because they were prepared; let us now, without precipitateness or terror, attend to facts, and be prepared for whatever be the will of Providence respecting the condition of the food of the country. I would not think it as yet, and in this premature state of our knowledge, prudent to request Government to adopt any specific restrictions of provision export; it is the business and duty, however, of the authorities, to keep a strict watch on the state of agricultural productions, and to be ready to act firmly and promptly, if there be a proved necessity for interference. As to 'stopping the distilleries,' I deplore the fact that wholesome food is daily perverted into poison for the mind, the morals, and the body of mankind; but I hope that they may be stopped yet on higher grounds than even the important necessity of mitigating a temporary scarcity. The Government ought to know that every evil and mischief which befalls the people, is aggravated by the results of distillation; and of course, in spite of the loss of revenue, it ought to be discouraged. The corn crops will, no doubt, all be required, we hope, for increased labour on railways, increased payment of wages, and increased consumption of grain food; if all this combine with a deficient potato crop, the restrictive Corn Laws, it is hoped, will be first rendered nugatory by orders in council, and finally abrogated. The suggestions of some persons, 'to seek a prohibition of the export of potatoes,' requires cautious reflection; if they will not keep in pits, the sooner the poor people can get money for some of them the better, and if they do keep, there is a large crop in the country, which can spare a tenth without much injury to the general home supply. Restrictions on the freedom of trade should be a last resource; but if necessary, it must be boldly adopted. I am, Sir, your obedient,

"Oct. 10th, 1845. RICHARD DOWDEN (R), Mayor."

Mr. Dowden is not the only Irish magistrate who has deemed it necessary to place himself in communication with the Castle; several other functionaries in the South and West of Ireland have warned the Government of the alarming deficiency in the supply of the ordinary food of the Irish people, and have urged that precautionary measures should be immediately adopted to avert the frightful evils of famine. Among the suggestions made is the immediate opening of the ports to the produce of all nations—a step taken by Mr. Canning at a similar crisis, when his ministry was far weaker than that of Sir Robert Peel.

The judicious course taken by the Irish magistrates throws the responsibility of the future on the Government. In spite, not only of remonstrances, but of their own avowed convictions, that "the principles of Free Trade are the principles of common sense," they resolved to maintain the Corn Laws, and for the consequences of these laws they are answerable to the nation.

It appears from the latest accounts, that the harvests in the United States have been very abundant this year; and there is no doubt that if the ports were immediately opened, a fair supply might be expected in a few weeks; but if the measure be delayed, it is not improbable that Belgium and Holland, in both of which counties the Corn Laws have been suspended, will anticipate us in the markets of the United States. At this very moment there are vessels in the harbour of Cork taking in cargoes of potatoes for exportation to Rotterdam.

It is only justice to state that the Irish Government has taken proper steps to ascertain the extent of the evil, by sending commissioners to inquire into the state of the crops in the principal potato-growing districts of the south and west of Ireland; and that information has been sought from the several boards of Poor Law guardians. It will not do to trifle with the lives of millions, when the danger of famine is so imminent. If the reports sent to Government confirm the fearful apprehensions that are entertained, the ministers must open the ports by an Order in Council, and take their chance of an act of indemnity. There is little danger of their being refused; the sliding-scale is but as dust in the balance when compared with the peril of starvation to an entire people.

We cannot contemplate this state of things without feeling some astonishment at the fatuity with which the supporters of the Corn Laws have wilfully exposed the country to this imminent danger. The cry of not being dependent on foreigners has, at this moment, rendered us almost wholly dependent on foreign growers. The stocks, which under a system of Free Trade would have accumulated in our warehouses, are too low to afford any ground of confidence. Sudden want produces sudden demand, and supplies are wanting in the unexpected crisis.

Even should it appear on inquiry that the danger has been exaggerated, we shall have received solemn warning THAT THE EVIL IS POSSIBLE. It would argue little for the intelligence of our age and country if such a terrible contingency continued to be disregarded. Every one must now see that Free Trade in food can alone give us assurance of safety, and the further delay of the measure can only be regarded as an iniquitous tempting of Providence.

RAILWAY ENTERPRISE, AND THE CORN LAW.

Among the many new and grave considerations which the agricultural and commercial history of the present year has introduced into the Free Trade question, there is none which more imperiously claims the attention, both of our statesmen and of all classes of the community, than that suggested by the recent startling development of railway enterprise. It is not our business at present to warn the public against embarking in bubble speculations, or to attempt the task of checking the prevalent mania for share gambling; nor do we propose to follow our contemporaries of the press, in estimating the relation which the vast yet finite resources of British capital and industry sustain to that enormous expenditure of wealth and strength to which the country has committed, or is about to commit itself. Our object, in adverting to this subject, is simply to press on the public attention the fearful risks of embarking in any large, novel, and long-dated industrial enterprise, however intrinsically useful and profitable, with such a contingency impending over us as that to which we are annually exposed by the landlords' Corn Law.

The immense engagements to which, under the Railway Acts of the last two sessions, the capital and labour of Great Britain now stand pledged—not to speak of the very large addition to our obligations which will certainly be made by the legislation of 1846—may, or may not, be more than this country is, in the nature of things, capable of fulfilling. But there can be no doubt whatever that their fulfilment will task all our disposable strength—will require uninterrupted commercial prosperity, plentiful and regular supplies of every necessary of life, and an easy and steady money-market. Any considerable commercial reverse—any serious derangement of our monetary affairs—such as would infallibly ensue on a bad harvest, with the Corn Law unrepealed—would now be inconceivably calamitous. The railway schemes at present in progress, or in contemplation, are the product of plenty and prosperity, and they demand a continuance of plenty and prosperity as the necessary condition of their successful accomplishment. We have been taking for granted, with careless confidence, that we are to go on repeating, and repeating again, through an indefinite succession of years, the happy experience of this year and the last—that the next five years, or ten years, will one and all be like 1844 and 1845, and not like 1839 and 1840; and woe betide us if this easy and pleasant assumption be not realised! We have enlisted a vast army of labourers for a costly and protracted warfare, and are still beating up for fresh recruits; it is time to see to the state and prospects of our stores. We are about to venture on the portentous experiment of turning tens of thousands of our producers of food into consumers; and our straightened and impoverished agriculture, with this new and "peculiar burden," cannot afford to dispense with any available succedaneum. We are going to make a gigantic effort, and we have no strength to waste. With our capital and labour committed to the construction of thousands of miles of iron railway, we must run no needless risks. We must clear out of our way the frightful possibility of another 1839.

We hear much of "railway mania." But all the madness of private or corporate speculation is sober wisdom as compared with the national infatuation which plays this annual game of hazard against the elements. The worst and most fatal form of railway mania is that by which the Government and Legislature of the country are so deeply infected—the mania of acting, in matters of the largest and weightiest national concern, on an assumption which, with our present anti-commercial code, may break down any year—which must break down some year. By all the analogies of our past experience, it is, practically speaking, certain that within two, three, or four years from this time, we shall have such a harvest as will realise the worst terrors which haunted us ten weeks back. And it is also certain, that if such a harvest overtake us, with the law for keeping empty granaries still unrepealed, the blow will fall with cruel and crushing force on the "railway interest." The remembrance of those weeks of July and August last, during which "shares" trembled with every storm of hail and shower of rain, and the money articles of the daily papers were a sort of meteorological register, may sufficiently warn the railway interest, the country, and the Government, that those undertakings on which we are about to expend the surplus accumulation of a brief and precarious prosperity will be the first to feel, and the last to overcome, the effects of national exhaustion and collapse.

THE VASSALS OF THE HOUSE OF WARWICK.

If all popular constituencies were like that of South Warwickshire, and all popular candidates like Mr. Bolton King, the former "Radical" Member for the county town, we should beg to be excused from further attendances on so sorry a farce as that of electoral Government. We should greatly prefer feudalism simple, to the absurd and degrading hoax of feudalism with the forms and false pretences of popular representation. Here is a constituency of 4000 Englishmen looking on in gaping and servile stupidity, while Mr. Bolton King gives them in a present, with his best compliments, to the Earl of Warwick—that the Earl of Warwick may hand them over to his son, young Lord Brooke, or Master Brooke, a lad who is just now amusing himself somewhere on the Continent sight-seeing.

The great Guy himself had not a more patient and obsequious set of vassals than are the 4000 very humble and obedient servants of his modern lordship. If any one of these 4000 British electors were hiring an errand-boy, he would ask about the youth's character. If any one of them were about buying a horse, he would choose to satisfy himself as to the animal's "points." It is only in choosing a legislator for Great Britain, Ireland, and the British colonies in Europe, Asia, Africa, America, and Australia—an arbiter of the gravest questions of peace and war, taxation, commerce, and jurisprudence—that they one and all abdicate their independence and self respect, and resign every pretence of judgment and choice to obey a lord's conge d'elire.

When the landlords and farmers of Great Britain, under the wholesome compulsion of Free Trade and foreign competition, become agriculturists in real earnest, these shameful exhibitions of electoral subserviency and stupidity will, so far as the counties are concerned, gradually drop into desuetude. It is the tenancy-at-will system that turns counties into pocket boroughs; and it is the Corn Law—which promises high prices and high rents by a process totally disconnected from the business of agriculture—that at once enables and invites landlords to keep up a system so wasteful and mischievous. Electors are not allowed to elect, because, on the protectionist theory, votes are a more paying crop than corn. When landlords are made to look for their rents—not to parliamentary prices upheld by subservient suffrages—but to the improved value given to their land by intelligent tenants on lease, we may hope to witness the revival of the old principle of the British Constitution, that the Commons of England nominate the Commons' House of Parliament.

FAMILIAR LECTURES ON THE ELEMENTS OF POLITICAL ECONOMY.

BY THE EDITOR.

The sentimental economists, represented by Anti-Leaguer of the Morning Post, have, as has already been shown, endeavoured to confound all kinds of accumulation with the grasping and mercenary thirst for riches which passes under the name of avarice. They forget that accumulation is absolutely necessary to re-production; the farmer must save from the present harvest seed sufficient for his next operations, or he cannot reasonably expect to have a crop. If the sentimentalists could introduce a system of dissipation, the nation, like a thoughtless prodigal, might consume all its wealth in one season of riotous excess, and then be condemned to misery for futurity. The fact is, that the sentimentalist stops short at the accumulation, and does not follow capital, or at least follows it very imperfectly, into its uses and applications. We have already said that the use of capital is to provide for the consumption of value which must take place previous to the production of value; and every investment of capital in business is virtually a consumption of that capital which is to be replaced by the products of the business. It is obvious that no man will invest capital who has not a prospect of its being thus replaced.

This leads us to consider Anti-Leaguer's objections to machinery; and in the first place we have to remark, that scarcely any production is possible without some machinery. A plough is a machine, so is a spade, a saw, a hatchet, or even a pen; the plough turns up the earth more economically and more efficiently than men could with their hands and nails, but there are more men employed in turning up the earth, where the plough has been introduced, than there are in countries where the labourers have to work with their hands.

It is of some importance to show that machinery has been introduced not to supersede labour, but to prevent the unprofitable expenditure of labour. The labour of all rude nations, and of all uncultivated individuals, is labour with ignorance. Such labour consumes a larger amount of time and toil, while it yields a much smaller return than labour with knowledge. The sentimentalist is anxious that the people should be employed; the economist requires that they should be profitably employed: the former reasons as if the good was in the act of labour; the latter measures the benefit by the results of labour; the former, if he acted consistently, would applaud the vast expenditure of Louis XIV. on fortifications and palaces; the latter would condemn such a waste of labour and capital, both being sunk in works which yielded no return. Now capital invested in the form of machinery produces the largest amount of returns for the smallest expenditure of labour. Mr. Knight illustrates this principle by a reference to the railways and internal communications of the country; and as this subject engages a large share of the attention of the country, we shall extract the passage.

"Two hundred years ago—even one hundred years ago—in some places fifty years ago—the roads of England were wholly unfit for general traffic and the conveyance of heavy goods. Pack-horses mostly carried on the communication in the manufacturing districts. The roads were as unfit for moving commodities of bulk, such as coal, wool, and corn, as the sandy roads of Poland are at the present day. Bad roads in Poland double the original price of wheat by the cost of conveyance a very few miles. Bad Corn Laws in England prevent the natural course of commercial exchange, which would very soon mend the Polish roads from the corn-field to the sea-port. The great principle of exchange between one part of this island and another part, which has ceased to be an affair of restrictions and jealousies, has covered this island with good roads, with canals, and finally with railways. The railway and the steam-carriage have carried the principle of diminishing the price of conveyance, and therefore of commodities, by machinery, to an extent which makes all other illustrations almost unnecessary. A road with a waggon moving on it is a mechanical combination; a canal, with its locks and towing-paths, and boats gliding along almost without effort, is a higher mechanical combination; a railway, with its locomotive engine, and carriage after carriage dragged along at the rate of thirty miles an hour, is the highest of such mechanical combinations. The force applied upon a level turnpike-road, which is required to move 1800 lbs., if applied to drag a canal boat, will move 55,500 lbs., both at the rate of $2\frac{1}{2}$ miles per hour. But we want economy in time as well as economy in the application of motive power. It has been attempted to apply speed to canal travelling. Up to four miles an hour the canal can convey an equal weight more economically than a railroad; but after a certain velocity is exceeded, that is $13\frac{1}{2}$ miles an hour, the horse on the turnpike-road can drag as much as the canal team. Then comes in the great advantage of the railroad. The same force that is required to draw 1900 lbs. upon a canal at a rate above $13\frac{1}{2}$ miles an hour, will draw 14,400 lbs. upon a railway, at the rate of $13\frac{1}{2}$ miles an hour. Who can doubt that the cost of consumption is diminished by machinery, when the producers and consumers are thus brought together, not only at the least cost of transit, but at the least expenditure of time?

"If we add to the road, the canal, and the railway, the steam-boat traffic of our own coasts, we cannot hesitate to believe that the whole territory of Great Britain and Ireland is more compact, more closely united, more accessible, than was a single county two centuries ago. It may be said, without exaggeration, that it would now be impossible for a traveller in England to set himself down in any situation where the post from London would not reach him in eighteen hours. When the first edition of 'The Results of Machinery' was published in 1831, we said that the post from London would reach any part of England in three days; and that 'fifty years before, such a quickness of communication would have been considered beyond the compass of human means.' In fourteen years we have so diminished the practical amount of distance between one part of Great Britain and another, that the post from London to Aberdeen is only thirty-six hours. In a few years it will be even less. Railways are producing these wonderful changes; and in connection with railways and improved roads and steam-ships, the mental labourers have been at work with improved organisation to make the condition of all other labourers more advantageous.

"Roads, canals, steam-ships, railways, are each and all machines for diminishing the cost of transport, whether of commodities or of human beings. They create labour, they lower and equalise prices. About twenty years ago a new road was made, at the expense of Government, through a barren country, which presented an impassable barrier to communication between Limerick, Cork, and Kerry. We will take one example of the instantaneous benefit of this road-making, as described by a witness before Parliament:—'A hatter, at Castle-island, had a small field through which the new road passed: this part next the town was not opened until 1826. In making arrangements with him for his damages, he said that he ought to make me (the engineer) a present of all the land he had, for that the second year I was at the roads he sold more hats to the people of the mountains alone, than he did for seven years before to the high and low lands together.'

"The hatter of Castle-island got comfort and prosperity by the roads, because the man who had to sell and the man who had to buy were brought closer to each other by means of the roads. When there were no roads, the hatter kept his goods upon the shelf, and the labourer in the mountains went without a hat. When the labourer and the hatter were brought together by the roads, the hatter soon sold off his stock, and the manufacturer of hats went to work to produce him a new stock; while the labourer, who found the advantage of having a hat, also went to work to earn more money, that he might pay for another when he should require it. It became a fashion to wear hats, and of course a fashion to work hard, and to save time, to be able to pay for them. Thus the road created industry on both sides, on the side of the producer of hats and that of the consumer.

"What the new Irish road did for the hatter of Castle-island, the railroads of England and Scotland have done, and are doing, for our millions of producers and consumers. But it may be held by some that railways, as far as passenger communication goes, are inventions for the benefit of the rich and the pleasure-seeking. Parliament thought otherwise when it enacted, in 1844, that upon every railway there should be a train once a day provided for third-class passengers, in carriages with seats, and protected from the weather, which should take up and set down passengers at every station, and the fare not to exceed one penny per mile. If all railway proprietors had understood their own interests, none would have waited for a legislative enactment to carry third-class passengers at a penny a mile. But before this Act of Parliament was passed, the penny-a-mile passengers formed an important class of travellers. From the 1st of July, 1842, to the 30th of June, 1843, sixty-six railways then in operation in the United Kingdom received from passengers and for the conveyance of goods the enormous sum of four million five hundred and thirty-five thousand pounds. Of this sum three million one hundred and ten thousand pounds was received from passengers, amounting to more than twenty-three million persons. Of these, six million five hundred thousand were third-class passengers, who paid four hundred and eleven thousand pounds, being upon an average fifteen pence for each. It is evident that the third-class passengers went short distances, some less than fifteen miles, some more. Can any one doubt that the free interchange of labour is promoted in an unexampled degree by such railway communication?"

We have already shown that a large amount of consumption is involved in every production, and it must be remembered that the value of every article consumed is utterly destroyed and lost. Whatever, therefore, facilitates production, effects a saving on the consumption necessary to the production of that particular commodity, and thereby adds the amount of that saving to the working capital of the community. Suppose that an artificer in Plymouth was thrown out of work, and that he heard of employment to be obtained in Manchester. If there were no mechanical means of transport it would take him 14 or 15 days to get from one place to the other. During that space of time his labour of travelling would be unproductively wasted, his time would yield him no wages, and the provisions he consumed on the road would equally form a part of a dead loss; but if there were railroads open the whole line he would effect the passage in a day; and instead of coming foot-sore and weary to his work, he would arrive in Manchester fresh and vigorous. His fare would probably not amount to more than half the cost of the provisions that he would have consumed had he walked. Here we have machinery displacing 14 or 15 days' labour of the pedestrian, and yet the most insane of the sentimentalists would not assert that the workman was thereby injured. The labour displaced was unproductive, and the displacement afforded him an opportunity to devote his time to profitable and productive labour. But this benefit extends beyond the individual; for the consumption that has been saved, and the amount of production effected during the time gained by expeditious transit, are not only added to the profits of the individual but to the stock of values that make up the capital of the country.

Now the effect of every mechanical improvement and invention is just the same as that which we have shown to result from the railway; that is, to economise the time and labour necessary to produce a given result. If a piece of cloth woven by hand required 15 days for its completion, and if, by the use of machinery, it could be perfected in one day, the saving of 14 days' labour to the producer is just as obvious as the similar saving to the traveller by railway; the one is spared as much unprofitable labour of the hand as the other was unprofitable labour of the feet. In both cases there has been a displacement of labour; but in neither case can this be regarded as injurious to the operative. Let us take another example from Mr. Knight's admirable little work.

"The present Pasha, or chief ruler of Egypt, in one of those fits of caprice which it is the nature of tyrants to exhibit, ordered, a few years ago, that the male population of a district should be set to clear out one of the ancient canals which was then filled up with mud. The people had no tools, and the Pasha gave them no tools; but the work was required to be done. So to work the poor wretches went, to the number of fifty thousand. They had to plunge up to their necks in the filthiest slime, and to bale it out with their hands, and their hands alone. They were fed, it is true, during the operation; but their food was of a quality proportioned to the little profitable labour which they performed. They were fed on horse-beans and water. In the course of one year, more than thirty thousand of these unhappy people perished. If the tyrant, instead of giving labour to fifty thousand people, had possessed the means of setting up steam-engines to pump out the water, and scoop out the mud—if he had even provided the pump which is called Archimedes' screw, and was invented by that philosopher for the very purpose of draining land in Egypt—if the people had even had scoops and shovels, instead of being degraded like beasts, to the employment of their unassisted hands—the work might have been done at a fiftieth of the cost, even of the miserable pittance of horse-beans and water; and the money that was saved by the tools and machines, might have gone to furnish profitable labour to the thousands who perished amidst the misery and degradation of their unprofitable labour.

“Some may say that this is a case which does not apply to us, because we are free men, and cannot be compelled to perish, up to our necks in mud, upon a pittance of horse-beans, doled out by a tyrant. Exactly so. But what has made us free? Knowledge. Knowledge,—which, in raising the moral and intellectual character of every Englishman, has raised up barriers to oppression which no power can ever break down. Knowledge,—which has set ingenious men thinking in every way how to increase the profitable labour of the nation, and therefore to increase the comforts of every man in the nation. Is it for the working men of this country, or for any other class of men, to say that knowledge shall stop at a certain point, and shall go no farther? Is it for them to say, that although they are willing to retain the infinite blessings which knowledge has bestowed upon them—the improved food, the abundant fuel and water, the cheap clothing, the convenient houses, the drainage and ventilation which make houses healthful, the preservation of life by medical science, and the profit and comfort of books—that we are to rest satisfied with what we have got: or rather, if the haters of machinery are to be heard, that we are to go back to what we were five hundred years ago? Depend upon it, if we once begin to march backwards, however slow may be the first steps, the retreat towards ignorance, instead of the advance towards knowledge, will soon become pretty quick; till at last there would be one mad rush from civilisation to uncivilisation. Then comes the labour of the despot, who has been comparatively idle while knowledge was labouring. There is no halting-place then; and the mud and horse-beans of the Pasha of Egypt will be the natural end, and the fit reward of such monstrous folly and wickedness.”

It is very hard to get the sentimentalists to define precisely the nature of their opposition to machinery; they will not tell us at what improvement their principle of applying discouragement and taxation should commence. A waggoner having a long whip can drive a long team of horses: we are not told whether it is proposed to tax long whips, and to compel the waggoner to have a driver for every pair of horses. But how does this differ in principle from a proposal to limit the number of spindles to be driven on a single mule-frame? The waste of the labour of the drivers with short whips is the same in effect as the waste of the labour of the spinners with single-decked mules, and we wonder that the absurdity so palpable in the one case is not equally manifest in the other.

Those who clamour for a tax on machinery forget that it is subject to a very heavy tax already; every new improvement deteriorates the value of the capital invested in old machinery, and many instances could be quoted to show that this is a far more onerous tax than is generally supposed. There are some other relations between labour and capital in the form of machinery, which the sentimentalists have so misrepresented as to render it necessary to examine them with attention.

THE LEAGUE BAZAAR.

(From the Manchester Guardian of Wednesday.)

This fancy fair, which opens to day in the Free Trade Hall, offers to the world-wide renowned liberality of the Free Traders of this town and district, another opportunity for the exercise of their generous encouragement to the cause of commercial freedom. It is, besides, an agreeable réunion for the fellow-workers in that cause; a sort of “high change” where they may look to find their collaborators, and where especially the ladies, by their presence and their exertions, gracefully exercise their prerogative, and do what they can for the abolition of monopolies and the promotion of Free Trade. The Free Trade Hall, which has contained within its walls so many various gatherings for purposes of philanthropy and patriotism, and where the charms of music and the dance have often contributed to the funds of worthy and benevolent objects, appears to day in a new and gay attire in honour of this, the second bazaar held within its walls. The stalls are loaded with a countless number and variety of articles, so that even the most fastidious may find something to purchase, at once pleasing and useful. Looking over the printed catalogue, we are of opinion that the useful (in which we include all the various models, processes, and specimens of different textile and other manufactures) predominates over the fancy departments; and this, we believe, is just what should be, to meet the tastes of the community of Manchester. As the bazaar is open only six days, those who intend to be present should lose no time, as the hall will undergo another metamorphosis next week, for the grand soirée of the Athenæum on the Thursday evening, and therefore the bazaar must close on the preceding Tuesday.

[We hoped to have furnished our readers with a descriptive account of the opening of the Bazaar in our present Number; but owing to some unaccounted for delay, it has not reached us. We shall next week, however, give full particulars.]

(From the Times.)

The quarterly table of the revenue exhibits a decrease of so formidable an aspect as at first to remind us of the days when it was thought sagacity to leave an odd million or two fructifying in the pockets of the people, however much they might be desolated in the Treasury. Those, however, were days of increasing deficit. The minus quantity in the present instance is only by comparison with the last year. Still it is enough to stagger the firmest believer in Sir Robert Peel. Under the head of customs, the decrease on the quarter is 1,154,492*l.*; on the year, 1,560,953*l.* We hasten, however, to assuage the terrors which this simple announcement is likely to produce, not only in the Ministerial partisan, but in the minds of all who love their country or even themselves. The decrease on the quarter is more than accounted for by two important considerations. It was in this quarter last year that about 800,000*l.* was paid on the import of foreign corn, raising the quarterly customs to the unusual sum of six millions. This year, unfortunately for the Exchequer, wheat has not risen to quite a starvation price, so there is very little to set off against that large item. As this is the most noticeable feature in the present table, we will shortly return to it. The other explanatory circumstance is the great reduction of the sugar duties, computed at 1,700,000*l.* in the year, and therefore not less than 500,000*l.* on this particular quarter, assuming the quantity imported to be the same as last year. For the reduction or entire abolition of other duties, including that on cotton, we may set down probably more than a loss of 100,000*l.* on the quarter. These three sums amount to 1,400,000*l.*, which by our dead reckoning ought to be the loss under the head of customs alone. The actual loss is only 1,154,492*l.*, as above stated. The difference therefore between these two sums, being about 250,000*l.*, may be set down as so much increase in the revenue from our regular imports, and may fairly be ascribed to the increased prosperity of the country, i.e., as some will put it, to the credit of Sir Robert Peel.

Under the head of excise, the decrease on the quarter is only the nominal sum of 578*l.* We believe people were generally prepared for a result showing the policy of large reductions on the excise. Every one, for example, who happens to have had experimental proof of it, is aware, to his inconvenience and cost, that the glass manufacturers are quite unable to meet the increased demand. Few, however, could be prepared for the fact of the revenue's so speedily filling up the gap of a reduction. The Property-tax presents a decrease of 134,888*l.*, which we can only ascribe to some accidental reason, such as a change in the method of collection; unless the triennial renewal of the burden has found the victims rather more knowing and shifty. The stamps show an increase of more than 100,000*l.*, symptomatic of an unusual commercial activity. On the whole, the total decrease on the quarter, after deducting the increase, is 560,973*l.*, which, considering how much we were getting before-hand in our money affairs, and how thriving we are just now at least, is not very alarming.

The present table illustrates with unusual force a very remarkable, and we will add, a very unseemly result of the sliding scale. Government is made to appear dependent for a large item of its revenue on a certain accident which must be considered a national calamity. When corn is less plentiful and dearer, when consequently there is less to be spent in wages, and the bulk of the people must be worse off, then Government gets its windfall of a million or so from the importation of foreign corn. “It is an ill wind that blows nobody any good,” applies to many professions, more or less honourable, which depend on the inevitable misfortunes of humanity. But it must be wrong to raise the storm for the sake of its wrecks. We have heard of a northern port which long successfully opposed the erection of a lighthouse on a neighbouring promontory, because it was considered prejudicial to the interests of the port, as a harbour of refuge, and because certain influential inhabitants of the town trafficked in wrecks and salvage. But men generally prefer to live on the prosperity of their fellow-creatures. A percentage on lives preserved is better than one on lives lost. It is more agreeable to live by feeding and clothing than by starving and reducing to nakedness. It would then be far pleasanter to look to the quarterly or annual produce of the corn duties, if corn duties there are to be, as significant of national abundance, rather than as a certain consequence of death.

Besides, consider the intricacy in which we manage to lose ourselves by this arrangement. Last year the Minister got about a million on the import of corn; this year he gets next to nothing. Unquestionably the country has been better able to pay that sum this year than last year, for more can be spared for public purposes out of a large private accumulation than out of a small one. But as the matter stands, a bad year gives a good revenue—a good year a bad one. The short harvest of 1843 helped to give the Premier his magnificent surplus. The abundant harvest of 1844, the most abundant England has ever seen, appears likely to pinch him not a little. He remits taxes, and makes grand speculations of increasing prosperity on the strength of having three millions to spare. Nature is more than kind, and the country more than prosperous. Are his speculations, therefore, more than realised? On the contrary, the well-intentioned kindness of Nature has cut away a third of his surplus. We do not say the Premier is not interested in a good harvest, either in heart or in position. Every season is a special Godevid which puts off that evil day when the drama, or rather the farce, of protection will be concluded by the catastrophe of an irremediable famine. The Premier lives by good harvests, though they help to starve his pockets and defeat his calculations. We are pointing out the game of cross purposes in which he is involved. It cannot be right that the interests of the Exchequer should run directly counter to those of the nation; that a short harvest should be made to produce a show of prosperity which a good harvest is next year to disappoint; that extraordinary taxes should be made to occur just when they are least capable of being borne; and that a financial system, hoping to be tolerably permanent, should be based on the conflicting conditions of death producing a national revenue and abundance producing a general prosperity.

THE GLORIOUS UNPAID.

(From the Nonconformist.)

“Oh, send him to me, and I'll give him a month!” is, we believe, one of those forms of neighbourly courtesy, with which gentlemen of the bench gratify the vindictive feelings of their friends, when annoyed by having their path crossed in any way by the poor. “I'll give him a month!” as though it were a matter of no greater importance than just administering physic to an ailing dog. The shame, albeit no crime has been committed, the separation from home, the laceration of domestic ties, the removal of the main prop of a poor man's family, the consequent destitution of wife and children meanwhile, debts incurred requiring a twelve-month's self-denial to wipe off—all this is as nothing to some of your rural and clerical “unpaid,” when a favour is to be done to a gentleman, who wishes to rid himself of some trivial annoyance, or gratify a petty spite. Let Sir James Graham vouch for the integrity and kindness of the justices of England—it is all in the way of his business; we do not hesitate to aver our belief that the records of magisterial conduct, could they but be sifted, contain stories, by no means unfrequent, of heartless cruelty and oppression which not Russia or Egypt could outmatch.

Our readers will probably remember the cases of Thomas Lakin and Ann Ward, committed to Leicester county gaol for the crime of having been unable to pay a poor's rate, in April last, being brought under the notice of the Houses of Parliament. The rate, in that instance, having been paid by a charitable gentleman, Thomas Lakin was released, and afterwards re-committed for inability to pay costs. The illegality and inhumanity of the course pursued were admitted and condemned by the Lord Chancellor and by the Home Secretary, and the poor man was liberated by Sir James Graham's order, just three days before his term of imprisonment had expired. Well, the unhappy victim is again in prison for the same crime—inability to pay, out of wages averaging 9*s.* 8*d.* per week, a rate to the poor, after having satisfied his landlord, and provided, with the remaining 8*s.*, a scanty support for a wife and four children, the eldest eleven years old, and blind, and the youngest barely 12 months. Here is little more than a shilling a day with which to furnish sustenance to six persons; and, because no surplus remains for the poor (save the mark!) Lakin is sent a third time to gaol. The committing magistrates are R. G. Cresswell, Esq., and the Reverend (yes! we will give him his title) the Reverend Sir Nigel Gresley. Is R. G. Cresswell, Esq., he of the Loughborough bench, the bad fame of which has reached the extremities of the empire? If so, we are not surprised at his decision. He, it appears, was one of the committing magistrates on the first occasion of poor Lakin's imprisonment, and we believe he usually discharges this function of his office with evident relish. The wonder to us is, how, in both instances, he managed to find a pliant or sympathising colleague; but we are told clerical magistrates reserve their mercy for the gospel, and pique themselves upon severity in the administration of law. We beg to congratulate the worthy pair. They must have enjoyed a good day's sport. It is not every day that gentlemen have a chance of running down incarnate poverty merely for its own sake. Here there was everything to give them unalloyed satisfaction. The man's destitution is attested by the fact, that even the little furniture which he uses belongs to his landlord. He can show an excellent character, too, which makes the sport of worrying him to the grave all the more exciting. And to crown all, he has been hunted before, and must therefore be all the more sensitive to this cruel infliction. Could R. G. Cresswell, Esq., find anything more felicitously suited to his taste?

Seriously, however, we protest that it was a burning disgrace to the character of the British Government that this man was not cushioned from his office, when his doings were last under the notice of the House of Commons. Can it be, that the Times is absorbed in surveying its own broad sheets of advertisements?—otherwise, how is it that we have not heard its thunder? We hope some steps will be taken to bring the matter under the special notice of the Home Office, and that as supersedeas cannot safely be sent to Ireland, to discourage Orangism, two may be spared for the Ashby-de-la-Zouch Bench, where they will do a world more good.

MEETING OF PIECERS.—On Wednesday evening, a public meeting of the piecers was held, in the room of an empty mill, in Bentinck-street, Ashton, for the purpose of taking into consideration the propriety of demanding from the spinners an advance of 20 per cent. upon their present prices. The meeting, which was numerously attended, was addressed by a number of the older piecers; and a resolution was agreed to, that shop meetings should be called, to consider the best means to be adopted for carrying their object. It was also resolved, that, after the opinion of the piecers of the various mills had been obtained, another public meeting should be called, at which ulterior measures should be adopted.—Manchester Guardian.

CONSUMPTION OF SUGAR IN EUROPE AND NORTH AMERICA.

(From the Economist.)

The following interesting calculation of the entire consumption of sugar in Europe, the United States, and the British Colonies has been made by Mr. Frederick Scherer, after many and careful inquiries, for which his extensive connections with the sugar trade throughout Europe afford him peculiar facilities:

"CONSUMPTION OF SUGAR.—Having attempted to ascertain the actual consumption, as well as the entire production, of the important article of sugar, I now submit to my friends the result of my inquiries. Extreme accuracy can, of course, hardly be expected; but I have no reason to apprehend that I have committed any material error. For corrections, accompanied by official returns or authentic proofs, I shall feel greatly obliged.

"It will be seen that the average consumption of the 278 millions of civilised people, which my inquiry embraces, is about 6 2-5 lbs. per head per annum, or at the rate prevailing in the Custom House Union.

"The following table is curious, and may lead to some useful conclusions:

Country	Consumption	Per head	Total
In Russia ..	26-10	pr hd.	198,000
Austria ..	8-10	—	324,000
France ..	12-10	—	1,017,000
Holl., Belg., &c.	12-10	—	1,501,000
United States	18	—	2,231,000
Great Britain	19	—	2,357,000

If the consumption were equal to what is allowed to persons in English workhouses, according to Mr. Child, 24 lbs. per annum, it would amount to 4,219,000. To what is allowed to sailors in the British Navy, two ounces per day, would amount to 5,662,000. To what is probably used among the middling classes in England, namely 1 lb. per individual in the week, would amount to 6,453,000.

"There can be no doubt that, with a general reduction of duties, the use of this article might be enormously increased, and since it is certain that the greater the demand the cheaper will commodities be supplied, such increase would open an unbounded field for enterprise, commerce, and colonization. It is to be hoped that governments will take this into consideration, and relieve the article from the heavy burthens and restrictions under which it now labours almost in every country. Thus, sources for industry and enjoyment might be opened to the enormous mass of people enumerated by me, to an extent exceeding almost the flights of the most sanguine imagination."

THE GAME LAWS.—Yesterday week, Thos. Higgins, of Aylesbury, was summoned before the Wakefield magistrates for an offence against the Game Laws. Higgins, who is a farm labourer, was proceeding to his work early in the morning, and picked up a hare, which he found dead in a wheat field: being observed by the game keeper, the poor fellow was taken into custody. The hare had been caught in a snare, but there was no evidence to prove that the prisoner was in any way connected with poachers. He was proceeding to work, with his squire over his shoulder, to a field adjoining that in which the hare was found, when he accidentally saw the animal, and naturally enough took possession. Higgins was fined in a penalty and costs amounting to 5l., and in default he was sent to the House of Correction for three months. —Leeds Mercury.

THE WEATHER, THE CROPS, AND THE CORN TRADE.

(From the Mark Lane Express.)

The very wet, unfavourable weather experienced during the week, has done so much injury to that portion of the crops still abroad in the northern counties, as to render it next to impossible for the grain to be secured in any other than the worst condition, however auspicious the weather may hereafter become. When rain occurs early in the season, its effects may frequently be almost wholly remedied; but the year is now too far advanced to admit us to hope that the mischief done in the present case can be repaired; the shortness of the days, the diminished power of the sun, and the heavy night dews, all tend to prevent that which has been thoroughly saturated with wet being easily dried, except by artificial means; the corn which has been exposed in the fields to the frequent heavy showers of the past fortnight (and the quantity is, we are sorry to learn, considerable) must therefore inevitably be carted in a damp state. In some localities, where there have been heavy floods, a portion will be entirely lost, and that part saved can scarcely be expected to be in fit order for thrashing for months to come; so far, therefore, from any improvement having taken place in our prospects, there is reason to fear that the result of the harvest—taking the kingdom collectively—will prove even more unfavourable than was before apprehended; and there can no longer be any doubt that fine old wheat will become more valuable in proportion as it is found to be required for mixing with the damp, inferior qualities of new. That the quantity left over of last year's crop is trifling, is generally admitted; whilst it is an undoubted fact, that of free foreign very little remains in the country. It is true that we have about half a million of quarters of wheat in bond in the kingdom, and it is possible that somewhat about 100,000 quarters may arrive before winter puts a stop to shipments from the Baltic; but even were the whole of this quantity immediately released, we doubt whether it would have any material influence on prices. In the present position of affairs it is not likely, however, that importers will enter for home consumption, as by leaving their property under lock, they will be in a position to take advantage of the fall which must, later in the year, occur in the duty.

The trade in wheat has, since our last, been active, and not only has the previously established advance been maintained, but a further rise in prices has taken place at many of the principal markets. Notwithstanding the inducement held out by the present remunerating rates, farmers have manifested very little anxiety to part with their wheat, and the deliveries have rather fallen off than increased; buyers have, on the other hand, deemed it prudent to make further addition to their stocks, and at present we can discover no symptoms of a reaction.

Our advices from Scotland speak very despondingly of the weather, and the progress made with harvest operations in that country. Even in the neighbourhood of Edinburgh much of the corn is still, we are informed, in the fields; and in the backward localities immense injury has, it is feared, been done by the heavy and constant rain; as, however, the prospects in respect to quantity were previously very good, it was still hoped that—though the quality would be inferior—about an average produce would be secured. These remarks apply more particularly to oats, the staple crop of the country; wheat appears there, as with us, to have suffered from the want of warmth and excess of moisture during the summer months, and is therefore expected to be short in yield.

Ireland appears to have been visited with similar weather to that experienced on this side of the Channel; and a good deal of injury is said to have been done in the later districts, not only to the corn remaining abroad, but also to the potatoes. These reports, and the rise in the English markets, had caused holders of grain to demand higher terms; and at the principal markets the value of wheat and oats had tended upwards.

A lively inquiry for bonded wheat has prevailed throughout the week; and had importers been disposed to have accepted former terms, extensive transactions would probably have been entered into. The very high rates asked have to a certain degree checked business; still some rather large sales were concluded on Friday for good to fine high-mixed Dantzic wheat at 58s. to 59s. per quarter, and for a lot of old red Königsberg 52s. 6d. per quarter was paid. There was very little Lower Baltic red wheat offering as low as 50s., and for fine heavy Rostock sellers declined accepting less than 52s., making the rise from Monday fully 2s. per quarter.

As yet the duty remains at 18s. per quarter; but the averages are now coming high even from the agricultural districts, and a full must take place before the end of the month; whilst from the present position of affairs, we are inclined to think that wheat will, ere the termination of the year, be admissible at 10s. or 12s. per quarter, if not lower.

The millers have shown some unwillingness to enter into forward contracts to deliver flour, expecting a further rise in the value of the article. Ship flour was decidedly dear on Friday, as was also Canadian and United States.

Though that portion of the oat crop which was secured early yielded well to the acre, and proves of good quality, so large a proportion of the harvest is yet abroad in Ireland and Scotland that it has become doubtful whether the total quantity will come up to the estimates formed of the yield earlier in the year. This, and the disease by which the potatoes have everywhere been attacked—a circumstance which must cause a greatly increased consumption of oatmeal—may account for the firm tone which holders of oats have this week assumed. On Wednesday few factors were willing to sell at former prices, and on Friday an advance of 6d. to 1s. per quarter was established without difficulty, not only on home-grown, but likewise on free foreign oats.

In the early part of the week prices of beans had rather a downward tendency, but the continued wet weather, and the probability of the outstanding crop being much injured thereby, gave rise to a more lively demand on Friday, when the slight depression was completely recovered.

Peas were also much more sought after at the close than in the commencement of the week, and neither white, blue, nor maples could be secured on so easy terms on Friday as on Monday.

The animated character of the English advices have, as might naturally be supposed, had considerable influence on the value of wheat on the Continent.

All over the Baltic the rise has been quite as great as in this country, and it is now certain that we shall have to pay very high prices to secure any quantity of wheat abroad. By the latest accounts from Dantzic (the 14th of October) we learn that the finer kinds of High mixed were held at 54s. to 55s. per quarter, free on board.

Letters from Stettin of the 14th inst. state, that though the harvest had been brought to a close in that neighbourhood under favourable circumstances, the quality and yield of the grain being alike good, still the value of wheat had, in consequence of the complete exhaustion of the stocks of old, and the expectation that Great Britain, Holland, and Belgium will all require supplies from the Baltic, risen considerably.

At Rostock, on the 6th of October, such high prices were asked for wheat as greatly to check business. The quality of the new Pomeranian wheat is highly spoken of, but no supplies of importance were expected at Rostock till the winter had set in; and the stocks of old having been greatly reduced, it was not anticipated that much business would be done till after the shipping season had terminated.

From the southern parts of Europe we have also advices of rising prices. A letter from Leghorn, dated October 5, informs us that a very lively inquiry for wheat has been experienced there. Most of the purchases had been from Holland and Belgium. Subsequently a rise had taken place, and on the 5th inst. there were no sellers of soft Marano or the best Polish Odessa below 30s. 2d. per quarter.

From Odessa the accounts are also lively: letters dated 26th of September state that good qualities of wheat had again risen there 1s. 6d. per quarter. There was still a good stock on hand, and rather large arrivals were expected.

The following is Messrs. Fowler and Tunncliffe's circular, dated Liverpool, Tuesday, October 14, 1845:—"During last week we had increasing firmness evinced on the part of holders here, and although the business effected was not extensive, rather higher prices must have been paid for wheat, flour, and oatmeal, had purchasers appeared. Yesterday's post brought us from parties in Ireland (on whose statements we can place complete reliance) very grievous accounts of the potato crops. We have also a similar report from Staffordshire. As yet, in this immediate district, though complaints are general, they are not of quite so serious a character as above alluded to. The position of this swarming kingdom at the present time is, in our judgment, not quite so satisfactory as some are disposed to paint it: in the first place the deficiency in the weight of wheat per bushel, as compared with last year, will be equal to about one million quarters; and, without glancing at the failure of the potato crops, it is well ascertained that the yield of wheat, not to speak of the diminished produce of flour, from the inferior quality of the wheat, will fall short of an average, and at the present moment a considerable quantity of wheat remains ungathered in the fields, receiving, for the last few weeks, almost continuous rain; we grant this is a gloomy picture, but it is one which, in our uncertain climate, we are any season liable to, and the only mitigating feeling which arises under such circumstances, is the conviction, that considering our vast population, the glaring insanity of our make-scarce bread law, with all its fettering, withering effect upon commercial enterprise, and all its biting tendency upon those whose means are scanty, will become more and more apparent. Exported to Ireland from the 7th to the 13th instant inclusive, 50 barrels of flour. Coastwise, 186 quarters of wheat, 312 quarters of Indian corn, 67 sacks, and 94 barrels of flour. This morning's market fully attended, and a large business was passing, chiefly to consumers. We note an advance of 4d. per 70 lbs. on wheat; 2d. per 45 lbs. on oats; 1s. per quarter on barley, peas, and beans; 2s. per sack and barrel on flour; and 2s. per 240 lbs. on oatmeal.

THE POTATO DISEASE.

The most recent accounts from various parts of Ireland represent the potato malady as spreading to a frightful extent, and exciting the most lively apprehensions for the poor, whose staple article of diet is thus threatened with destruction. Connaught as yet appears to have escaped the disease, but accounts from the other provinces are exceedingly gloomy.

Thus, a letter from Lismore says, in the Cork Constitution—"A great outcry in this neighbourhood about potatoes. If the injury be as extensive as is reported, I fear we shall have a famine next summer." In the neighbourhood of Killeagh, near Youghal, a gentleman who had 60 men engaged for two days in digging, found, out of the quantity thrown up, between 30 and 40 barrels perfectly useless, and which he could not allow to be mixed with the others.

The Limerick Chronicle of Saturday writes:—"We are much concerned to state, that the prevalent distemper in the potato crop has been this week found to extend its fearful ravages to the county of Limerick, and the fields on several farms show unequivocal symptoms of the rot or canker in the potato. At Cahirell the disease was first observed, and subsequently at Fedamore, where 12 acres were opened, and the spade labourers left off work on finding the plant was not worth raising; the evil was also apparent at Coolyhenan and other parts of the country, where no suspicion of the kind was entertained."

The Belfast Protestant Journal says:—"We are sorry to state, during the past week, the accounts from the various towns around Belfast are discouraging; and there is no doubt but that, both in the county Down and county Antrim, the disease has spread to a serious, though not an alarming extent. At Comber, immediately opposite the police barrack, there is a large field scarcely worth digging; and in the vicinity of Ballinacree, Killinelly, and Killyleagh, the crop is much injured. At Antrim, a few days ago, Lord Massereene sold some potatoes, in the ground, at the high price of 36l. per acre. They looked very well; but so extensive has been the ravages of the rot, that the purchasers are greatly disappointed, and would gladly withdraw their agreement. Similar accounts have reached us from other places."

The Drogheda Conservative says:—"We are sorry to say that the farmers, and the poor cottiers who yearly rent potato ground in this neighbourhood, are sufferers to a large extent, the disease having destroyed several fields. God help the poor: the prospect before them for the winter is dreary indeed. Potatoes a failure, conds 18s. per ton, and the field work nearly finished. The next crop the poor have to fall back on is, of course, the oat one. Well then, we have great fears that the country will shortly be drained of this crop also, if in every port in Ireland shipments are made in the same ratio as that from Drogheda on last week. We have taken the pains to analyse the exports for that period, and the following is the result:—3,700 loads of oatmeal, 912 qrs. of wheat, 200 qrs. of oats, 287 qrs. of barley, and 300 sacks of flour. Cattle, &c.: 657 cows, 1,009 sheep, 2,054 pigs, and 124 boxes of eggs. Whether are we to take this as a criterion of Ireland's wealth or poverty?"

POTATOES IN BELGIUM.—The Royal Committee established in Brussels on the occasion of the failure of the potato crops, for the purpose of seeking a remedy for the deficient of alimentary supplies, waited a few days since on the Minister of the Interior. That high functionary received the committee with the most marked attention. He thanked the members present, eight in number, for the proofs they were giving of devotion to their country's interests, and for their efforts in carrying out the benevolent and enlightened views of his Majesty. It is understood that the committee has already devoted four sittings to inquiries into the subject. The preservation of potatoes has been an object of especial attention, and the means of insuring their reproduction will be the next subject of inquiry. From the documents collected and communicated by several members of the committee, the failure of the potatoes in Belgium may be estimated at two-thirds of the early crops, and at five sixths of the late crops. Thus it is considered to be of the utmost importance to attend to the reproduction for next year. There is every reason to believe that the labours of the committee will satisfy public expectation.

BRUSSELS, Oct. 13.—We have had our attention called to a fact much to be regretted which has occurred several times in that part of Flanders where work is given to the weavers. In consequence of the high price of potatoes the distress of some of these weavers has become so great that they have sold the materials which were confided to them. If this should continue, the manufacturers will desist from giving out work, rather than expose themselves to such risks, and the good will suffer for the bad. The failure of the potato crop is on the point of giving occasion to lawsuits in the district of Brussels, in consequence of disputes between the farmers and the individuals who generally agree with them for the lease of the land prepared for the cultivation of potatoes. It is usual to pay for such land at the rate of one franc per rod, and then those who have taken the land plant it at their own risk. The farmer who thus lets his fields prefers a small rent to the chances of a good or bad crop. In the present state of things most of those who have planted potatoes on the above condition have refused to pay the rent agreed to, and abandon the produce, which in some places is not worth the trouble of gathering. They pretend that it is quite enough that they have lost their time, their seed plants and their crops, without being obliged to pay the rent; and besides that it is equitable that the loss should be shared by the contracting parties. It remains to be seen whether the courts of justice will recognise this mode of reasoning. The magistrates of Courtrai have placed a military post at every gate of the town, to hinder the plunderers, who every day rob the fields in the environs, from going out of the town with sacks, rakes, &c., with orders to ascertain the origin of the potatoes, carrots, turnips, &c., which beggars bring into the town. This prudent measure will give confidence to the farmers and inhabitants of the country, which has been much shaken by their audacious robberies and incessant depredations. The Antwerpen steamer, from London, brought yesterday 133 sacks of potatoes; and the Monarch, from Hull, 699 sacks.

CARLSRUHE, Oct. 9.—The government has prohibited, under heavy fines, the export of potatoes beyond the Zollverein boundaries, and also the purchase of them in large quantities, for purposes of sale or distillation.

THE POTATO.

The potato plant seems first to have been introduced into Britain by Sir Walter Raleigh, in the reign of Queen Elizabeth; but for more than a century its cultivation was exceedingly confined, owing probably to erroneous modes of rearing it, and to an improper mode of preparing it for food. In the reign of James the First, this root was considered a great rarity, and sold so dear as 2s. per pound; and even so late as the beginning of last century, it seems not to have entered into the lists of agricultural produce. Bradeley, who wrote about the year 1720, and who treated expressly of new improvements in horticulture, says of potatoes: "They are of less note than horseradish, scorzonera, beets, and skerrit; but as they are not without their admirers, I will not pass them by in silence."

The district of England where the potato was first generally cultivated seems to have been Lancashire; and about the same time it was introduced to general use in Scotland. In 1728, a day-labourer of the name of Prentice, living near Kilsyth, in Sirlingshire, successfully raised a crop of potatoes on a little plot of ground attached to his cottage, and was fortunate enough to call the attention of his neighbours to the value of this hitherto neglected vegetable. By the annual sale of his produce, he soon realised what was to him a fortune, the sum of 200*l.*; and meanwhile, the public attention being called to the plant, it gradually made its way. It is not, however, till after the year 1743, which was remarkable as a season of scarcity, that it became to be generally cultivated as a regular branch of field husbandry. I very well remember a near relative of mine mentioning an anecdote which showed that so late as the year 1755 or 1756, the potato was still a rarity in Wiltshire. This incident was, that a lady had brought some potatoes in her pocket to church on Sunday, to present to a friend, as something quite new; but the string of her pocket breaking as she was in the act of going out on the dismissal of the congregation, she lost her burden in the passage, which created considerable speculation. In England, with the exception of Lancashire, the progress of this esculent into general cultivation was still slower. It was known in Yorkshire only as a garden plant down to 1760; and in Somersetshire we must date its introduction as an article of farm produce, at least 10 years later. After this period, however, the value of the potato came to be very generally appreciated; and in the year 1796, in the county of Essex alone, no fewer than 1700 acres were planted with this root, for the supply of the London market. Potatoes seem to have found their way into the Continent of Europe at a considerably later period than into England; but they came rapidly into common use, and we may date their general cultivation there from about the middle of last century.—Duncan's "Philosophy of the Seasons."

It is highly interesting and satisfactory to learn that the imports of sugar into Great Britain, up to this time, exceed those of 1841 by 21,000 tons.

The Augsburg Gazette gives a rather alarming account of the Corn harvest in Russia, Poland, and most parts of Germany, but it does not appear to have arrived at its conclusions from official returns, or any other information of a very positive character.—Galignani.

FORBES, Oct. 6.—According to an official notification, the cholera case which has broken out in Poland is making greater strides, and is approaching the frontiers. The necessary precautionary measures will therefore be taken against the introduction of the disease.

THE ZOLLVEREIN AND OUR MANUFACTURES.

The following is a communication received from a quarter entitled to the highest confidence:—

"I am sorry to have to inform you, that my latest accounts from Carlsruhe, coming from very good authority, it now appears definitely arranged that from the 1st of January, 1846, the duties in the German Customs League in all figured goods, 'all worsted,' and 'worsted and cotton mixed,' will be raised from 30 Prussian dollars to 50 dollars per cwt.

"Under this head will fall all Bradford fancy goods, such as figured Orleans, Alpaccas, Paramattas, Merinos, Saxones, Amazonians, Lamas, Damasks, Pantaloon stuffs, &c. &c., and it will be a serious blow to that important branch of trade, which three years ago we were fortunate enough to ward off.

"Plain goods are not mentioned, and it may therefore be presumed that their rates will not be altered for the present; neither is anything stated respecting worsted yarns. Cotton twist, and linen yarns will not be altered, as the delegates from the various German States could not agree on these articles.

"All the arguments which you so happily set forth three years ago respecting the policy of the German States, and especially of Prussia, in gradually raising the duties on British manufactured goods, and admitting twist and yarns in general at mere nominal duties, still hold good. The apathy of the English Government and the Bradford manufacturers, who were informed of this contemplated alteration of the German duties about three months ago, by various ways and means, has been very great; the matter has been received and taken up in a very cool and indifferent manner. Worsteds goods will, with few exceptions, have to pay the same rate as cotton goods (i.e. 50 dollars per cwt.), and this high duty has almost annihilated the latter branch for the consumption within the German States. A few years longer will bring the worsted trade to the same level, there can be no doubt.

"P.S.—This moment I have received letters from Frankfurt, October 5th, which fully confirm the above; plain articles remain at dollars 30—; no alteration in the duties on cotton, worsted, and linen yarns. Prussia was willing to accede to a duty of 3 dollars 8 groschen per cwt. on cotton twist, which, however, was not accepted by Bavaria, Wurtemberg, and Baden, who demanded a much higher rate. The protocols were left open on this question for later renewed discussion."—Leeds Mercury.

REGISTRATION TACTICS.

A correspondent in South Cheshire, who professes to be a subscriber to the League, complains of the objections which were made by our party to wealthy and influential individuals on the register. He alleges that many clergymen and large landowners, including one Member of Parliament, had been objected to; and he asks, "What possible good can arise from this system of raising objections to persons of large landed possessions in the county?" We are not sufficiently informed of the details of the registration in South Cheshire to be able to say whether the revision was judiciously managed. Probably it was not, for want of local organisation. If so, we hope that next year it will be put on a better footing, and its management assimilated to that which has been attended with such triumphant results in North Cheshire and other counties.

But our correspondent falls into a common error in assuming that it is of necessity wrong to object to "clergymen, Members of Parliament, and landowners," who happen to possess property in the county. The object of the revising barrister's court is to bring the register into conformity with the law; the law requires not only that a man should possess a property qualification, but that it should be properly registered; and there is no exception to this rule in favour of the rich over the poor. The Leaguers, therefore, adopted the rule of objecting to all known monopolists who were not legally upon the register, and they carried out their plan without respect of persons. In one polling district of North Lancashire, 8 clergymen, monopolists, were struck from the county list; the name of Mr. Talbot Clifton, M.P., the representative of North Lancashire, was also struck off; he had been upon the register as owner of certain freehold property, which was proved to the satisfaction of the Court by the League agent, to belong to his father; objections to 38 reverted claimants to the franchise in Middlesex were sustained; and in the same county the names of three knights, three baronets, and an Irish peer were expunged from the register at the instance of our agent. In South Staffordshire, Mr. Hickin succeeded in his objections against seven clergymen and a Member of Parliament. We mention these instances merely to satisfy our correspondent, and all who entertain his views, that "clergymen, Members of Parliament, and landowners" do require looking after like other people.

It would be a piece of useless folly to attempt to fight the battle of the registration courts upon any other plan than that which we have adopted. Our opponents avail themselves of every advantage which the most subtle knowledge of the technicalities of the law will afford; and the Leaguers oppose them with the best legal skill they can command. It is pretty evident that the Free Traders are proving an overmatch for their opponents in the registration courts, and the latter are naturally enough resorting to their old cry of "foul play." But our friends generally will not, like our South Cheshire correspondent, give ear to so stale a charge.

It is pleasing to be able to state that every one of those gentlemen who purchased qualifications, at the suggestion of the Council of the League, for the County of Middlesex (although objected to), have been successfully defended, and their names inserted on the register. It is, therefore, hoped that Free-traders who do not possess a qualification for Middlesex, will lose no time in making application to have one purchased for them. To the grumblers at the League's activity in the Registration Courts, accusing them of making frivolous objections, the answer in Middlesex is complete, seeing that 1914 notices of objection were proved, and 1918 only awarded for costs on the whole revision—208. was on one case, where an appeal on a point of law was granted.

SOUTH STAFFORDSHIRE.

The revision of the lists of voters for the southern division of the county of Stafford, which commenced at Lichfield on the 25th September, closed on Friday, the 10th instant, at Wolverhampton. The revising barrister was Thomas Bros, Esq. The learned gentleman has performed similar duties in this division during several years past. Of objections by third parties, the number taken at the instance of the League were 815; while very few were taken by the monopolists. Mr. Hickin, the secretary of the League, attended every court throughout the circuit. In several he was assisted by the following professional gentlemen:—Mr. C. Simpson, of Lichfield, Mr. T. Bolton and Mr. T. Walker, of Wolverhampton, Mr. Barnett and Mr. Dunston of Walsall; Mr. Fleetwood and Mr. Pinchard of Wolverhampton, and others appeared on behalf of the Monopolists. The usual denunciations against the conduct and policy of the League were indulged in, and numerous applications for costs were made, but with little comparative success. The principle laid down by the learned barrister, in reference to costs, and to which he adhered strictly throughout the proceedings, was, that wherever any substantial alteration was required in the lists he would not give costs at all, although the qualification might be good, the voter having failed to do that which the law required of him. Too much praise cannot be given to the barrister for the pains he took in correcting the register by supplying the proper description of the place of abode in the second column, and by inserting the names of streets, &c., and the names of tenants, where required, in the fourth column, in accordance with the decisions of the Court of Common Pleas. At every court held during the revision, he took occasion repeatedly to express his opinion that the objections originated by the League would be found to be most useful, and that the county ought to hold itself indebted to them for enabling him to clear the register of bad votes, and to amend it where it was necessary. This, with the statement given below, is the best answer which can be given to the cavilling of opponents. At the close of the business at Wolverhampton, on Friday, Mr. Hickin begged to be allowed to tender his thanks to the learned gentleman for the courtesy he had invariably received at his hands during the revision. Mr. Bros expressed his acknowledgments, and repeated his former declarations that he had no doubt much good had been done. The following is the general result:—

NORTH CHESHIRE.—On Tuesday and Wednesday last, W. Yaldley, Esq., the revising barrister, held a court, for the revision of the lists of voters, in the large school room, Dukinfield. NORTH LANCASHIRE.—Revision Courts have been held at Ulverston, at Lancaster, and at Garstang. Mr. Ascroft, assisted by Mr. Moorhouse, appeared for the Free Traders; and Messrs. J. Bray, P. Caterall, T. S. Shuttleworth, of Preston, and Mr. R. Jackson, of Lancaster, have severally been advocates for the Conservatives. The clear gain to the Free Traders from objections and claims was at Ulverston, 98; at Lancaster, 162; and at Garstang, 39.—Preston Guardian.

LANCASTER.—The following is the result of the revision for this borough:—
Monopolist objections to freemen sustained .. 34
Liberal and Free-trade objections sustained .. 40
One claim was allowed on each side.
Liberal and Free-trade occupiers struck off .. 9
Monopolist occupiers struck off .. 5
Several Monopolist claims were allowed, but all previously on the list.
New Liberal and Free-trade claims sustained .. 2

THE ROCHEDALE REVISION.—The Manchester Courier of Saturday last contains a statement regarding the results of the late revision for the Rochdale polling district, very well calculated to mislead those who have no other sources of information on such points. From the tabular statement in the Courier, it would appear as if the clear gain of the Rochdale monopolists was 127; whereas, a careful analysis of the number of new claims allowed, and old names struck off the register on each side, gives a majority of 37 to the Free Traders in that district. The mode in which the Courier contrives to give the monopolists the appearance of a majority, is by saying nothing at all about the new claims, and by representing every Free Trader struck off as a vote lost to that party, even in those cases where there was a double qualification.—Manchester Guardian.

BLACKBURN.—The revision for this borough is as follows: Liberal and Free Trade objections sustained, 53; monopolist ditto, 23; Liberal and Free Trade claims sustained, 11; monopolist ditto, 10: Liberal and Free Trade gain, 31.

BATH.—The following is the result of the revision for this borough:—Expunged by Liberals and Free Traders, 57; ditto by monopolists, 40; Liberal and Free Trade majority on objections, 17. Liberal and Free Trade claims allowed, 16; monopolist ditto, 5; majority on claims, 11. Total Liberal and Free Trade majority, 28.

WELMOUTH AND MILCOMBE REGIS.—(From a Correspondent.—) Monopolist claims, 4; sustained, 3. Objections, 27; sustained, 11. Free Trade and Liberal claims, 8; sustained, 5. Objections, 47; sustained, 25. Giving a majority of 15 to the Free Traders and Liberals: thanks to the valuable information derived from Mr. Huggett, of the League. Thus, with the continued majorities since the last election, makes it a matter of certainty that the monopolists have no chance.

ISLE OF WIGHT.—The revision for the borough has given a total gain to the Liberals and Free Traders of 12 new voters, and 7 monopolist ditto expunged. The monopolists added 3 to the old list, and expunged 1 Liberal.

EXETER.—The following is the result of the revision for Exeter:—Objections sustained by monopolists, 51; Ditto by Liberals and Free Traders, 179; Objected to by both parties, 4; 125. Claims by monopolists, allowed, 18; by Liberals and Free Traders, ditto, 40; claimed by both, 1; 23. Gain to Liberals and Free Traders, 147. "There is also," says the Western Times, "a large gain to the Liberals on the additions in the overseers lists, which shows the healthy state of the Liberal cause in the old city."

TRETFORD.—The result for this borough was as follows: Liberal and Free Trade objections, sustained, 7; ditto claims, sustained, 5; monopolist objections, sustained, 4; ditto claims, 3. Total Liberal and Free Trade gain, 5.

HULL.—The following is a return of the result of the revision for the present year:
Liberal and Free Trade Objections to Freemen, 341, sustained	201
New claims for ditto by Liberals and Free Traders ..	5
Liberal and Free Trade objections to householders, sust. 31
Ditto claims for householders, sustained	23
	260
Monopolist objections to Freemen, sustained ..	8
Ditto new claims for Freemen	5
Ditto objections to householders, sustained ..	27
Ditto claims for householders 74, sustained ..	16

Total Liberal and Free Trade gain on the revision .. 204
"This," says the Hull Advertiser, "clearly establishes the growing strength of the Free Trade party in Hull. At no former registration within the memory of the oldest elector were so many of the old freemen struck off the register."

MISCELLANEOUS.

NEW RAILWAY BREAK.—The Rev. F. H. Maherley, of Stowmarket, has invented a railway break, by which every carriage of a whole train may be easily and almost instantaneously stopped. If this break is applied in all parts it will be the means of preventing the fearful effects of concussion, as well as the carriages being thrown off the line by oscillations or otherwise, and giving protection especially to the engineer.—Railway World.

COMMERCIAL NEGOTIATIONS BETWEEN FRANCE AND BELGIUM.—"It is generally believed," says the Patrie, "that the journey of King Leopold to Paris will remove the last difficulties which have prevented commercial negotiations between France and Belgium, M. Deschamps, the Minister of Foreign Affairs, will not come in person, as he has been announced, to carry on the negotiations. He has delegated that office to M. Paroels, Director of Commerce, who arrived in Paris a few days back."

STATE OF TRADE IN BIRMINGHAM.—It is gratifying to state that the working classes in most of the various trades of the town are in full work. Many of the manufacturers are so busy that they cannot take in more orders. We observe that many of the large manufacturers are enlarging their premises. Hands are wanted in every direction.—Birmingham Advertiser.

HANOVER, OCT. 6.—It is Zollvereins Blatt gives, under the heading "Melancholy Intelligence of the Congress of the Customs' Union," a confirmation of the news, that the manufacturers have not succeeded in urging the Government to carry the prohibitive system any further. "According to the latest accounts from Carlsruhe," says that paper, "there is scarcely any hope left of obtaining in the Congress any decision in favour of the often-proposed reform in the tariff. The Free Trade party in Northern Germany, it is said, has, in consequence of instructions lately received, opposed more decidedly than before the demands of Southern Germany, and the influence of Prussia has completely gained over those Governments which have not yet fully made up their minds."

THE HAGUE, OCT. 6.—A letter from Copenhagen, of September 27, contains the following statement:—"8,000 tons of potatoes were purchased for the Netherlands, to be delivered on the 21st of October. Several purchases of corn were likewise made, to be delivered on the 20th of October. It would be to the advantage of the captains to come here as soon as possible in ballast, as in that case they would be certain of finding freight. Three have arrived from Elsinore, who have already met with engagements. Since the 1st of this month one herring brig has arrived at Scheveningen, with a cargo of 50,000 herrings; the highest price at which they were sold was 37 florins per thousand."

THE HAGUE, OCT. 9.—The Provinciale Groningen Council contains a long article on the alarm that has been excited by the general failure of the potato crop. The article blames the language that has been used on the subject, which represents the facts with much exaggeration—the prospects of the ensuing winter as more gloomy than they really are. We can affirm that the prospect is not so unfavourable. There will be no famine in our country; in England alone there are more than 40,000 lasts of foreign wheat, which cannot be sold for consumption in England but on payment of a duty of 102 florins per last. Parcels of this wheat have been brought to Holland. During the last month we have received not only wheat from England, but many cargoes of barley, buck wheat, pearl rice, and many hundred barrels of flour; also more buck wheat than is usual from France and Denmark; wheat and rye from the Baltic, several cargoes of rye and potatoes, and even from Odessa and Taganrog. One paper contains a great number of articles from different parts of the kingdom, relative to the disease of the potatoes.

FOREIGN CATTLE AND PROVISIONS.—The different steamers which have arrived at the various wharfs on the banks of the river during the last two or three days have continued to bring large quantities of cattle and fruit from the various Continental ports, although there is a visible falling off in the supply of the latter commodity, owing to the advanced period of the season. The Dutch steam-ship Batavier brought 62 oxen and cows and 99 sheep, four hampers of poultry, fifteen baskets walnuts, a large quantity of seeds, and a variety of every other description of Dutch produce, with the exception of ripe fruit, of which article she did not bring any on this voyage. The General Steam Navigation Company's steam-ship Venezuela, also from Rotterdam, brought 111 sheep, 12 cows, two oxen, 30 packages of yeast, two packages of poultry, a large quantity of fish, butter, pickles, and roots, and an extensive variety of articles the production of Holland. This ship did not either bring the least quantity of fruit of any description, which would imply that the importation of the article from that country has been entirely discontinued for the season. The quantities which have been brought weekly throughout the summer from that country, and that at a very early period of the arrival of the season for each separate kind, have been of a most extensive nature, and entirely beyond all precedent. It is admitted on all hands that Holland is of very great importance to us, not only in the production of cattle, but also of fruit and every other description of provisions, the whole being of a very superior quality. The company's steam ship Rainbow, from Havre, brought 117 packages of fruit, including walnuts, pears, &c. The Earl of Liverpool, from Ostend, brought 47 packages of poultry, consisting principally of rabbits, with which Belgium at this season of the year abounds, a very large quantity of butter, eggs, &c.; and the Belgian steam-ship Antwerpen, from Antwerp, brought 90 bags and 87 baskets of walnuts, 30 packages of pears, and a small quantity of a novel article of importation—viz.: four baskets of smelts. The cattle by the Venezuela were landed at the Brunswick-wharf, Blackwall, and those by the Batavier, as well as the whole of the fruit and provisions by that and the other vessels, at the St. Katharine's wharf, at which they were as usual examined by the revenue officers, and delivered to their several destinations with the least possible delay. In addition to these importations, a sailing vessel called the Rapid, from Harlingen, arrived at Blackwall with a cargo of Dutch cattle, consisting of 14 oxen, 52 cows, and 140 sheep on board, in addition to a large quantity of butter and other produce. Also the City of Boulogne steamer at London-bridge-wharf, with upwards of 60 large packages of walnuts and an extensive and valuable cargo of every variety of French produce and manufacture. A sailing vessel called the Adventure, from Villaviciosa, also arrived with the large quantity of 1360 bushels of nuts on board. The importation of nuts for table use would appear now to be confined principally to the Belgian and French ports for the remainder of the season.

THE SLOW PROGRESS OF THE HARVEST.—We have now advanced to nearly the middle of the third month of our harvest in England, and there is still a good deal of grain in the fields unsecured, and an unusual quantity for the season uncut, north of the Humber. The weather has been very unsettled for the last fortnight; we have scarcely had two successive fair days; very little corn has been carried during that time, and that which has been stacked will prove, when it comes to be thrashed, in a damp state unless kept till the March winds have whisked through it. The season has, however, not been damaging; frequent brisk winds and the cold air have prevented the process of sprouting, and we still think that not much harm has been done to the grain since it passed through the hands of the reapers. The Duke of Rutland, speaking at the Leicester Agricultural Meeting the other day, said:—"I have had during the summer such a series of skies as I never witnessed before, old as I am." This observation his Grace probably applied to the skies of the South, but the remark is equally applicable to those of the North, and not only to the summer but to the autumn. This week there has been some improvement in the weather, and a good deal of outstanding wheat has been secured in tolerable condition. As to the aggregate of the harvest, we adhere to the opinion we have already expressed, namely, that taking the average produce of the year at 20,000,000 quarters of wheat, last year's produce would yield 21,000,000, while this year's will not exceed 19,000,000. Of other grain it seems to be the general opinion that we shall this year have a fair average, but that potatoes will be a failing crop in some parts of the kingdom, though by no means generally. The three weeks of fine weather in the early part of September was the salvation of the food of the country for another year; taking the prospects then, and comparing them with the results now, the country has much more cause for gratitude than complaint. Speaking commercially, we may not quite have 20s. in the pound, but 19s. will be considered as a good composition. In the grazing districts, the supply of grass has been abundant, and the depasturing of stock has been very successful. The gathering of the winter stock of potatoes has already commenced, both in this and the neighbouring county of Lancaster, where they are still more extensively cultivated, and the crop appears to us a fair average with little or no disease. The price of good sound potatoes in Leeds is one-fourth more than at the same period last year; but it is not likely, we should think, that this great advance will be maintained, unless the alarm caused by the idea that potatoes will be extremely scarce in consequence of extensive shipments to Holland and Belgium, should be realized. It is the more probable that this remarkable increase of cost is but temporary, from the fact that at Manchester and Liverpool the price now is about the same as at the middle of October, 1844. We are informed that in many parts of Lincolnshire, the potatoes in the field are so bad as to give out a most unpleasant smell.—Leeds Mercury.

THE CORN LAWS.—Our readers can hardly have failed to remark the altered tone of the agricultural meetings, so quiet and subdued as to form a perfect contrast to the bold defiance which they were wont to assume. We no longer hear any threatening denunciations of the Minister: the clamour for agricultural protection has almost wholly ceased; and the reliance of the "agricultural mind" is now nearly, if not altogether, placed on improved methods of cultivation, instead of protective laws. The agricultural interest and the monopolist press seem to be at length fully persuaded, that the time is at hand when every class must depend upon its own industry and resources, without any unjust legislative favour at the expense of other classes. Not only has the public mind generally become prepared for this, but the very elements seems conspiring to bring about the change. The heavens have rained repeal. Never was a more salutary lesson taught to any people. We have narrowly escaped the horrors of a famine; and as it is, the supply of corn is very far short of an average harvest, although the scarcity may not be felt just yet. There is a very generally prevailing expectation, that a change in the Corn Laws is approaching; and it is understood that Sir Robert Peel and the Duke of Wellington have fully made up their minds as to the necessity of a further modification of those laws; but differ as to the precise extent of the change. We shall take an early opportunity of recurring to the subject, being fully persuaded that another session of Parliament cannot pass away without another approach being made to complete commercial freedom.—Ducham Chronicle.

THE MANCHESTER ATHENÆUM SOCIETY.—We understand that no fewer than 2500 tickets have been disposed of, and that the demand has been unprecedentedly great.—Manchester Guardian.

ERRATUM. In THE LEAGUE, No. 105, for John Sutton, 16, Upper Marylebone-street, Portland-place, read Jonathan Sutton.

THE EMPEROR AND THE LEAGUE.—The Standard of Thursday announces that the League has been enabled to carry on its extensive operations to purify the register of voters throughout the kingdom by a liberal grant from the Russian Government. We have made inquiry into the truth of this statement, and we are sorry to say that the Treasurer has not as yet received or heard of the remittance. We call the attention of the Emperor to the subject. If he really has resolved to promote the cause of Free Trade, he ought to see that his money reaches the proper quarter.—Manchester Times.

LETTERS ON THE CORN LAWS, No. XLVI.

TO THE RIGHT HON. LORD STANLEY.

MY LORD,—You have displayed your accustomed vivacity as a speaker, in co-operating with those lords and landowners who have taken of late to lecture the farmers at almost every agricultural dinner. The new character of the oratory at these meetings must be rather astounding to plain country people.

It has undergone an entire revolution. The farmers are no longer flattered. They are not courted, but corrected. Instead of promises, they are treated with precepts. Instead of cheers for abuse of the League, if they cheer at all, it must be at abuse of themselves. They have put their "friends" into office, and find that the office of a friend is to rebuke. Such is the result of their exertions at the last election. They have tied the twigs, and the rod is on their own backs. Protection was promised them, and now they most need it from their friends. Agricultural Societies are become a great mission for showing how wretchedly the soil of England is cultivated, and for preaching down the ignorance, the indolence, and the prejudices, the narrow means and the narrow minds of the tenant-farmers.

All this may be very well; but surely they are entitled to ask why you did not tell them so before the last election? Their "crops of weeds" were just as large when you were talking of the corn crops of Tamboff. You kept the secret till it was exposed by the League; and now you try to turn the undeniable facts, backed with exaggerations, to your own account. You recommend improvement, while yet retaining the system by which improvement is retarded. My lord, this will not do.

To what cause are the alleged deficiencies in the art of cultivating the soil to be ascribed? Mainly to the Corn Laws. You, the authors and upholders of that system, have kept down the independence of the farmer's character; you have sought for a herd of political retainers in your tenantry; you have acted on terror by the threat of ejectment, and you have bribed by the promise of law-created profits. The ignorance and prejudice of which you complain have been your political strength, and the weapons of your party warfare. You pretended to shield from competition, which you now desiderate as essential to improvement. For the sake of the Corn Laws, you cherished delusions which have impaired your property. You made agriculture a species of gambling; and now you whine about the lack of capital and industry in the holders of your legislative lottery tickets. If the tenants be at fault, it is the landlords that have led them astray. If there be reason in your reproaches, it arises from the success of your own temptations. You, my lord, and those of your class, whose policy has deteriorated the agriculture of the country, should be the lectured, and not the lecturers, at association meetings.

At the Liverpool meeting you descanted on the philosophy of competition; you proved how needless it was for the farmers of Lancashire. You rejoiced in the amalgamation of the Liverpool with the Manchester Association, because "the greater the competition, the greater the range of improvement." If this be true of a district, it is true of a nation. If it be good for North Lancashire and South Lancashire, it is good for Great Britain and the Continent of Europe. But your Corn Laws are laws against competition. They were professedly enacted to "protect" the farmer from competition. They tie up the mainspring of the agency to which you appeal for improvement. You deny the principle on the broadest scale, while you patronise it on the narrowest. According to your philosophy of motives human nature is a different thing in counties from what it is in countries. There is a limit at which you hold that good becomes evil. Enlarge the domain of competition from South Lancashire to all Lancashire, and you rejoice. Include the northern counties—a clear advantage. Add the southern—better still. Step an inch over the national boundary, and what was best of all immediately becomes abominably bad. The competition that enriches Lancashire, ruins England. The meeting laughed at your joke of the farmer, whose notion was that "iron ploughs breeds weeds." And yet your notion of the iron plough of competition is, that it breeds weeds, should the furrow overpass certain limits of latitude and longitude. You are indebted to the League, or the political economists, whose works are its text-book, for this doctrine of the utility of competition. But you take it without its primary application. If it makes Lancashire farmers, much more will it make British farmers. The world's rivalry is a mightier impulse than the competition of a county. It is the universal power which sets the local power in motion. You advocate the local, and resist the universal. Like the savage who stole a watch, and could not wind it up, you push on the minute hand of district competition towards the hour of improvement, and renounce the key of national competition, without which the balance-wheel has no movement, and the spring gives no impetus.

Your lordship broadly affirms your belief in the capabilities of the soil of this country to support the existing population, together with its increase at the rate of 300,000 mouths per annum. You told the farmers that "it was their duty and their advantage to find the means of providing for that population." The "advantage" must be demonstrated before the "duty" is recognised. Who wants the farmers and their families to become sacrificers for the common good? Not the League; they wish for that just as little as they desire those same farmers to victimise themselves for the profit of their landlords. The farmer is no more bound than any other tradesman to carry on a losing business, or waste his capital in experimental devices for increased production. His "duty" as a producer is best fulfilled, but for the interests of society no less than for his own, by the course which most turns it to his own "advantage." The nation has no need that he should use himself up in making bricks without straw. It has no right to impose any such obligation. He will make his farm answer for it can; and if he cannot, there is an end of his duty of feeding the population.

The truth is, there is a bit of "thimbling" policy in this devolution upon the farmers of the duty of feeding the nation. The pea has been shuffled from under the landlords' thimble. It is to the legislative obstructions of foreign supplies that the population has a right to look for a sufficiency of food. They have virtually, by the Corn Laws, undertaken to furnish a supply. They promised they could and would, if those laws were enacted. They are bound to do so, or to forego their monopoly. Their language in substance was, "Protect us from competition, and we will feed the nation." You have had the protection you asked, and you have not fed the nation; and now you invoke the competition you deprecated—and which you still deny, as between nation and nation, to exert its power as between district and district, and stimulate the farmers to make good your own forfeited bond. The manœuvre is as hopeless in economy, as it is bad in ethics. That this little island, with its gigantic industry, should be well fed from its own soil, is not in the nature of things; least of all is it practicable, without that foreign competition which is essential to the full development of energy and enterprise in any department. Only in the abandonment of restrictions can the entire capability of British agriculture be developed. The competition in which it would do itself full justice is that of the world's north and south, as well as the north and south of Lancashire. You must bring kingdoms into the field, instead of provinces; and then increase of population will no longer be a difficulty, but a pledge of increased resources, of augmented power, wealth, and abundance.

The Corn Law legislators and landlords ought to feel a deep responsibility at the present moment. We have been on the verge of a precipice. We are not yet out of the wood. Even before the extent of damage to the potato crop appeared so fearful, the wheat harvest had placed the country in a critical position. The national supply of food for the coming twelvemonth is not a topic to be disposed of at a Liverpool dinner of farmers from the vicinity, even though the noble Secretary of State for the Colonies be chief speaker and expositor of agricultural duty. The question, my lord, with all its serious and awful responsibilities, belongs to your position as a Cabinet Minister. You must deal with it, not amongst farmers, but statesmen. Take then, into the ruling conclave, your sense of the duty of feeding the population. If, by negligence and obstinacy, by delay and compromise, what is right and needful be postponed to party considerations and Parliamentary tactics, and the possible results of calamity, wretchedness, and crime, ensue—on you and your colleagues in the Cabinet, with both God and man, devolve the blame. There is no time to lose. Precaution should forestall not only disaster, but alarm. Your lordship would “like to see a considerable increase of iron ploughs.” Be it so; but let not, through Governmental negligence or timidity, “stern Ruin’s ploughshare drive clate” over those whose work and wages, whose daily fare and nightly rest, whose health, morals, and lives, are contingent on an adequate and accessible supply of food for the population.

A NORWICH WEAVER BOY.

LETTERS FROM WEYHILL FAIR.

FIRST LETTER.

About the place of the fair; about the sheep; and about the future Members of Parliament for Andover.

The Weyhill Fair is reported to be the greatest in England. I shall attempt this week to give some account of it, and of the products exposed there for sale and hire. Sheep, hops, and cheese are the chief products for sale; and farm servants, with some particular kinds of animals and implements, are the chief things for hire.

The fair is held annually on a piece of elevated ground about three miles west from Andover, in Hampshire, through which ground runs the road from Andover to Devizes, in Wiltshire. Weyhill is distant from London about 67 miles. It occupies a central position for the southern and western counties of England; the sheep and cheese coming from the south and the west to be sold and carried eastward to Kent, and northward to London; the hops coming from the east and south-east, from Kent, Surrey, and Sussex, to be sold and carried to every town and village on every side of Weyhill; but chiefly to the south and the west, and to London.

The commencement of the fair is ruled by old Michaelmas-day. This year it began on Friday, the 10th of October, which day and Saturday were the sheep days, Monday was what is called the “pleasure day,” on which the hops began to show, but with few sales transacted. On Monday, also, horses were sold and servants hired. On Tuesday the hop fair began in earnest, and is continued on this day, Wednesday—the day on which I write. The quantity of hops for sale regulates the duration of the hop fair. This year the quantity for sale is small; still the prices are low, at least moderate. There is, it is believed, a large growth of hops in the country; but being late from the wetness of the season, they are not in a condition to bring to the fair in the usual quantities. The dampness and doubtful nature of those shown at the fair tended also to keep down prices, as speculators did not buy fast, being afraid of the article spoiling on their hands.

From these causes the fair will probably not last much over Thursday, if it stretches into Friday at all.

The origin of Weyhill Fair lies beyond the horizon of written history. Tradition tells us that it arose out of the Michaelmas revels, which were held on the place it now occupies; but conjecture dates these revels farther back than the time when Michaelmas, as a Christian festival, was first heard of.

On the Monday previous to Friday, the 10th of October, a great yearly sheep fair began at Appleshaw, a village in the neighbourhood, and lasted up to the commencement of Weyhill Fair. So far as the nearest town, Andover, is concerned, which furnishes lodgings and stabling for men and horses, these two fairs may be looked on as one; that one lasting two weeks, and these two weeks made up of golden moments, not one of which is to be lost, being more precious than the remaining fifty of the year.

I did not go to Appleshaw sheep fair, nor to Weyhill on the sheep days; but I had opportunities of seeing the droves of sheep, and of speaking to the drovers, and the dealers and the farmers on the roads leading to the fairs from the south of Hampshire and from Dorset. Prices from the first kept up, and at the last were higher than the first.

It was amusing to see how some of the agricultural gentlemen who knew me personally, and knew my opinions on the Free Trade view of sheep feeding, wriggled from one pretence to another, and out of that other into something else, and away altogether when they could not find another pretence to retreat to.

“Well, gentlemen, what do you think of the effect of a little foretaste of good trade upon the agricultural interest, now? Good trade, you know, means Free Trade; and Free Trade, good trade. What do you think of cotton and wool, now that all the factories are going in Lancashire and Yorkshire, and all the people getting better wages than they had, and eating better food? Is it not telling upon you at Appleshaw and Weyhill last week and this, as it did on the Irish graziers at Ballinasloe, the week before?”

“That be all very fine for you to talk, Mr. Whistler, but that be n’t it. You know as well as any of us that stock was short of keep last winter, and was in bad condition. See how sheep was sold in the spring by them as had no hay nor keep for them; and see how many a man as had to get money somehow, sold sheep at two-pence ha’penny and threepence a pound, which should ha’ gone at sixpence had they been fat, only that he could not keep them on! Look at that. That be where mutton went. Dang you and your Free Trade; Free Trade, nor no other trade, ha’ nought to do wi’d. It wor shortness of feed did it. The sheep be n’t recovered yet of what harm they took this last year.”

(Chorus of Farmers.)—“That they beant, and wunt for a good time to come.”

“Very well, gentlemen; I shall take you on that argument; in every word of which I agree, save that ‘Free Trade, nor no other trade, has anything to do with the poverty of your flocks.’ Hay was 7l. per ton; many of you could not get it, even at that price; to those who could buy it, the price was far beyond its value. But the ports of Southampton, and Poole, and Weymouth, are near. From these there are ocean thoroughfares to the shores of Continental Europe on one side, and to Africa on the other, to the barley, and oats, and rye of Germany and Poland, the Indian corn of America, and to the beans and maize of Egypt. All of them cheap and plentiful. All of them valuable for feeding cattle and sheep, joined with your scanty turnips and scantier hay. All of them foreign, to be sure; yet not more foreign than that dearer and less profitable oil cake which you did buy then, and do buy now, to give your stock; and by which many of you injured your stock, giving it, in the absence of sounder provender, in undue proportions. And thus, because you are protected by a Corn Law, which prevented you from getting those articles of good and cheap provender which I have named, your flocks were doomed to starve.”

“That be all very well on your part, to talk that way, Whistler, but you leave out the main thing when you speak of what the Corn Law keeps out of the ports of Southampton, and Poole, and Weymouth; you said ne’er a word about wheat. An’ we got wuts, and barley, and beans, and that there maize stuff, to feed sheep on, wouldn’t wheat come, too, and make wheat not worth growing at home?”

“If you could feed more cattle, and sheep, and hogs, and feed them more speedily than you now can do, you would have much greater quantities of valuable manure to grow wheat—you would depend less on wheat for your rents. What you did grow would be more valuable to you, because the land being well fertilised, a larger quantity of grain would be produced on a limited number of acres. Millions of people who do not eat meat now would eat it then, because they could get enough of bread, and have money to spare. The increased feeding of your cattle, and increased fertility of your land, would give more employment to your work-people; and more employment would reduce poor rates, and add to wages. From this alone a demand would arise for your beef and mutton.”

Such was the nature of some of the conversations I have held with south-country gentlemen, going to and coming from the fair. With some of the agriculturists residing near Andover, conversations have taken a turn like the following:

“You gentlemen about Andover are proposing to establish a new fair—a fair for wool; is it likely to succeed?”

“We see no reason why it should not succeed. This is the centre of a great wool-growing district of England. We are near a railway to London—the South Western; and we expect to have one through this town—the Manchester and Southampton. That would bring us within easy access of the woollen manufacturers. So that, altogether, a wool fair promises very well here. Our south-country wool is much improved of late years. It fetches a good price; and farmers depending so much on it as they do, to help to pay their Michaelmas rents and their tradesmen’s bills, before they can send much corn to market, should try to get the wool off their hands to the best advantage, and for ready money, if they can; the wool to go off in a lump, the money to come in in a lump. Nothing like a fair for that kind of business.”

“I am glad to hear you speak in that way about wool, and railways, and manufacturers. You seem to be getting fast on the road to Free Trade; I expect to find you seeking the repeal of the Corn Law soon.”

“No, Sir. You cannot twist what has just been said about wool into anything in favour of Free Trade; that I am sure you cannot. But you Free Trade people have got only one string to your fiddles, and you are always fiddling on that string. No, Sir; the Hampshire farmer that seeks the repeal of the Corn Law should at the same time look for a hole in the river deep enough to drown in. The one will be no more suicide than the other.”

“Stay a few minutes, my friend. Let us recal one or two things to mind which have occurred and are occurring in Andover. Do you remember Sir John Pollard being Member for Andover?”

“Certainly I do; that is not so long ago!”

“Do you remember Mr. Huskisson as a member of the Government, when so much stir was made here, because he was attempting to reduce the wool duties?”

“Oh, yes; very well.”

“You remember, also, Sir John Pollard’s speech in the market-place at that time, when he used the memorable words, that if Mr. Huskisson was not put down, and the wool duties kept up, wool would fall to such a price, that the sheep would not be worth shearing: ‘that you might shear the sheep’—you remember those words—‘because it would be necessary to do so for their health, for the sake of their mutton; but that the wool would be lying kicking in the streets of Andover, nobody would lift it, unless it were the scavengers to put it on the dung-hill.’”

“Oh, yes; I remember that speech very well. Sir John was in a terrible way about the letting down of the duty on wool.”

“But Sir John was your oracle—your chosen protective representative. You all believed him, and cheered him, did you not?”

“Yes; he was a very good Member, Sir John. He was a very good gentleman. He did more for this here town than any other Member have done.”

“But you must admit that he was wrong on the wool question. The duty is now wholly repealed; there is a Free Trade in wool; and your wool is not kicking about the streets of Andover, with nobody to lift it. Instead of the scavengers sweeping it to the dunghill, you have got such a good taste of what Free Trade in that article can do for you, that you are eager to have a direct railway to the factories, and a wool fair, that you may get it speedily and still more profitably off your hands.”

At such a point as this there was generally some head-scratching and humming; and a kind of muttering of—“Yes; but wool be n’t corn, and corn be n’t wool.”

It is proper to remark, however, that in the immediate neighbourhood of Andover, a majority of the farmers are avowedly hostile to the Corn Law, or any kind of agricultural protection. This I have been told by gentlemen who should know, and who should be believed. I do not know the fact to be so of my own knowledge.

I may here also state incidentally that many regret in this borough that Mr. Walter, of Bearwood, the proprietor of The Times, should be at present in the field for Windsor; regret that, after having lost several contested elections, he should enter upon such a doubtful contest as that for Windsor, with the exclusive Tory influence against him, and the Liberals not all heartily with him; regret that, if elected for Windsor, they, the voters of Andover, will not have it in their power, as they desire to have, of repaying him the services rendered to them in the cause of humanity through The Times newspaper. The dislike of the Poor Law, as at present enacted, and as carried into practice in the Andover Union, is so strong, on the part of a large majority of the borough voters, that an election would be sure to turn upon that question in Andover, and on that alone. Nor is the ferment which is now working in this locality likely to be soon allayed. The guardians of the out-parishes stand in resolute hostility to the guardians of the borough and its neighbourhood; the out-parishes out-voting the borough guardians on everything, that the latter, no matter what their former party politics may have been, are now combined as opponents of the new Poor Law. A majority of these are also Free Traders, and all of them have great influence over other voters. Had not the Poor Law question arisen in such intensity here, and become an Andover question, the subject of Free Trade would have taken the lead here as elsewhere. There being no chance of Lord William Paget standing again, the struggle would have been to return a second Free Trader with Mr. Erwall. As it is, the struggle will be to return with Mr. Erwall another opponent of the present Poor Law. Were Mr. Walter to stand, there would be no struggle at all. The moderate Conservatives would vote for him; the Free Traders would vote for him, and his election would be sure. There is no other known Parliamentary candidate, no man in the House or out of it, who would be so sure to be returned for Andover as would Mr. Walter. And he would be returned by uniting the voters who have hitherto been discordant.

Free Traders, not resident in Andover, and not feeling that intense excitement on the starvation clauses of the Poor Law, and not knowing that the union system is used, as it is, to screw down wages in Hampshire, and punish men and women, and little children, and helpless old people, who may incur the displeasure of some king of a thousand acres, by consigning them to worse than a House of Correction, to the Union, with the hard labour, more filthy labour, and less food, where they must remain so long as the said king of a thousand acres, and his brother kings of acres and dunghills think fit; I say, to those Free Traders living at a distance from Andover, and not acquainted with the practice of rural guardians in rural districts, it may seem that the leaders of the Free Trade cause in Andover are hardly making the right choice for a colleague to Mr. Etwall in fixing on one who has hitherto been for a low fixed duty on corn. But the time for fixed duties has gone by. The recent leaders of The Times indicate that even there the thought has ceased to find a place. We should be more ready to hail such an ally as Mr. Walter than to cavil at him; and we should bear in mind that all questions of humanity are not bound up in the Corn Law, deeply fraught as that is with the well-being and the woe of our population. Let us liberate trade from starveling monopolies, that the working man may be industrious, and not poor; but let us also liberate the poor man from starveling Boards of Guardians (his irresponsible masters, whose interest it is to starve him, and make him work at starvation wages), that he may eat as well as work, and live honestly, because he can work and live. And let this be done alike for the advancement of that national and individual industry which Free Trade seeks to advance, and to the condemnation of those monopolies in corn and in human labour which our Corn Laws and our Poor Laws are unitedly operating to perpetuate.

LETTER SECOND.

About the Shows, the Farm Implements, and the Hop growers.

On reaching Weyhill Fair, I did not find myself on a hill, nor did I see any hill. The country was elevated to the breadth of a mile or more, and commanded a view of the woody parks and hedged corn fields lying west and north of it; and eastward and south the distant elevations higher than this could be seen. And, though I could not see, I knew that the wide expanse of country on every side, though apparently little broken from a level, was not a level, but was varied and twisted into hilly ridges by the valleys or "bournes" in which the rivulets run, and in which nine-tenths of all the churches, and villages, and farm-yards, and human habitations, are to be found; the farms having all their heads down in the valleys, and their tails stretching upwards and backwards on the high and the dry ground, the heads dipping into the rivulets, as if they had come down to drink: an idea pleasing enough, were it not that those pretty rivulets are defiled and poisoned by the farmers which come down to drink, they being so unnatural as to discharge their excremental offal into the places where they drink, and so unagricultural as to let that offal run to waste, rather than carry it out to the fields to fertilise them; the country, I say, seemed from Weyhill to be little broken from a level; but knowing the rivulets and the bournes, I knew it was not a level. On one side, the only side where the hill can properly be so called, we could, by crossing a beautiful open green, where the horses were compelled to show off their metal by lads who, in riding them, showed off theirs, look down into a hollow, and across it upon a finely expanded woodland. But to see this, it was necessary to go out of the fair.

The Andover and Devizes road, ascending at an easy gradient westward, divided that green on the right, on which was the horse-market, from another green on the left, where now stood the farm implements for sale and the men to hire, and on which the sheep-fair had been on former days. Beyond these, at the distance of four or five hundred yards from the centre, the land was all enclosed, and so were the roads; the latter being nothing more than narrow waggon ways, confined in lofty hedge-rows, in which the currents of traffic to and from the fair struggled, as madness struggles in strait jackets—all the madder and all the more likely to continue so that they were confined.

Some rows of elm-trees, and a few not in rows, two rather showy white villas, wearing shrubberies, gravelled walks, and painted gates outside—a church which hides behind a wall among the trees, as if it thought it shame to be seen, and which nobody would suppose to be a church unless they were told—two or three, or it may be four, public-houses—about as many private dwelling-houses, one of them an exciseman's—and somewhere about a dozen rows of low thatched and slated houses, with white shining walls, forming squares and parallelograms, wide streets and narrow streets, grassy within all the year save now, covered with straw now, and the interior of the houses, or sheds, only occupied now,— these, so far as I remember, constitute the buildings which stand permanently on Weyhill.

They belong to a Mr. Heath, of Andover, and are let at a good rent; many of them as temporary taverns—the renters of which are all bound, so I was told, to take their liquors from him, he being a wholesale dealer. I believe, however, that he also is only a tenant under the corporation of Andover.

It is in these parallel and cross lines of permanent sheds that the peculiarity of Weyhill Fair is to be seen from all others, and in the commodity exposed there for sale—hops. There are also booths, as at other fairs; clowns, pantaloons, drummers, trumpeters, with clanging pieces of metal and screeching voices. Pictures of the Battle of Waterloo, or some other great assemblage of red, and blue, and smoky paint, which made the female friends of young fellows in smockfrocks and recruiting ribbons, who had taken the shilling, cling round them and sob, and say, "Oh, Jem, wult thee go and be done that to? See there! what they be a doin' on; shootin' one another! Jem, Jack, Bill, wult thee go to be knocked on the head, and leave me for ever?"

Also there was the head of a wonderful ox bred in Cumberland, which was warranted to measure more from horn to horn than the largest man in the fair, measured round the body; and with that, as a joint stock concern, was associated the wonderful lamb, with one head, two bodies, two tails, and eight feet; two of them growing from the back, which was lambled at Mr. Godwin's farm, at Wallop, near this place, and is the property of Mr. Ramsbury, a butcher, in the village of Broughton, where I now write; who, I believe, would be willing and ready to sell it to any collector of natural curiosities. Also there was a "correct view of the ship Tartar, burned by fire in the Southampton dock; with the storming of Jane Dacre, in China, where 4000 men, women, and children, were destroyed and blown up; also many other grand and beautiful views of batels by sea and land; and the beautiful animal from America to be seen alive." And besides these, many more shows too numerous to mention.

In some of the lanes, long and narrow, formed by the rows of sheds being back to back, there were old clothes' men, perhaps not from Holywell-street, nor Monmouth-street—but looking very like them. One kind of article attracted my notice especially—soldiers' great-coats, worn threadbare; worn four years, and discharged for being too old. These were here in great numbers to be sold, and were sold, to labourers in agriculture and shepherds, to fence off the coming winter. I thought it was a pity the soldiers' rations of beef and bread could not be brought to Weyhill for the outcast labourers, as well as the cast-off clothes.

Saddlery, whippy, turnery, corn-measures, cheese-presses, dairy utensils, and vast piles—a Woolwich arsenal of piled cheeses, were upon the ground.

Implements and newly-invented machines, or old inventions slightly varied, and called new, were there by the hundred. Ploughs of every description—"Taskers," "Ransomes," and all the iron and wooden humbug of twenty other "makers," who make everything but useful, serviceable, practical ploughs; who make machines, and show them, and puff them, as if they were specially sent upon the earth to torment and punish poor farmers for the sin of being easily imposed upon—all such implements usually found at agricultural shows and fairs were there, with their few grains of utility, and their vast amount of chaff and puffs and uselessness.

The only machine at work was a moulder of drain-tiles, said to be the invention of the gentleman who was showing it. This, for simplicity and effectiveness, was a decided exception to the general mass of rubbish gathered there. That gentleman did not fail to tell us that he was making drain-tiles with such a machine as that for her Majesty the Queen and Prince Albert; and that he had contracted to lay down 50 miles of drains on the new royal property in the Isle of Wight. William Bullock Webster, Esq., of Houndsdown, near Southampton, is the address of the inventor. I was so pleased with the simplicity and real utility of this machine, that I shall probably pay the Isle of Wight a visit to see it at work on the royal farm.

There were, perhaps, some other useful machines for various agricultural purposes there; and not having examined all, it may be going too far to condemn all. My remarks, however, only apply to farm implements, and alleged new inventions generally. If any class of implements are to be specially condemned as a class, it is the most useful class—that of ploughs. The best of them in Hampshire are but poor affairs—clumsy, odiously offensive to the eye, inconvenient for their work, and wasteful of horse-power.

But horse-power seems to be undervalued and misunderstood in the south and west of England, else the farmers would never waste good corn and hay upon such inferior horse-flesh as they do. The show of horses at Weyhill, though numerous, was so inferior as to cause remark even among Hampshire farmers.

Returning to the hop-sheds, let us look around us. If the farmers' horses have been below respectability, not so the farmers themselves. A finer show of men, whether viewed as the "animal man," or as well-mannered, polite, business-like gentlemen, is not to be seen in England, and after that, not very likely in the world, than the Kent, Surrey, and Sussex hop-growers, who are each attending with their "pockets" of hops in these sheds. I must give the reader some outlines to judge what this part of the fair is like.

First, we enter a space 30 or 40 yards wide, three times as long or nearly, with sheds up each side. This is exclusively set aside for Farnham hops. Other hops are in the fair grown near Farnham; indeed, some of them, as it is expressed, "only over the hedge;" but these are in another larger division of the fair, called "the country." This "country" division admits all comers. The "Farnhams" being of a superior kind generally, they get one or two, sometimes three or four or five pounds sterling more per hundred weight than any others. The mere fact of being "Farnhams" gives them a reputation; and to keep up the reputation, the Farnham growers unite and hire this division of the fair to themselves, to exclude all others, who by introducing an inferior hop near them might injure the character of theirs. This year, however, owing to the weather, the "Farnhams" are inferior to many of the "country's." The quality is as good, but they are not dry, not in "condition;" and they have had to submit to 8*l.*, 8*l.* 10*s.*, and 9*l.* per cwt.; some few of the best "pockets" drawing 10*l.*; while many of the "country's" drew 9*l.* 10*s.* to 11*l.* per cwt.

Going out of this division, we get into one narrower, but longer, running to our right hand at a right angle to this. This on one side is called the "London." On inquiry I found that no kind of hop came under that name; it was applied to the London dealers, who take offices there, and sheds, and buy and sell, and speculate. They seemed to do a good deal of business by samples. Some of them I saw had bought the very best they could get; and then when buyers for noblemen and gentlemen's families came, they sold the best at a good price; such as 11*l.* per cwt. The chief buyers in the fair are country innkeepers and brewers; and they like a "a good useful hop," which they mostly procured at about 9*l.* 10*s.* The main question with them seemed to be, whether the hops were dry enough to keep; and whether they had not been kiln-dried and "brimstoned" too much to make them look well?

In the same division with the "London" are the "Kent" and "Sussex." But I think some of these were also in the "country," which means all parts of Surrey not in the "Farnham." The "country" strikes off at a right angle from the "London" continuing westward as the "Farnham" was doing, and is the largest division of the hop fair.

Though the sheds are in continuous rows, they are each divided by partitions, each hop grower who comes there to sell having one; or, sometimes two or more growers join together and have one. In most cases each grower has his own shed; the size—I only speak from recollection—may be about 20 feet square. In front, and occupying five or six feet square of each shed is a little house, its front wall flush with the front of the row. It has a door and lock and key, and is entered from the interior of the shed. It has a window in the front, and a shutter outside, which folds down, and shows as it hangs down the name of the hop-grower, and the name of his farm, whose shed it is. The passers by thus see at once whose hops are within.

I do not know if in all, but I saw in some, a plentiful supply of wine, and substantial refreshments, with which purchasers were regaled, and, if I am not personally forgetful, which some were invited to who were not purchasers.

The "pockets" of hops are put in the sheds on end. They are about 8 feet long, and about 20 inches in diameter, as hard packed as to be like a log of round timber. They have all got a kind of coat of arms on them in red and blue colours, each differing according to its locality; besides which, there are in plain letters, legible to all who can read, the name of the place where the hops grew, and the name of the grower (we must not say owner, it is always grower). This is on each "pocket." There is also the weight of each marked on it by the exciseman, and the amount of duty charged. Generally, the weight increases from the time of being weighed at home up to the time of weighing at the fair, by the absorption of moisture. This causes most purchasers to say they will rather take the exciseman's weighing than have them weighed again; and the seller generally tells them he will do whichever they choose.

The weight of each "pocket," so far as I could learn averaged about 2 cwt. Some were 13½ cwt.; and some 2½ cwt. The price of a "pocket" is thus about 20l.

They are packed by a man going into the empty bag with a heavy weight of iron, attached to which is a rope. He is nearly naked, and is oftentimes nearly suffocated. The hops having been dried in an upper room, the bag is slung below, and the loose hops are showered down upon the man deep within the bag. He treads all round the iron weight, and can pull it up by the rope if it does not rise; but if he packs well with his feet round the weight, it should rise of itself, and keep on the top.

The "pockets" being thus packed and marked, as already told, and conveyed on waggons to Weyhill, and put in the sheds, one from each lot is taken and laid down outside the shed. It is slit open in the middle, about 12 inches at the seam, and the canvass folded neatly back, and pinned down to keep it back by strong pegs. An iron instrument with two blades, which I tried to ascertain the name of, and which was called "pincers" by some, and by others was said to have no name at all, the blades each four inches broad, and nine or ten inches long, sharp as knives on the lower face, and apart from each other four inches—this instrument was inserted in the firmly packed hops as deep as it would go, the two blades cutting their way down. A knife, which every "grower" seemed to have for the purpose, was then taken and inserted ten inches deep, and a cut was made on each blank side of the instrument from blade to blade. A screw at top was then turned, so as to make it grasp the hops it had got hold of more firmly, and then it was drawn out. It was all made of polished steel, and was laid across each "pocket," with the square cut sample in its grasp. The buyers, as they came up one after another, lifted it by its polished handle and put it to their noses, and sniffed, and smelt, and asked questions, and examined all the specks of colour, and again smelt it, and looked knowingly at the "growers," and then laid it down, and took up two or three of the hops between the finger and thumb, and nipped and crushed these, and smelt them, and asked the price; and said the price would not do, and that "that hop" would not keep; and again, that "that hop" had "saccharine" in it, which was a good sign; or that "that hop had been brimstoned;" and so forth they would go from "Farnham" to "London," and "Kent," and "Sussex," and up the "country," smelling, and sniffing, and rubbing, and determining to buy, yet afraid, lest they should have bad beer next year.

The odour pervading the fair from the hops was delightful; the air was filled with perfume, and the day being fine, Weyhill was altogether very pleasant. I observed that the publicans and innkeepers, known to each other, clubbed together, two and three, and three and four, and bought the whole stock of some growers, consisting of eight, ten, and twelve packets, and then paid for them in the lump, and drank their wine together in the lump.

I intended to follow this up by some account of the culture of the hop plant, and of the hop planting population, but I find my space more than occupied; so for the present I must come to a stop.

ONE WHO HAS WHISTLED AT THE PLOUGH.

SHIPWRECKS.—The average number of British shipwrecks in a year is 600; the value of property destroyed about two and a half millions sterling; and the number of lives lost 1500.

SPANISH AND FRENCH FRUITS.—The importations of the large and much-approved description of onions usually brought in large quantities from the Spanish ports about this time of the year for consumption in this country, have commenced for the season, and several ships having arrived with very large quantities of the article, of a very superior quality on board, both at the port of London and also at Liverpool, and one or two others of the principal outports, they are now to be had in profusion at the various metropolitan fruiterers' and grocers' shops, and elsewhere. They fetch a good price, and are reckoned very cheap considering their size, and also very serviceable, although they are of a remarkably mild and inoffensive flavour. The importation of dried plums and prunes, for table use, has also commenced from the French ports, and excellent samples of those favourite and much-esteemed fruits are now attainable at about the usual prices, according to the respective merits of the different qualities and parcels on sale.

MANUFACTURES ABROAD.—The Journal du Commerce d'Amers states that, by an ukase of Sept. 9, Russia has adopted the following Custom-house regulations for the Grand Duchy of Finland:—"Hemp, linseed, and all oleaginous seeds, as well as cordage of all kinds, and hempen yarn for sail cloth, will, until an order shall be given to the contrary, be exported from the Grand Duchy of Finland free of duties. The exportation from Finland of planks and lath-wood is interdicted." In the same paper it is observed that the linen trade of Germany being threatened by the rivalry of England, steps are taking to resist it. In Silesia, for instance, a demand is made on the Government that measures should be adopted to make known in the American markets the superiority of the linen yarns of Silesia, spun by hand, and bleached by the natural process, over linens produced by mechanical means, and bleached by chemical expedients. Besides this, it is mentioned in the Sveabian Mercury, that a society has been formed for the encouragement of the national industry in Wurtemberg. This society, it is added, already numbers more than 400 members."

AGRICULTURE.

A LEASE, AND NOTHING LESS THAN A LEASE.

Practically, farmers have abandoned the Corn Laws. They no longer rely on "protection." They have ceased to be angry when Free Trade is advocated, or to be startled, as at an apparition, by the advent of a Leaguer. Indeed, wheresoever we go amongst farmers, we find them originating discussions on Free-trade questions, and, in nine cases out of ten, admitting, without reference to their personal wishes, that the system of restriction cannot be much longer maintained. They say it must go, and the sooner the better. They want the question settled, that there may be a solid basis for farming calculations. Then it is agreed on all hands that British farmers would have nothing to fear from foreign competition if their land was well cultivated. Protection is confessedly required for bad farming only, not for good. This was distinctly stated by Mr. T. A. Green at the Olney Agricultural Association, who said, "If agriculture were properly carried out in this country, the farmer need fear no repeal of the Corn Laws." And the same thing has been implied or stated at nearly every agricultural meeting of the present autumn.

And what are the impediments to good cultivation? We shall again call in evidence Mr. Green, who said, "If useless woods were grubbed up, rascally bad pastures ploughed up, and prejudices removed, a great increase in the growth of corn would be the result." And at the same meeting at Olney, Mr. Pain, in responding to the toast of "the tenantry," said, "he knew many bad pastures that would pay more in one year if ploughed up, than they now did in ten. This breaking up of old and worthless pastures would also increase the demand for labour, and be productive of good also to the landlord and the farmer." Mr. C. Whitworth, however, thought that "there was no necessity to break up old pastures, while the arable land we have at present was so badly farmed." Here, then, we have two plain and obvious means of increasing production on our own soil; first, to farm the present arable land well; next, to break up inferior pastures, and, of course, to farm them well afterwards. Then the permanent pasture lands admit of great improvement. Again, at the Luton meeting, to which we last week referred, Mr. Brett, an intelligent farmer of Hertfordshire, said that, in the counties of Bedford and Hertford, "one great improvement was wanted—the cutting away of useless timber and fences." And that suggestion was received, and properly received, by the farmers with vociferous cheers. Mr. Brett stated that, "in one case in Hertfordshire, he had made a rough valuation of the timber on 50 acres of land, divided into fields of eight acres, but which might be made into fields of 25 acres, without injury to the landlord, and with great benefit to the tenant. This timber he had valued at 5l.; and he had no hesitation in saying that if it were removed no tenant would mind paying 2s. or 3s. an acre more for the land." He also wished landlords "would pay a little attention" to the scattered and ill-arranged position of farm-buildings, which ought to be more concentrated, and collected in smaller space than they usually are. Our readers will remember also, that at this meeting Mr. Lattimore, from whose speech we gave some extracts last week, attributed the generally defective state of cultivation to want of capital. And whence arises all these defects? On this point neither is there any difference of opinion. Sufficient capital is not employed by tenant-farmers because they have no security for reaping where they have sown. They want, as Mr. Lattimore so pointedly said, security of tenure. So Mr. Brett said, "that great improvements were required in the cultivation of the soil, but these improvements can only be carried out by giving to the farmer a proper tenure and proper security, and thus making it advantageous to him to cultivate his land in a superior manner." And he cited the example of the late Earl of Leicester, in proof that by giving security to his tenants the landlord best promoted his own interest. Mr. Brett afterwards observed, "that if landlords gave farmers security of tenure, the soil would be better cultivated, and the condition of the tenant would be so far improved, that the rent would become a secondary consideration."

Now all these things look so like truisms that it requires some previous acquaintance with the actual state of agriculture, and the relations of landlord and tenant in this country, not to feel surprised at hearing them so often repeated and so earnestly enforced. But it was for simply stating such truisms that we, not long ago, had the reputation of an evil design of setting landlords and tenants together by the ears. Now, however, landlords admit that tenants must have some security. Thus, at Olney, Mr. Tower, one of the Duke of Buckingham's members for the county, said, "more corn might be profitably grown in that neighbourhood;" but "he was glad to see that the farmers were bestirring themselves." He said, "improvement was the watchword of them all;" and for these improvements "it was necessary that the tenant should have some security of tenure." This, then, is the position of the farmer; he wants no protection against foreign competition, provided his land be well farmed—better farmed than at present; that he only requires security of tenure, and liberty to use his land to the best advantage, in order to farm well; while the landowners, on their part, admit that some additional security is required by their tenants. What, then, is that security? We answer—A RATIONAL LEASE. No farmer asks for more, and none ought to be satisfied with less. But farmers must not suppose they can be made secure by any of the make-shift agreements about which landlords and their agents have lately become so eloquent. We find long articles in the Journal of the Royal Agricultural Society, telling how Lord A.'s or Lord B.'s tenants have improved their farms under agreements by which, if dispossessed of their farms, they are entitled to be paid for "unexhausted improvements." Oil-cake is to be good for two years, bone-manure for three, and clay or chalk for four or five years, and so on; all of which, as additions to a lease, would be perfectly just and fair. But let farmers beware of such agreements without leases, for they are mere farmer-traps, and afford none of that security which is essential to the tenant's well-doing. With such an agreement the farmer would be as much dependent upon his landlord as an ordinary yearly tenant is now; and besides the loss and inconvenience of quitting his farm when he least wishes it, he is never really paid for his improvements. From the nature of things it is impossible. When the Corn Law question has been settled, but not till then, let farmers require leases; and, above all, let them regard with suspicion every proposal for allowance for "unexhausted improvements" as the substitute for a lease.

Landowners, however, are now "trying it on." For instance, at the meeting of the Central Suffolk Agricultural Association, held at Stowmarket, the Rev. Coppinger Hill said:

"But though leases would not secure the farmer from loss, there existed a well-devised system of compensatory clauses, which might be placed in action, capable of saving the farmer from any loss at the close of his term of occupation, and also averting loss to the landlord by a change of tenant. (Hear, hear.) He had considered this subject deeply for a lengthened period of time, and his opinion was this: that it was preferable to the occupier to have six months' notice to quit, with compensation for the value of the improvements he had made on the land, than trust to security the best lease could afford him. (Cries of "No, no.") Look at Scotland, the country to which it was now the fashion and habit to turn on all questions of agriculture, where the lease expired and the tenant quitted at the same time. Look, again, at Lincolnshire, where it would be found that six months' notice to quit, with the compensatory clauses in the agreement, worked well, both for tenant and landlord. (Hear.) He was therefore of opinion, as he said previously, a six months' notice to quit, with a compensation for outlay and improvement—the sum, of course, settled by valuation properly made—was more remunerative and fair to a farmer than the uncertainty of a lease. ("Hear, hear," and "No, no.")

The exclamations of dissent were general and unequivocal. But the absurdity of Mr. Hill's proposition was thus exposed by Mr. Fisher Hobbs, who said:

"His opinion was that an enterprising tenant would not be satisfied by a holding that might expire at the end of six months. (Hear, hear.) There were improvements made and money expended on a farm which no valuer could detect, or detecting, appreciate—(Hear, hear)—and though the occupier were paid for improvements, still the uncertain tenure by which he would hold under Mr. Hill's plan would be a bar to his prosperity and comfort. The landlord on his part ought to have a good and remunerative rent for his land, but he thought he would not do his duty if he did not afford to his tenant a fixity of tenure. (Hear, hear.)"

Farmers of England, is not this strictly, literally true?

And Mr. R. B. Harvey, whose exertions on various occasions to show what a lease should be merit the thanks of the farmers, observed:

"He was glad to hear that on all sides it was now allowed that security must be given to the occupiers. The only difference was as to the best mode, Mr. Hill recommending compensation clauses in preference to leases; but it must not be forgotten that, although these compensation clauses might repay to the tenants to-morrow the money which they had expended to-day—might give some security for capital expended on a farm—they did not give that which was equally required, security of possession. The tenants were as attached to their homesteads as any other class of persons, and the great stimulus to improvement was the knowledge that if they did not live to enjoy the comforts which they were raising around them, their wives or families would. LEASES ALONE GAVE BOTH THE NECESSARY STIMULUS AND THE NECESSARY SECURITY."

These two extracts from farmers' speeches comprise the whole question. Without a lease there can be no security of possession, and security of possession is necessary for profitable farming. Tenant rights and allowances for "unexhausted improvements" without a lease are sheer delusions, and should be so treated by farmers. We are glad, nevertheless, that the landowners have introduced the subject of "unexhausted improvements" and compensation clauses, because it will be found that no lease can be perfectly fair towards the tenant which does not comprise such clauses. Nor is it to be supposed that the tenants alone will benefit by rational leases. Landlords will receive equivalent advantages in the form of higher rents, and more certain and continuous payment; and they will lose that only which no honest man can desire to possess, viz., the power of perpetrating fraud and committing injustice.

AGRICULTURAL PROGRESSION.

Every journal has of late been expatiating on the progress of agricultural opinion, as evidenced by the speeches at the meetings of the present season; but the progress is apparent rather than real. It is true, tenant farmers have spoken out more freely and plainly than has hitherto happened at these meetings, but their speeches have been such only as they have been long accustomed to make amongst themselves; and the recent utterance of them in public is owing to the circumstance that the great landholders in general have fought shy of agricultural meetings this autumn. The presidencies have therefore fallen to the lot of smaller men; and the farmers, relieved from the influence of the grandees, have spoken. Wherever grandees have presided, there has still been the usual quantum of sickly sentiment and unmeaning compliment. And at every meeting where practical and useful speeches have been made, they have proceeded from tenant farmers, not from landlords; and in not a few instances strenuous effort has been made by the gentry to burk the expression of tenant farmers' opinions. Of this, we find an illustration at the meeting of the North Staffordshire Society, at Newcastle-under-line. At the Committee dinner on the previous day, when none but gentry were present, the following eloquent appeal by Mr. Ricardo, M.P., was rapturously applauded.

"You have set an example this day which I hope to see followed throughout the kingdom—you have brought together at one board, agriculture and commerce. (Hear.) You have placed down, cheek by jowl, the ploughshare and the hatter's block. I am glad to see here practically refuted that which has been said so often and so wrongly, that there is an antagonism existing between commerce and agriculture. (Cheers.) Men never pass through a sterile barren deserted district, and expect to come to a thriving town. But in the neighbourhood of a prosperous town every eye expects to meet with fertile lands, and high cultivation. (Cheers.) If farmers have not been so told by their fathers, they must tell it to their sons, that it is to the manufacturers they must look for their customers. (Cheers.) Every tall chimney, throwing forth its smoke, shows that hundreds are employed in honest remunerating industry. Wherever the chimney is damp within, and moss-grown without, there misery and starvation exists. In the prosperity of commerce, the prosperity of agriculture is involved—their welfare is your welfare—their interest is bound irrevocably to yours."

At the public dinner on the following day, some 300 persons were present; and the president, Mr. R. Sneyd, being, according to approved custom in these Societies, apersonally ignorant of agriculture, the greater part of the evening passed in handily compliments between the Lord, M.P., and gentry present, diversified occasionally by allusion to the "prejudice cherished by farmers." Lord Sandon, however, distinctly recognised the identity of the farmer's interest with commercial and manufacturing prosperity. And so long as all was confined to generalities, every thing went smoothly and pleasantly; but by-and-bye came the toast of "Mr. Charles Minton, the Farmer, Vice-president, and the tenant farmers of North Staffordshire." Mr. Minton, in returning thanks:

"Suggested the propriety of landlords supplying the more expensive, yet essential agricultural implements, and instanced the case of Lord Sefton, who provided his tenants with subsoil ploughs. After enumerating the advantages to be gained by improved cultivation, and through drainage, Mr. Minton proceeded to speak upon the evils and disadvantages under which tenant farmers laboured, not the least of which was the enormous quantity of hedge-row timber on some estates. He was glad to inform the meeting that a neighbouring landowner—Sir Edward Vavasour—had given permission for his tenants to cut down every tree obnoxious to their arable land. Mr. M. was proceeding further to elucidate the subject, when the noise caused by the departure of some of the company, and the impatience of others, compelled him to desist. Mr. M. was so imperfectly heard throughout, that it would be impossible to furnish anything like a correct report of his address."

And we learn from other sources that this interruption proceeded entirely from the gentlemen at the cross table, who had no inclination to listen to the real sentiments of the tenant farmers. Thus it always is whenever the farmers attempt to speak. The evening is wasted in a long string of complimentary toasts, so that by the time any outspoken farmer can have an opportunity of saying a word, so much time has elapsed as to give the grandees an excuse for breaking up the meeting.

A remarkable proof of the ready acceptance which sound common sense views find with the farmers, is offered by an incident which occurred at the dinner of the Highland Agricultural Society. On the "Tenantry of Scotland" being toasted, a gentleman got up to return thanks, but there was so loud and general a call amongst the farmers for Mr. Aitchinson, that he was compelled to do the duty.

Now Mr. Aitchinson is obviously a hard headed practical man, and a Free Trader; for he thus referred to the subject of the toast:

"Had he (the chairman) come here three years ago, he would have found the farmers excited by feelings which might have made them remind his grace, and those of his order, that the day seemed coming when the farmers—unless they were to be superseded—would require to lean upon a more substantial reed than liberal speeches."

And he afterwards said—

"He would not deny that the farmers in this district were participating in the general prosperity of the country—(cheers)—and although the harvest had not been altogether such as would satisfy the husbandman, there had been no check to the prosperity of the trading classes with whom their interests were permanently bound up. Political subjects were very properly, as Mr. Hope Johnson had observed, kept entirely in abeyance in meetings of this society, but whatever opinions there might be, he was satisfied that to this complexion they must come at last—that prosperity in Lancashire was prosperity in Dumfriesshire. (Great and prolonged cheering.) They were all now agreed, or must come to agree, whatever were their political opinions, that it was in vain for them to fatten their stock if they could not send them when fattened to remunerating markets. And these markets were only to be had where the trading classes were congregated together. The consuming power of the masses to take off the food which the farmers could send them depended upon their wages; and the rate of these wages again depended upon the prosperity of the manufacturers who employed them."

And these are the rational views most acceptable to the farmers. Subsequently, after a reference to railways, Mr. Aitchinson said:

"These changes must give a great impetus to agricultural improvement; but their full development must depend greatly upon the conduct of the lords of the soil to their retainers, upon those liberal views by which they govern their estates. For as liberality is now the controlling principle in the government of nations, so he trusted it would also become in private property, for what was good for countries must be good for communities; and in the discharge of those duties, in his humble opinion, depended more the advancement of agriculture, than upon restrictive laws and legislative enactments. (Cheers.)"

Compare these masculine sentiments of a tenant farmer with the namby-pamby talk the landlords address to their tenants, and see whether it is not incumbent on the gentry to take up higher ground at these agricultural meetings, if they mean to retain any real influence over the farmers.

"PROTECTED" AGRICULTURE.

WHO ARE THE PROTECTORS?

We observe that that theoretical protectionist, but practical Free Trader, Mr. Warnes, has been attending a meeting of the Stowponcy Agricultural Association, where he urged with great effect the use of linseed compound for fattening cattle, and the growth of flax for the employment of labourers. The reporter states that Mr. Warnes—

"Had on the ground a copper for cooking nutiment for cattle, and for the incorporation of linseed with any material which may be used as food for cattle, and by means of which, cabbage, turnip-tops, &c., are rendered useful for this purpose. An additional object of it is to convey linseed to the animal's stomach in such a state that it may be quickly returned to be ruminated, and the process of digestion hastened. Mr. W. also exhibited a model cattle-box, constructed for harbouring stock intended for fattening, and in which the animals may remain for weeks cleaner than under the existing system by which the standing places of cattle are cleaned out in some cases twice a day. These two articles were generally approved by the company."

We think the agricultural community is much indebted to Mr. Warnes for bringing into notice the advantages of fattening cattle with linseed compound. Cattle feed faster and at less expense on this compound than on oil-cake, for which it is a substitute. The process of making it is extremely simple. One measure of crushed linseed to seven or eight of water makes, when cooled, a thick jelly. The water being at boiling point, the linseed is thrown in dispersedly, and stirred for five minutes, and then the liquid is mixed with cut straw or hay in the winter, or cut grass, clover, tares, &c., in the summer; and when cool, the compound is given to the cattle twice or three times a day. At first they do not always eat it kindly, but after a few days they invariably devour it greedily. Between each bait of compound the beast should have a feed of cut roots, or dry chaff, or cut green food by way of variety. An iron boiler erected with a flue in any out-building adjacent to the cattle-sheds, and a couple of tubs to hold the food, are alone required to feed with the compound. Indeed, it is scarcely more trouble than feeding with oil-cake, and we have reason to rely on Mr. Warnes's estimate that the cost is not more than one half. This plan opens a new source of productiveness to the farmer in his own cattle yards. Then the economy of keeping the manure in the box or pen, littering the animal down once or twice a day, so as to keep it clean, until the accumulation becomes inconvenient, is such, that the superior value of the manure over that which has been exposed day by day in the open yard is at least double. Here, then, we have another important suggestion of means within the farmer's own power, by which he may set competition at defiance. The principal article recommended by the plan is a seed grown exclusively abroad, and imported without any duty. This seed, this unprotected seed, Mr. Warnes tells us, and he refers to data derived from his own experience, which seem decisive, can be profitably grown in this country. Can there be a more biting commentary upon the protective system?

At the dinner, Mr. W. Whitmore thus referred to Mr. Warnes's plans:

"He invited the attention of agriculturists to this matter, because he believed the experiment would be found highly advantageous. Mr. W. next proceeded, in complimentary terms, to propose the health of Mr. Warnes—a gentleman who had turned an active and intelligent mind to the improvement of agricultural science—one who had experimentalised successfully, as they had witnessed in the show-yard that day. With reference to his system of feeding cattle in boxes, he had witnessed the plan in operation, and he never saw cattle in cleaner and better condition; the place was dry and clean, perfectly free from smell, and was a means by which cattle were fattened much quicker than by any other plan. (Hear.) He was also satisfied with the efficacy of his (Mr. Warnes's) plan for preparing food, and he was also satisfied that linseed ought to be cultivated to a great extent in this country, seeing that it was difficult to procure it from abroad; and he was therefore of opinion that the growth of flax ought to be introduced as a valuable part of agriculture."

We shall hear presently why this "valuable part of agriculture" cannot be at present generally introduced.

Mr. Warnes, in responding, said:

"He urged the growth of flax, for this amongst other reasons—that it would be a means of providing full employment for the labourer; insisted that it would be found far more beneficial food for cattle than oil-cake, which it was well known was composed of material almost utterly worthless. People might as well believe that all the Port wine on our tables came from Oporto as that all the oil-cake received in this country was made from linseed; at the same time he admitted that the robbery on the public was not by the English merchant, but the foreign trader. The speaker addressed the meeting at some length in advocacy of the principle of preserving the liquid manure; from what he had seen he believed that half the manure in Shropshire ran into the ditches."

We are satisfied, however, that the compound will justify the comparison we have made when put in competition with the best cake. Sir Thomas Winington, the President, also "hoped to see the hints and suggestions of Mr. Warnes fully carried out at no distant day." Mr. Foley subsequently referred to an absurd rule of the society, which excluded from competition animals fed on artificial food—a system of feeding which is the very first step to improved husbandry:

"We are now assembled at our fifth anniversary meeting. The premiums offered are more, and the competition less than on any former occasion. The disposition to keep breeding flocks does not seem to have increased; and by a recent regulation all sheep fed on oil-cake, corn, and other artificial food are excluded from obtaining prizes at your show. You complain that your seeds fail; but if instead of subsoil ploughing them after harvest with pigs, you would preserve them till May, and then feed them with sheep penned, and give in addition this food that you object to, I think you would not find that to be the case."

Such a rule is literally a premium on low farming. Afterwards, Mr. Baldwin, in returning thanks, showed that the obstacle to flax-growing consisted in the restrictive rules of the landlords, the self-styled protectors of agriculture. He said :

"He had been connected with farming all his lifetime; and the more he studied the subject, the more thoroughly convinced was he that agriculture had been neglected. It presented a wide field for improvement, far more so than any branch of trade; and having himself recently taken a farm, he had determined to carry out improvements to their fullest extent. He remarked on the curious circumstances connected with the terms on which he had taken his farm, as bearing upon the discussion of that night, respecting the growth of flax; observing that for every acre of flax he grew, it was agreed that he should forfeit 20*l.*; but I am quite sure that if my landlord had heard the speech of our friend Mr. Warnes to night, he would give me 10*l.* for every acre I grew. (Laughter.)"

Now these objections to flax-growing, to breaking up pastures, to removing trees and hedge-rows, are landlord's "prejudices," to which they adhere with the most blind tenacity. And yet, after such a practical illustration of the truth of our imputations against the landowners, we find Mr. Thomas Whitmore giving utterance to the following silliness :

"I am glad to find that the attempt to set landlord against tenant, and tenant against labourer, has failed. The agriculturists have more good sense than to regard the nonsense of the Anti-Corn Law League, or their still more silly letters."

We are quite content to abide by the award of the agriculturists whether the "nonsense" is ours, or Squire Thos. Whitmore's.

ECONOMY OF CATTLE-FOOD.

The following statement of a mode of using inferior hay was made by Mr. E. Buller, M.P., at the Newcastle-under-Lyne Dinner :

"He had lately been informed how to make damaged hay available; and he had practised the experiment with complete success. The plan was to cut all the hay and straw together; then form a gruel of offal grain and linseed cake; steep the grain and cake for 48 hours; mix it hot, press it down, and leave it for 48 hours. The cattle eat it eagerly, and thrive on it. The process softens all the hard fibre, and makes the hay nearly as serviceable as if it had been gathered in good condition. The whole machinery required might be had for 19*l.*; one horse, employed for two evenings in a week, would cut hay and straw for all the horses on the farm, and be the means of saving three times the actual cost."

Now the linseed compound, made as described in another column, is a cheaper, more expeditious, and far more effective mode of using damaged hay. In this wet season such hints are most useful to the farmer.

AGRICULTURAL CORRESPONDENCE.

"A FARMER FROM THE WABASH VALLEY," resident in London for a few weeks, says :

"I am a grower of wheat; and I should be glad to deliver on the banks of the Ohio River, a high road to the sea, wheat for 3*s.* per bushel of 60 lbs. Before I left home, I sold it for the miserable pittance of 56*c.*, or about 2*s.* per bushel of 60 lbs. Was I reasonably certain of obtaining 3*s.* per bushel, or its equivalent in manufactures such as I or those I employ stand in need of, instead of putting in 20 acres of wheat for next year, I could put in 200; and I speak the sentiments of thousands. But if the interests of the English farmer deny to the working millions the luxury of cheap wheat, or if his interest is likely to suffer from the competition of wheat grown 5000 miles distant, which is improbable, the same objection cannot be urged against maize or Indian corn, which agriculturists say cannot be successfully grown in this country. That could be supplied at a very low rate from the Western States, Government interference excepted. The farmer would be well paid to deliver it on the banks of navigable rivers, at from 1*s.* to 1*s.* 3*d.* per bush. of 56 lbs. Was such facility given to the west, we should not hear of repudiated bonds."

The following account of an experiment with guano will be useful to our farming readers :

"To the Editor of THE LEAGUE.

"Sir,—Having heard various opinions as to the most proper time for the application of guano to wheat, I determined last autumn to make the subjoined experiment; and although the corn grown in the fields in which they were tried cannot be thrashed soon enough to ascertain the respective yields, yet I think it desirable to communicate thus early the judgment I have formed, in order that it may find a place in your columns before the season for sowing wheat shall have passed away. I selected three fields contiguous to each other, the soils of which are pretty much alike, and condition nearly equal.

"1844. Nov. 5th and 6th.—Drilled the first field with wheat, and sowed 1½ cwt. of guano per acre, harrowing it in with the seed; and on the 26th March, sowed 1½ cwt. more of guano per acre, rolling and bush harrowing immediately afterwards.

"Nov. 18th and 19th.—Drilled the second field with wheat, and sowed 3 cwt. of guano per acre, harrowing it in with the seed. The field was rolled in the spring, but nothing further done.

"Nov. 23th and 26th.—Drilled the third field with wheat, but without guano or any other manure. Swede turnips have been pulled and carted off. On the 1st of April, 1½ cwt. of guano per acre was applied; and on the 21st of April, 1½ cwt. per acre more.

"Two bushels of seed of the same sort of wheat were sown per acre, and the two first fields were clover leys once ploughed. The crop of the field sown on November 18th and 19th, in which the 3 cwt. of guano per acre was sowed at seed time, is so decidedly superior to the crops of both the other fields, that I shall adopt that course in future. I freely admit this to be contrary to my present impression and practice, which has been to put on half the manure at seed time, and the remaining half as a top-dressing in the spring.—I have the honour to be, Sir, your most obedient servant,

"S. H. WILLIAMS, Col., &c.

REVIEW.

On the Value of the Potato. By a Munster Farmer. Unpublished.

The subject to which this little pamphlet refers is one of painful and increasing importance. The view taken of it by the author is too confined and local to have any general interest, but we avail ourselves of the opportunity to say a few words on the present aspect of a crop, which is declared on high authority to furnish the chief means of subsistence to rejoicing millions of our countrymen. Most persons have heard the legendary history which describes the introduction of the cultivation of the potato into Europe. It is said that Sir Walter Raleigh, to whom large grants of forfeited estates had been made in the south of Ireland, brought from South America the seeds of several new esculents, which he planted in his garden at Myrtle Grove; a seat which had been originally the residence of the Master of the College, established in Youghal soon after the Anglo-Norman Conquest. There is abundant evidence to prove that Raleigh valued the lands which he obtained on the banks of the Blackwater, and particularly those near the town of Youghal, more than any of the other estates he received. Youghal harbour, possessing a safe and good anchorage, easily accessible from the Atlantic, and scarcely known by name to the nations of Europe, afforded a safe depot for the plunder which the Buccaneers obtained from the Spaniards; and there is no doubt now that Raleigh's connection with the Buccaneers was continued long after he had entered the service of Elizabeth.

Nothing is more remarkable in the history of the English Buccaneers, many of whom were young men of good family, than the care which they took to destroy every scrap of paper or memorandum which could preserve the history of their proceedings. Sir Walter Scott describes Philip of Morham, in the poem of Rokeby, as a desperate pirate in his early days, and a most rigid puritan in later years. Tradition narrates the same change in many of Raleigh's associates, who settled under his patronage on the banks of the Blackwater; they were most of them young adventurers from Devonshire and the vicinity of Bristol; and the shortness and comparative safety of the voyage from Youghal to Bristol was probably a strong recommendation of Raleigh's settlement. The ferocious practices ascribed to the Buccaneers in the American seas were not abandoned when they made Youghal their European depot; the legends of the peasantry point out several spots on the sea-coast where Spaniards were murdered and burned to prevent their telling tales of cruelty and robbery, or where a negro was slaughtered that his grisly ghost might defend a hidden treasure.

It is said that when the potatoes first grew to maturity, the original cultivator tried to use the seed-apple; but that finding this to afford no nutriment, he ordered the roots to be dug up and thrown away. When this was done, the true potatoes were discovered; and from thenceforth they began to be regularly cultivated.

From the time of Elizabeth to the close of the war of the Revolution, the valley of the Blackwater was the scene of obscure and petty warfare between the English settlers, brought over by Raleigh and the first Earl of Cork, and the native Irish. One result of these barbarous hostilities was the frequent burning of the uncut harvest; and the great advantage derived from the culture of the potato was that the crop could not be fired. The progress of the cultivation, however, was very slow and imperceptible; it may surprise many to learn that the esculent was long viewed with dislike by the native Irish, and that the use of it was deemed characteristic of the English settler. In the Cromwellian wars, the cultivation of the potato appears to have rapidly increased; it was found that the crop was not only safe from the danger of flame, but that its difficulty of transport saved it frequently from military requisitions, and that it derived further protection from the ease and safety with which it would be preserved in pits. Indeed, pits dug in the earth are to this day the ordinary potato stores of the Irish peasantry.

The revolution by which the food of an entire population was changed must have been slow and gradual; potatoes had not become the staple esculents in the early part of the last century, for they are scarcely noticed by the satirical author of "Gillo's Feast." It was not until the operation of the penal laws began to substitute a cottier tenantry for a middle class of farmers, that potatoes, which admit of slovenly and careless cultivation, were substituted for corn, which requires the application of some skill and capital to yield a remunerative return. It was because the potato could be raised, though imperfectly, under the worst possible management, that it was denominated by the Royal Agricultural Society of Ireland, "the Upas tree of Irish agriculture."

Some check to this evil might have been afforded, if care had been taken to cultivate only those kinds of potatoes which yield the largest proportions of farinaceous matter; but it soon appeared that such varieties could only be retained in their perfection by a skilful and careful system of culture, and that the quality of the yield, rather than its quantity, should engage the attention of the farmer. Cottiers without either skill or capital, however, looked only to the yield; they wished to have great numbers of potatoes, and did not pay sufficient attention to the nutritious qualities of each. The Munster farmer mentions several varieties of the potato which some years ago bore a high character, but which from careless cultivation have now so far degenerated as to be fit only for food for cattle.

Of the present crop in the south of Ireland, the Munster farmer speaks rather despondingly; we regret to find that his gloomy anticipations seem too likely to be verified; at a meeting of the Fermoy Board of Guardians last week, Mr. Stephen Barry, an eminent practical agriculturist, said :

"That he came to call upon the Board to take some practical steps to prepare, as far as in them lay, to meet the awful calamity with which the country was threatened. He said he had examined closely all the fields along the road from Rathcoormac to Riverstown the day before, and he found only one free from disease. In one place, where several men were digging out the general crop, they told him they had nearly escaped the visitation, as only a very few of the potatoes were injured. But on examining those put by as sound, he was sorry to say that at least 20 per cent. of them had the most unmistakable symptoms of the rot, which he pointed out, to the utter horror of the poor owners. They were, also, he said, putting them into pits, much too deep and over large in every way, and putting but very little earth with them. He then went on to call upon the Board:—First to send urgent circulars to the Rural Guardians, praying them to make minute examinations of every field within their reach, and to report the result at the next Board day, when by comparing notes they would be able to estimate the damage done in an area of 200,000 acres, and a condensed report may be drawn up and published. Secondly:—To write to every Roman Catholic clergyman in the Union, respectfully requesting them to recommend to their flocks on Sunday next, the immediate digging out of the potatoes, and the greatest possible attention in picking them, to separate the still sound roots from the unsound. Those as yet free from the disease to be placed in small heaps on the crown of the ridge, after being dug, and not in the furrows as is usually done; but slightly covered, and a large quantity of earth thrown in with them, so as to keep them from contact with each other as much as possible. But a still better plan has been suggested to me by a practical farmer of great intelligence, namely, to leave all the healthy potatoes, on the crown of the ridge, as they are dug out, trenching them up with a slight covering of earth, by which all risk of contact and fermentation would be avoided. With regard to the unsound roots, to beg that the people may be strongly urged to make them at once into starch, which would be found to make a good and wholesome bread mixed with flour or meal."

The accounts from other parts of Munster are equally alarming, and it is generally believed that much which had been stored as sound, will be found on trial to have been diseased.

We have referred to this subject principally to show a result of the Corn Laws, to which sufficient attention has not been paid. The increased use of potatoes in England has arisen entirely from the high price of corn. Since 1815 there has been a growing and grievous revolution taking place in the staple food of the working classes, and it is therefore of importance that we should study with attention the economic qualities of the landlords' substitute for bread. And first, we have to remark, that since Ireland has become dependent upon the potato, the country has been subject to visitations of famine and disease, occurring at irregular periods, but arriving so sudden and so unexpected, that there is no opportunity for the exercise of caution or foresight. The very quality which recommended the potato in the time of civil war—the crop being concealed beneath the surface—prevents any knowledge of its condition until it is dug up to be stored. The difficulty of transport which saved it from being carried away by Cromwell's soldiers, equally prevents its being brought to supply a sudden deficiency. Its perishable nature prevents it from being stored; and its liability to degenerate, even under the most favourable circumstances, renders its cultivation hazardous.

The Munster Farmer proposes that experiments should be made to obtain new varieties from seed, to ascertain the nutritious qualities of each variety, and the kind of culture best suited to the most nutritious kinds. Long before his remedies could be applied, famine might spread through the length and breadth of the land. The extent of the danger is not yet ascertained; but if it is as great as the most intelligent believe, those who have exposed us to the peril have incurred a fearful responsibility.

Narrative of the Life of Frederick Douglass, an American Slave. Written by himself. Dublin, Webb and Chapman.

This book is a curiosity, however we view it. It comes to us certified by highly respectable persons on this and the other side of the Atlantic as the authentic production of one who has witnessed and experienced the bitter fruits of slavery. To understand and appreciate the Narrative, it is necessary to lay aside the office of critic and realise the condition of the author, whose whole mind seems to be filled with the subject of slavery and its victims, whether slaves, overseers, or slave holders. Only in this way can the writer be forgiven his occasionally elaborate portraits of individuals having nothing about them worthy of notice, save their almost incredible brutality. But even as a literary production, this book possesses no ordinary claims. The author, though uneducated, or rather self-educated, displays great natural powers: he utters his thoughts always lucidly, and often with a polished and vigorous eloquence. Indeed, the book convinces us, and must convince any impartial reader, that the argument, if it can be so termed, which would uphold slavery on the ground of the slaves' natural inferiority, has no foundation as regards such men as the writer, and therefore totally fails in its general application.

Where there is so much to interest the reader and excite the philanthropist—now with pain at human suffering from inhuman oppression, and now with hopefulness that that suffering, and the causes of it, promise soon to be brought to a termination, we can only afford space for a striking extract, in which the author exhibits his style and power as a writer, while accounting for and refuting the proslavery assertion of the contentedness of the poor African under his bondage:

"The slaves selected to go to the Great House Farm, for the monthly allowance for themselves and their fellow-slaves, were peculiarly enthusiastic. While on their way, they would make the dense old woods, for miles around, reverberate with their wild songs, revealing at once the highest joy and the deepest sadness. They would compose and sing as they went along, consulting neither time nor tune. The thought that came up came out—if not in the word, in the sound—and as frequently in the one as in the other. They would sometimes sing the most pathetic sentiment in the most rapturous tone, and the most rapturous sentiment in the most pathetic tone. Into all of their songs they would manage to weave something of the Great House Farm. Especially would they do this, when leaving home. They would then sing most exultingly the following words:

'I am going away to the Great House Farm!
O, yea! O, yea! O!'

This they would sing, as a chorus, to words which to many would seem unmeaning jargon; but which, nevertheless, were full of meaning to themselves. I have sometimes thought that the mere hearing of those songs would do more to impress some minds with the horrible character of slavery than the reading of whole volumes of philosophy on the subject could do.

"I did not, when a slave, understand the deep meaning of those rude and apparently incoherent songs. I was myself within the circle; so that I neither saw nor heard as those without might see and hear. They told a tale of woe which was then altogether beyond my feeble comprehension; they were tones loud, long, and deep; they breathed the prayer and complaint of souls boiling over with the bitterest anguish. Every tone was a testimony against slavery, and a prayer to God for deliverance from chains. The hearing of those wild notes always depressed my spirits, and filled me with ineffable sadness. I have frequently found myself in tears while hearing them. The mere recurrence to those songs, even now, afflicts me; and while I am writing these lines, an expression of feeling has already found its way down my cheek. To those songs I trace my first glimmering conceptions of the dehumanising character of slavery. I can never get rid of that conception. Those songs still follow me, to deepen my hatred of slavery, and quicken my sympathies for my brethren in bonds. If any one wishes to be impressed with the soul-killing effects of slavery, let him go to Colonel Lloyd's plantation, and, on allowance-day, place himself in the deep pine woods, and there let him, in silence, analyse the sounds that shall pass through the chambers of his soul;—and if he is not thus impressed, it will only be because 'there is no flesh in his obdurate heart.'

"I have often been utterly astonished, since I came to the north, to find persons who could speak of the singing among slaves, as evidence of their contentment and happiness. It is impossible to conceive of a greater mistake. Slaves sing most when they are most unhappy. The songs of the slave represent the sorrows of his heart; and he is relieved by them, only as an aching heart is relieved by its tears. At least, such is my experience. I have often sung to drown my sorrow; but seldom to express my happiness. Crying for joy, and singing for joy, were alike uncommon to me while in the jaws of slavery. The singing of a man cast away upon a desolate island might be as appropriately considered as evidence of contentment and happiness, as the singing of a slave; the songs of the one and of the other are prompted by the same emotion."

THE MANCHESTER ATHENÆUM SOIRÉE.—In addition to the distinguished persons who have already accepted the invitation to the soirée on the 23d instant, Mark Lemon, Esq. (the editor of Punch), and Gilbert à Beckett, Esq., one of its most distinguished contributors, have expressed their intention to be present. With these gentlemen, Douglas Jerrold, and Charles Dickens, the soirée bids fair to be a glorious "Night with Punch."—Manchester Guardian. We have looked over the list of the guests as advertised, and observe, much to the credit of the Manchester people, that the foremost names are those of the men of genius who have been invited.—C. Dickens, Esq., D. Jerrold, Mark Lemon, Gilbert à Beckett, Charles Knight, Samuel Lover, and then come the Members of Parliament for the borough, some of their distinguished townsmen and neighbours, such as Mr. Cobden, Mr. Bright, and Mr. Brotherton. The municipal authorities are also to be present; but with the exception of Sir B. Heywood, who is one of the society itself, we do not observe a single titled guest. The Lancashire gentlemen have in general been reproached with entertaining too profound a respect for the aristocracy, and we may therefore look on the meetings of the Manchester Athenæum as proofs that they are reforming themselves. Last year, if we recollect correctly, Mr. D'Israeli was their chief guest at the Athenæum. They have, therefore, come to the right conclusion, that talents and genius ennobles whatever they mingle with, and can receive no additional dignity from mere conventional and political titles.—Chronicle.

The existing House of Commons may continue in being till the autumn of 1847, and from actual appearance there is no reason to conclude that it will be dissolved much before that time.—Globe.

NOTICES TO CORRESPONDENTS.

"E. D., York-shire," is informed that the League has no connection with the Building Society he refers to; but it is understood to be a very promising institution, and under good management.

TO COUNTRY SUBSCRIBERS.

Any person forwarding 3s. 3d. by Post-office order to the Publisher, 67, Fleet-street, London, will have one quarter's copies of the LEAGUE forwarded by post on the days of publication. Subscriptions for the paper may also be left with J. Gadsby, Newall's-buildings, Manchester; and the LEAGUE may be had by order of any news-agent in town or country. Subscribers who receive coloured envelopes on their papers must bear in mind that their subscriptions are due.

POSTSCRIPT.

LONDON, Saturday Morning, October 18, 1845.

In other parts of our paper will be found accounts of the prospects of the harvest far less gratifying than those which were rife a few weeks ago; and these have produced in most of our markets feelings, if not of positive alarm, at least of uneasiness and uncertainty. The Bank of England has raised its rate of discounts as a measure of prudent precaution, and the consequence has been a marked depression in the fund and share-markets; but the full effect of this advance cannot be known until we learn the results of this intelligence in the country. A few wet days have thus excited apprehensions which, in a commercial country like ours, must exercise a depressing influence on every branch of business. We, however, meet with few who misunderstand, or even affect to misunderstand, the cause of the evil. Commerce is the remedy provided by Providence for those fluctuations in the production of the fruits of the earth which arise from the vicissitudes of the seasons; restrictions on commerce not only deprive us of the remedy, but greatly aggravate the evils of the fluctuations. Had the trade in corn been free during the last two years, our stores would have been filled with surplus produce, ready to come into the market whenever deficiency of supply offered a remunerative price; but, under the sliding-scale, the exercise of such prudential foresight is rendered too hazardous to be attempted. Should our supplies for the coming year be inadequate, as there is too much reason to fear, we shall have to rush suddenly into unprepared markets to obtain food at any price or any hazard.

The intelligence we have received from Belgium, by newspapers and private letters, is far from being calculated to soothe our feelings of alarm. The pressure of distress is beginning to be felt in Old Flanders and Brabant. Farmers whose crops have failed murmur against demands for rent; and it has been found necessary to take measures for protecting the vegetables in the fields from the depredations of the distressed. The Belgians, however, have had one great advantage: their potato-crop being earlier by about six weeks than that of Ireland, the extent of the evil was ascertained in sufficient time to enable the Belgian Government to adopt the wise measure of suspending the Corn Laws, and throwing open their ports before there was a rush of other competitors into the provision-markets of the world. We have given the latest intelligence of the state of the potato-crops in Ireland. We find from the semi-official organ of the Cabinet, that the Ministry is not insensible to the danger; but when we seek what are the remedies proposed, we find ourselves perplexed by the following oracular sentences:

"The effect of a considerable failure in the Irish potato crop, such as has been described, cannot be painted in colours too dreadful. Potatoes, as we have said, constitute the sole food of millions, and there is no coarser kind of food upon which to descend, even in the last necessity. Add, that even of potatoes, the usual supply of each Irish peasant is miserably scanty—they live habitually in scarcity, in what elsewhere would be thought famine; any deterioration, therefore, must be DEATH in its most cruel form—mark, the death—by want, of millions of our fellow creatures, men, helpless women, and innocent children, our fellow subjects and our fellow Christians.

"This is a frightful picture, but it is neither manly nor wise to hesitate either to present or to contemplate it. The people must not be, and with the blessing of the Almighty, shall not be permitted to perish—and the sooner and the more universally the threatened danger is considered, the easier and more effectual will be the means of guarding against it.

"The Government is happily administered by a statesman the most careful and vigilant that ever directed the affairs of the country, and nevertheless, the most bold and energetic that England has seen in office since the days of Clatham. Of a minister too, whose attention has lately been rivetted on Irish affairs, with affectionate anxiety. Whatever a Government can do will be done; of this we may be well assured, for Sir Robert Peel is by far too wise a man to apply pedantically the general rule to a case so rare—so singular as to be absolutely sui generis."

Now what is the meaning of the emphatic shall? The only remedy for a deficient supply at home is the importation of food from abroad; and this is of course impossible so long as a duty of 18s. per quarter exists, as if specially enacted to ensure the certainty of famine. If the paragraph has any meaning, it must point to the immediate adoption of the course that has been pursued in Belgium and Holland—the immediate opening of the ports. An attempt to purchase up corn at home from our present limited stock would both accelerate and aggravate the crisis; prices would at once rise to such a height as to place provisions out of the reach of the poor, and famine would spread through the length and breadth of the land before the operations of the sliding scale would allow of any effectual relief by facilitating imports. A few days must solve the nature and extent of the danger, and these few days will be fraught with momentous consequences to the reputation of the minister—and, what is of far more importance, to the prosperity of the country.

WIGAN ELECTION.

The Free Trader has been defeated at the election for Wigan. However grieved we may be at such a result, we are not surprised or disappointed. If our readers will refer to the 57th Number of this Journal, containing an account of the Great Free Trade Meeting in Manchester, at which the chairman of the League made an official report on the registration of last year, it will be seen that no claim was made for gain or progress in Wigan, which was thus an exception to most of the manufacturing boroughs. The fact is, that there are from 50 to 100 electors in Wigan who regularly trade in their votes, who are as corrupt as any mercenaries in the country, and have generally sold themselves at as high a price. At one of the former contests, a butcher held off until five minutes before four o'clock, and then got 60% for his vote; he subsequently boasted that his own carcass was the most profitable ever sold in his shop. It is in boroughs of this kind that the monopolists generally triumph over Free Traders; but in the case of a growing manufacturing town like Wigan, we may reasonably hope that in time the increase of respectable voters will overgrow and neutralise the corrupt portion of the constituency.

The nomination of candidates for this borough took place on Wednesday morning, at the Moat Hall, at 11 o'clock. Thos. Eckersley, Esq., Mayor of the borough, presided. Mr. Joseph Acton, proposed R. A. Thicknesse, Esq., as a fit and proper person to represent them in Parliament. Rice Bevan, Esq., seconded the nomination. John Thompson, an extensive ironfounder, came forward and proposed Mr. Lindsay. John Lad, Esq., late Mayor, seconded the nomination. Mr. Thicknesse and Captain Lindsay then addressed the electors.

The Mayor then took a show of hands, when a majority appeared in favour of Mr. Lindsay.

Mr. Acton demanded a poll on behalf of Mr. Thicknesse, which commenced on Thursday morning at eight o'clock.

The polling commenced at eight o'clock on Thursday morning, and terminated in the return of Captain Lindsay; the numbers being—

For Lindsay	273
Thicknesse	211
Majority	62

WINDSOR ELECTION.—Sir John de Beauvoir has retired from the contest for this borough, leaving the battle to be fought by Colonel Reid and Mr. Walter.

FARM LABOURERS.—This useful class of men are now much sought for in Glamorganshire, in consequence of so many of them leaving the farmers for the ironworks at Merthyr, Tredegar, Nantyglo, &c., where they have high wages and constant employment. Many men have lately arrived at Aberthaw and Cardiff from Minehead. If this had not been the case the harvest could not have been finished by November or December. The wages have been 16s. to 18s. per week, which is about double what they could get in Somerset. To show how scarce ploughmen are, a Welsh newspaper contained an advertisement for three of this useful class—the same application appeared several weeks. This would not have been the case in Wilts or Dorset.

FAILURE OF THE SALTPETRE EXPEDITION TO POSSESSION ISLAND.—We have been favoured with the perusal of a letter from Possession Island (coast of Africa), dated 2nd July, 1845, by which it appears that the expectations of parties who hoped to find an extensive deposit of saltpetre in that quarter have been entirely defeated, as there is none to be obtained on the whole coast. We are sorry it has turned out thus, as three or four vessels which sailed from this port are amongst the disappointed.—Mail Advertiser.

EPITOME OF NEWS.

FOREIGN.

FRANCE.—The Paris papers of Tuesday do not contradict the rumour that a corps of 200 French soldiers had been compelled to surrender to the troops of Abdel Kader. The preparations for largely reinforcing the army of Algeria were rapidly progressing, and according to the Semaphore de Marseille, a French naval squadron, under the command of the Prince de Joinville, is forthwith to be despatched to Mogador. It is, however, pretty confidently believed that the King will not allow his sons to take part in the new operations, the more especially as a naval expedition would seem to be wholly uncalled for.—Two letters of the late Prince Talleyrand—the first to (it would seem) the Archbishop of Paris, the second to the Pope—announcing the Prince's orthodoxy as a son of the Roman Catholic and Apostolic Church, and written shortly before his death, are given by the French journals. The Ami de la Religion, in which they first appeared, pledges itself for their authenticity.—The Conservateur de la Dordogne had published a letter from Marshal Bugeaud to the Prefect, complaining of his (the Marshal's) treatment by the French Government. Notwithstanding, it was generally believed that he would still be employed against the Moors as commander of the expedition now preparing.—The Paris Moniteur of Wednesday, contains a report from General de Lamoriciere, dated O'ran, the 1st. inst., confirming the news of the surrender of 200 French soldiers to the Arabs.

SPAIN.—The Madrid Gazette of the 7th inst. publishes a royal decree reducing to 10 per cent. ad valorem the import duty on potash. Messrs. Lopez, Madoz, Cortina, and others prosecuted for participation in the revolt of Alicante, had been honourably acquitted. The Conservative and Liberal parties were both actively preparing for the municipal elections, which were to commence at Madrid on the 15th. The latter were certain of success.—It would appear that in Valentia the task of collecting the contributions is not very easy. The intendant of the province has been obliged to send out no less than 300 commissioners for that purpose. The latest accounts state that one of those commissioners had been killed in a small town, not far from the capital, in the execution of his duty.—The Emancipation, published at Toulouse, alleges on what it asserts to be authority, that the Young Queen of Spain is already married, and married to the eldest son of Don Carlos. The Madrid correspondent of the Post also states that this intelligence is perfectly authentic.

THE WAR IN THE CAUCASUS.—The Augsburg Gazette states, that Russia lost during the campaign of this year in the Caucasus 3 general officers, 6 colonels and lieutenant-colonels, 20 staff officers, 200 officers of various grades, and from 10,000 to 12,000 soldiers. The army, says that journal, is at present in a very deplorable state; famine and sickness have carried off vast numbers of men. The operations of this year have wholly failed. It was found necessary to abandon all the posts which had been gained with such great sacrifices, and in no part has a garrison been left.

THE RIVER PLATE.—Accounts which reached Liverpool on Friday week, reported from Buenos Ayres the rejection, by General Rosas, of the Ultimatum, of the allied powers, and the consequent seizure of the Argentine fleet by the French and English squadrons, while the ministers of these powers had adopted immediate steps to drive from the Banda Oriental the troops under Oribe.

UNITED STATES.—The British and North American Royal mail steam-ship Britannia, Captain Hewitt, arrived on Tuesday, in the Mersey with the usual mails from Canada and the United States. The advices are of the usual meagre and unsatisfactory character. The question of war had been universally decided in the negative. It was rumoured that official relations would shortly be resumed with Mexico.

The New York Sun reports a successful insurrection in Yucatan against Mexico. It says:—On the 9th of last month the Yucatanese under Gen. Barneo took possession of a Mexican schooner of war, and having placed on board of her all the Mexican functionaries and soldiers in that state, ordered her captain to sail with them for Vera Cruz, whence she departed immediately. She had been despatched by the Mexicans to levy men and money for the Texian war, but the people of Yucatan had suffered too much already from the oppressive tyranny of the central government; an immediate separation was resolved upon and carried out in the manner stated, without shedding a drop of blood. The state government was at once changed to a national one, retaining all the republican principles which have distinguished the citizens of that state.

Another outbreak amongst the Mormons had taken place. A letter in the St. Louis Republican from the editor of that paper, dated at Warsaw, Sept. 17, represents the state of things among the Mormons, or rather among the bands of lawless men who had assumed the title of Anti-Mormons, as most deplorable. They were carrying fire and faggot into the Mormon settlements in all directions, and did not confine themselves to the Mormons only, but laid waste the dwellings of all those suspected of favouring those fanatics. Down to the night of Sunday, the 14th, it is stated that 60 houses had been burnt down in Adams and Hancock counties. The Anti-Mormons had entered into an extended combination, and announced their determination not to stop short of the expulsion of every Mormon from Hancock county, in which is Nauvoo; and it was apprehended that a conflict would result between the two parties.

DOMESTIC.

The directors of the Bank of England, at a Court held on Thursday, resolved to raise the rate of discount on bills and notes to 3l. per cent., such bills and notes not having more than 95 days to run.

The Rev. Mr. Newman, with several others of the party denominated Puseyite, have openly seceded to the church of Rome.

An immense quantity of the magnificent slate from the quarries on the estate of the Knight of Kerry, Valentia Island, has been ordered for the new Houses of Parliament. It has been also ordered in large quantities for public buildings in France and other parts of the Continent. So beautifully veined and variegated is it, and so susceptible of a high polish, that it is capable of being wrought into elegant tables and other domestic articles. It is only a few years since this marble quarry was discovered.—Limerick Reporter.

Above a million of bricks, it is said, have recently been sent to Ceylon, as ballast, for the erection of a coffee-mill there. The price in the metropolis is rising. A few weeks ago, a brickmaker, in the Isle of Man, worked, for a wager, 611 bricks in eleven hours, being at the rate of 94 per minute.—The Builder.

Mr. Alfred Tennyson, the author of "Locksley Hall," the "May Queen," and some other beautiful poems, which stamp him one of the first poets of the age, has just received a pension of £200 per annum from her Majesty. Sir R. Peel did the thing very delicately through Mr. Hallam, the historian.—Cambridge Independent.

The representatives of some Manchester manufacturers have, it is said, in many instances received instructions, when accounts over-due are not paid by their customers, to inquire whether the debtor is a holder of shares in projected lines of railway; and if so, further instructions are given, that the account must be closed. This course, it is urged, is rendered necessary by the fact that in many instances the payment of the wholesale tradesmen's accounts is postponed in order to enable the shopkeeper to meet his railway calls. This, in fact, is nothing less than speculating with the creditor's capital.—Times.

A detachment of sappers and miners arrived at Hayle last week, and proceeded to the parish of Zennor, where they have been engaged in repairing a battery, and report states that guns of heavy calibre are shortly to be mounted there. We have been informed that other places along the coast are to be visited by this party of sappers and miners, and that Castle Dennis is to be a signal station.—Penzance Gazette.

Mr. Charles Miller, of Great Wakering, Essex, writes to the Essex Herald to the effect that a comet is now visible to the naked eye, in the constellation Cancer, and that the best time for seeing it is from two to four in the morning; at the former hour it will be found due east, about 30 degrees above the horizon, and about 11 degrees to the left of and a little below the bright star Pollux in Gemini.

THE YELLOW FEVER AT STANDGATE CREEK.—No new case has been reported on board any of the hulks to which the crew of the Eclair steam-sloop has been removed. Mr. Coffey, the assistant surgeon, late of the Growler, is slowly gaining strength; and Mr. Rogers, assistant of the Ocean, who was attacked, is also recovering. A fever has broken out on board the Growler, and two sailors, whom it attacked, have died of it.

A painful excitement has for the last few days prevailed in Elstree, near Edgware, from the rumour that Lieut. Col. Edward James Metcalf, of the Horse Artillery, had been killed in a duel by a brother officer, that the body had been removed to his residence in the dead of the night, and that it was the intention of his friends to conceal the affair from the public, and bury the corpse without an investigation of the circumstances leading to his death. On investigation before a coroner's jury, satisfactory evidence was given to show that the deceased came by his death accidentally, while endeavouring, as was supposed, to draw out a ramrod with his teeth from a loaded pistol, which exploded and discharged its contents into his head.

A distressing accident occurred at Sunderland on Wednesday, by which four lives were lost. The pupils, 38 in number, of Dr. Cowan, of the Grange Academy, having proceeded to the sea side for the purpose of bathing, two of them while in the water were swept away by a heavy ground swell. Their situation being observed by a youth named Baird and a tutor, Mr. Special, these attempted to go to their rescue, but unhappily, from the same cause, were also swept away, and the whole four perished. Two of the youths were sons of Sir David Baird, who lives near Dundee.

The Galway Mercury states "that the improvements at Lough Corrib have been greatly advanced, and that next summer they shall have the entire work finished, and the waters of that splendid lake made available for the purposes of commerce. It is an inland sea, which now runs almost waste, but must shortly become useful and profitable to the community."

The Repeal Association met, as usual, on Monday last at the Conciliation Hall, Dublin. The attendance was meagre. The proceedings possessed no general interest. The rent for the week was announced to be 21s. 11d.

The take of herrings all along the west coast of Ireland is so immensely abundant, that the people cannot procure salt in sufficient quantity to save them. Even the frequented bathing-places are full of them. So that amongst the many sources of food which Providence has so bountifully supplied this season, the people will be provided with a large stock of this delicious fish.

POVERTY.—What is poverty?—Not destitution, but poverty? It has many shapes—aspects almost as various as the minds and circumstances of those whom it visits. To the savage in the wilds it is famine; to the labourer in the cottage it is hardship and privation; to the proud it is disgrace; and to the miser it is despair. It is a spectre—haunting the man who lives at ease with dread of change. Such are its varied aspects; but what is it in reality? It is really a deficiency of the comforts of life—a deficiency present and to come. It involves many other things, but this is what it is. Is it then worth all the apprehension and grief it occasions? Is it an adequate cause for the gloom of the merchant, the discontent of the artisan, the foreboding sighs of the mother, the ghastly dreams that haunt the avaricious, the humiliation of the proud? These are severe sufferings; are they authorised by the nature of poverty? Certainly not, if poverty induced no adventitious evils, involved nothing but a deficiency of the comforts of life, leaving life itself unimpaired. "The life is more than food, and the body more than raiment;" and the untimely extinction of life itself would not be worth the pangs which apprehended poverty excites.—American paper.

MARKETS.

CORN MARKET.

MONDAY, OCT. 13.—We have been shortly supplied with English Wheat since last Monday, and to-day the arrivals from Essex and Kent, though rather better than last week, are not more than equal to the demand. The wet weather that prevailed all over the country in the middle of last week has caused higher prices to be asked for all grain. Wheat is 2s. cheaper than Monday for all sorts. Barley comes forward very sparingly, and is again 1s. dearer. The arrival of Oats, both British and Foreign, are very short, and with the prospect of the duty declining 2s. if not more. Bonded Oats are in good demand at 2s. over the prices of Monday last. Free Corn is also 1s. to 2s. dearer; this rather checks sales, but on the whole a considerable amount of business has been transacted. Peas come forward more freely, and are 2s. cheaper. Old Beans maintain very high prices. S. H. LUGG.

NOTICE TO THE PUBLIC.

LEAGUE FUND.

All Subscribers of £1 and upwards to the LEAGUE FUND will be entitled to, and receive, a copy weekly of this publication for twelve months from the date of the receipt of their subscription.

Subscribers of half-a-crown, and under £1, will have forwarded to them a copy of THE LEAGUE, containing an acknowledgment of their subscription; and it is requested that all subscribers will be kind enough to send their names and addresses to the offices of THE LEAGUE, Newall's-buildings, Manchester, or 67, Fleet-street, London.

N.B. As there is considerable risk in the transmission of gold and silver by post, parties wishing to forward small contributions to THE LEAGUE FUND are particularly requested to make their remittances by post-office orders.

The Council of the League would also suggest to their friends in the country the importance of transmitting their copies of THE LEAGUE newspaper, after perusal, to such parties (more especially farmers) as may be either hostile or indifferent to the question of Free Trade.

By order of the Council,

JOSEPH HICKIN, Secretary.

We beg to inform our subscribers that bound volumes of the LEAGUE newspaper, containing the whole of the first year's Numbers, may be had on application at the offices, either in London or Manchester.

OBSERVE!

Samples of good Wheat were sold in Mark Lane on Friday at 74s. per quarter.

The duty on Foreign Wheat is 17s. per qr.

The national expenditure for bread is NOW at the rate of 20 millions a-year, or FOUR HUNDRED THOUSAND pounds weekly MORE than during the whole of last winter and spring.

QUALIFY! QUALIFY! QUALIFY!

Now that the proceedings of the Revising Barristers' Courts are everywhere drawing to a close, we entreat all Free Traders in the counties, who are not in possession of the vote, to look out at once for qualifications. Those who have already placed their names upon the county lists, must canvass their neighbours to do likewise. There is now no doubt or difficulty about the possibility or the right of securing a county vote, either by single property or joint ownership. Everywhere the revising barristers have decided that the bonâ fide purchase of a freehold property, yielding a clear annual income of 40s., entitles the owner to a county vote. Some of the barristers have even declared their opinion that it is a commendable act to purchase property with the view of possessing the franchise. Not only is it praiseworthy to do so: but, in our opinion, it is disgraceful to every man above the rank of an unskilled labourer who does not aim at possessing a 40s. freehold. From what has been already done on a small scale in a few counties, we are satisfied that, by this simple and all but universally accessible avenue to power, the people of this country can secure for themselves the right to make good laws, and thus put down peacefully and constitutionally the undue ascendancy of a particular class. To be entitled to be upon the register next year, the freehold must be possessed before the 31st of January. The sooner the property is looked after, the better will be the chance of reaping a good bargain. We shall not enter into detailed instructions for the purchase of freeholds, but simply recommend our friends to intrust the business to lawyers who are known to be friends to Free Trade.

THE FIXED-DUTY GHOST AGAIN.

The times have been, that "when the brains were out, the man would die, and there an end"—especially after the funeral;—and the death and burial of "fixed-duty," in the course of the summer of 1841, had been, as we imagined, sufficiently authenticated to relieve mankind of all serious apprehension of the creature's re-appearance. Until within these few days past, we had not the least idea—not being in direct communication with the nether world—that the wan and melancholy ghost still walked the earth, and that our services in the capacity of exorcists might again be in requisition to lay this restless spirit. We have no wish, even now, to act the part of alarmists; very likely the thing is all a hoax; still, we feel it our duty, for the sake of such persons as may be troubled with weak nerves, to tell the friends of the deceased (if the deceased have any friends), that the ghost (if it be a ghost, and not a white sheet), would do wisely to retreat to his quarters without more words. It is a real world that we are living in, in this year 1845—a world decidedly intolerant of shadows and shams!

We were, last Monday evening, considerably surprised, and very greatly amused—we might have been indignant, but that our sense of the ridiculous preserved our good humour—at reading, in the Globe, an announcement to the effect, that "the time has arrived for substituting a small fixed duty for the fallacious sliding-scale," and, moreover, that this extraordinary politico-economical creed "is now believed on every hand." It is no particular business of ours to inquire what party, or what clique or section of a party, the Globe assumes to represent, or how far the assumption is authorised; but we must take leave to express our amazement that any waking man should pen such a piece of nonsense. We certainly must allow the extreme appropriateness of calling in a fiction to speak for a phantom. The imaginary everybody is the fittest of all witnesses to certify the vitality of the deceased "fixed duty." Who is the everybody, we should like to know, that "believes the time has arrived" for a fixed duty? Can the Globe produce anybody who holds this enrious and eccentric belief? Where are the evidences that everybody—or that anybody, out of the Globe's columns—wants a fixed duty, or expects a fixed duty, or contemplates a fixed duty as a thing lying within the compass of ordinary moral and political probability? Who petitions for a fixed duty? Who votes for a fixed duty? Who agitates for a fixed duty? How many pounds sterling, or pence sterling, have been subscribed to propagate the belief in and desire for a fixed duty? What meetings have been held to discuss the merits of a fixed duty? Or, is it, after all, only a fashionable "everybody" that believes in fixed duty—the correlative of the unfashionable and vulgar "nobody," that, in this month of October, is the solitary occupant of an empty metropolis? Never, surely, was there a more laughable illustration of the self-exaggeration incident to the spirit of political cliquism than the Globe's "everybody." The half-dozen or so of people—if there really be so many as half-a-dozen—who "believe that the time has arrived" for a compromise whose time expired rather more than four years ago, are "everybody" to a journalist who knows just so much of the empire as he sees in the club-houses of the West End.

Were there reason for supposing that the Globe, in this matter, speaks the deliberate sentiment and purpose of any considerable political party—that this ridiculous anachronism of a "small fixed duty" for the session of 1846, is actually intended to be gravely proposed for national adoption—we should have much to say on which it were now a mere work of supererogation to insist. We should ask, What is the small fixed duty for? For protection? But "protection is the bane of agriculture," according to an authority which we believe the Globe respects. For revenue? But "corn is one of the worst articles you can tax," says the same authority. For the countervailing of "peculiar burdens?" But, again says the same authority, "it is quite impossible that any such question should be entertained, while we maintain exclusive favours and exclusive protection." For "breaking the transition" to the farmer? The farmer wants, once for all, to have done with transitions. The farmer wants permanence, stability, something to rest on; and "it is now believed on every hand" that a fixed duty will have no fixity about it. The fixed duty would infallibly get unfixed the very first bad harvest. Such a year as 1816, 1817, or 1818—such a year as 1826, such a year as 1839, 1840, or 1841—a second such year as 1845, would be the death of any fixed duty that any Parliament would deem worth the trouble of legislating for.

It is needless, however, to discuss the scheme of the fixed duty—the fixed injustice, and fixed absurdity—that, after all, is not to be fixed, but contingent and terminable. The phantom is but a phantom. Nobody wants the fixed duty—nobody expects it—nobody asks for it—and nobody will propose it except to be laughed at. Sir Robert Peel, with all his reputed fondness for the contents of his predecessor's wardrobe, is known to have a special aversion for this particular garment. He is much more likely to send for the Free Trade velvetens which he discarded some two or three years back, and "apply them," according to the donor's intent and his own first thoughts, "to his own use"—figuring them, perhaps, with the decoration, so akin to his peculiar taste in dress, of a "vanishing scale." His predecessors, we must hope, have by this time outgrown the fixed duty article, and would deem it unfit for their present wear. If not, they may rest assured that the country has outgrown them.

We have only to add, that if there be any political party, or section of a party, in this country, who imagine that the Free Traders will assist them in turning the present Ministerial difficulties and perplexities to a mere party use, and improving the odium that attaches to the "fallacious sliding-scale" into the occasion of a mere party triumph, they are very greatly mistaken. Our war is not with the sliding-scale, in particular, but with monopoly; and fixed duty is monopoly, as much as sliding-scale. We are perfectly ready to accept and acknowledge the volunteered services of journalists who denounce the iniquity, and expose the mischiefs, of the sliding-scale; but we cannot recognise any regular alliance with those who—while adopting the Free Trade arguments as their own, and talking in the Free Trade tone—only seek to substitute one form of monopoly for another. The League is of no party, and is too strong, and too much in earnest, to allow itself to be used by any party. The men who head and lead the League make no pretension to the character of professional politicians; and their seven years' struggle for the popular dissemination of just and sound principles has done nothing to cure their original distaste for an active share in the game of party politics. With their strong, deep, and matured conviction of the paramount importance of the Free Trade principle, both as a social right and as a national policy, they are totally unprepared to listen to any compromise at variance with it. The personal preferences, or the general political sympathies which may attach them individually to one class of public men rather than to another; even the strong sense which they may entertain of past services, rendered to the Free Trade cause in its earlier stages—cannot operate to divert them from the path which they have chosen, deliberately and on conviction. Until the Free Trade principle shall be realised on the statute book of the empire, and the League expire in its own success, Free Traders can take no note of political distinctions which they deem of secondary and subordinate moment. Of all the present generation of British statesmen—whether occupants of office, or aspirants for office—he who shall first heartily and unreservedly espouse the Free Trade principle, in its simplicity and entirety, is the man who will wield the whole amount of that moral and political force which the League have spent seven laborious years in accumulating.

MINISTERIAL RESPONSIBILITY.

The sliding-scale proposed and made law by Sir Robert Peel in 1842 is only now brought into active operation. The bounty of Providence in three successive harvests suspended the complex and artificial system which had been devised for supplying food to the people, and nature delayed the action of legislation. But the unfavourable season through which we are passing, the diminished yield of corn, the ascertained failure of a large proportion of the potato-crop, the proclamations announcing scarcity issued by the governments of Holland, Belgium, Russia, and Turkey, and the precautions taken by the kingdom of Hanover, and other states in Northern Germany, announce that the sliding-scale is coming into stringent operation, and that the policy of its provisions will be tested by rigid experiment. For the results of this trial, they must be responsible who have taken the supply of food from the natural and ordinary course of trade to subject it to legislative fetters and restrictions. The ministers who proposed and the majorities which sanctioned the scheme took away their proper functions from the traffickers in corn, and incurred the responsibility of supplying food through the agency of their own devices. Should these devices fail,—should a period of scarcity, with all its terrible consequences, ensue—the ministers and their supporters will be accountable for the result to their country and their God.

We doubt not that this responsibility is keenly felt by the Premier; he has never shown any want of sensitiveness to the accountability which his office involves. Perhaps, in one instance, at least, he may have exhibited the feeling too acutely. There can be no doubt that during the late fluctuations of the weather he must have suffered the most terrible anxieties; that ever since July his hopes have been raised by gleams of sunshine, and damped again by showers of rain. Every fluctuation in the barometer has been accompanied by doubt and fear; his fame as a Minister, and his feelings as a man, must have appeared to him dependent on the uncertainties of the most uncertain of climates; and he must have looked forward to the severe and perilous trial which his system of Corn Laws is about to undergo with feelings of uncertainty as to the result the most torturing to the mind of a statesman. His sense of responsibility and his feelings of anxiety must have been aggravated by the consciousness that he had expressly condemned his own system on the ground of principle, and defended its continuance merely on the expediency of circumstances. He was warned that those circumstances were varying and uncertain in their nature; that the most important of them—the ability of the home-growers of corn to meet the demands of the population—was a mere gratuitous assumption contradicted by the experience of the past, and by every calculation of probability for the future. But, like the sailor in a vessel which sails gallantly in fair weather, but is unfitted to bear the brunt of the storm, he enjoyed his voyage with a quiet and contented crew, refusing to believe any warnings that tempests are to be expected. The clouds are gathering round the horizon; half of the States of the Continent have joined in a general declaration of European scarcity; prices are rapidly rising in England; the labourer already pays twopence more for his loaf than he did six weeks ago; petty grocers and hucksters already begin to complain of declining custom; the cry of distress is heard from Ireland rising above the clamours of party, loud though they be in that distracted country. Confident as he may be in his pilotage, Sir Robert Peel cannot mistake the signs of danger; no one knows better than he does that the vessel of protection is not sea-worthy, and that in no more fragile bark could a statesman have trusted his fame and fortune. Even were we disposed to give him credit for no higher motives, we should believe that Sir Robert Peel has been induced to contemplate a repeal of the Corn Laws by the mental torture he has endured, and the perilous trial he foresees. The time is at hand when he must take upon himself the responsibility of his system, and he must be something more than man if he does not shrink from the issue.

There are few now who do not proclaim that the Corn Laws are a manifest failure; the maintenance of a duty of 18s. per quarter on wheat, at a moment of increasing alarm, which, even if exaggerated, rests on a certainty of deficiency large enough to justify some share of apprehension, is an evil too monstrous to be endured. He would be a bolder minister than we take Sir Robert Peel to be, who would face Parliament in the midst of a famine which he could have averted. There is a very general opinion now that the ports will be thrown open in Britain as they have been in Belgium, Holland, Russia, and Turkey. This opinion, however, is founded more on the desirableness of adopting such a measure of precaution than on any knowledge of such a step being contemplated. Still this opinion is evidence of the direction which the public feeling has taken; it shows that the nation has fixed the responsibility of the Corn Laws on the minister by calling for an act of direct ministerial interference to save us from their perilous and too probable results.

Scarcity brings other evils in its train likely to startle a statesman who has staked his fame on the success of his financial measures; the capital absorbed by the high price of food cripples industry, prevents speculation, and restricts employment. A monetary crisis may aggravate the evils of scarcity and increase the danger of social derangement. Already it is found that share-lists are affected by the reports of the potato-crop; Capel Court has become sensitive to the changes of temperature in Connaught. This is a point on which we have no wish to dilate, but it is one of increasing gravity and importance.

Winter is approaching; the time for efficacious action is limited; those who have taken the responsibility of regulating the supply of food cannot shrink from their stewardship. We wish them a good deliverance in the trial they have sought. No remembrance of warnings bestowed in vain induces us to withdraw our sympathies from those who have undertaken a task disproportioned to human powers. There must be no recriminations among the crew when the first duty is to save the ship. We believe that Sir Robert Peel is alive to the danger, and cognisant of the means of safety; if his courage rises proportioned to the exigence of the circumstances around him, the course is still clear before him; but if he waits to be swept onward by the rising tide of misery, he must answer for his neglect of the helm while the vessel could be kept subject to its guidance.

In the present we must read the future; no measure of mere temporary expediency can, or ought, to satisfy the country; we must not so legislate as to secure periodical returns of alarm; we want to be restored to sound health, not to be exposed to intermittent fever; we have had too much of uncertainty and insecurity. Let us then not temporize with a system which has so often brought us into perils; let us at once and for ever remove the cause of jeopardy; there must be no compromise with injustice, no dalliance with the fragments of impolicy. The change to be effectual must be final, and to be final must be complete. Nothing short of this can either satisfy or save the nation; and those who dream of mediating between the righteous claims of the many and the sordid demands of the few must be taught that higglers in scarcity and huxterers in distress have no right to expect a hearing; that their mock-auction of terms will find no bidders, and that nothing but a full and perfect measure of justice will either meet the present crisis or prevent its future recurrence. The repeal of the Corn Laws must be total, unconditional, and immediate.

A FEW FACTS FOR THE STANDARD'S LEISURE.

That the Standard should make much of the monopolist success at Wigan, last week, is what we can quite well understand. Monopoly is just now in the humour to be thankful for small mercies. The replacing of one Ministerial borough member by another, in the last week of a registration which gives South Lancashire, Middlesex, and the West Riding of Yorkshire to the Free Traders—at a time, too, when it begins to look somewhat doubtful whether ministerial members will ever again be asked for a monopolist vote—is a triumph of so very moderate and qualified a description, that it seems positively cruel to say a word to mar the delight of our happy and easily-pleased contemporary.

Nevertheless, it is always kindness, in the long run, to let the whole truth be known just as it is; and we feel that the common debt of benevolence which man owes to man, requires us to take the trouble of disabusing our contemporary of his pleasant hallucination, and endeavouring to reduce his estimate of things to the sober proportions of reality. We must, then, inform him, that this Wigan election, of which he had so much to say on Saturday last, does not quite bear out his sanguine inference as to the declining popularity of the League, and the League's principles. It no more proves the League to be dying in this present year 1845, than his frequently renewed certificates of the League's death and burial prove that the object of his terror departed this life one, two, three, four, or five years ago. The borough of Wigan just maintains its status quo in the House of Commons, as it has maintained (vide Mr. George Wilson's speech at Manchester, on the 25th of last October) its status quo in the registration courts. The League have lost nothing in Wigan—they have only to regret that they have gained nothing. The fact is, good Standard, the people of Wigan have not, in their decision of last week, pronounced any opinion, one way or the other, on the merits of Free Trade and the League. Nothing could be further from their thoughts. The Wigan election, like the Sunderland election, did not turn on Free Trade and the League. The Wigan electors have long been in the habit of deciding on the claims of rival candidates on a principle with which Free Trade and the League have nothing to do—namely, the “local interests” principle. The Wigan reading of “local interests” is not quite identical with the Sunderland reading, but the principle is essentially the same. Sunderland votes for docks and railways—Wigan for the humbler and more transient, but perhaps more tangible local advantage of a Irish market, held at septennial intervals, for threadbare coats, cracked crockery, boots that let in water, and canary-birds that won't sing—a description of valuables which, if report speaks truly, have on various occasions realised for their fortunate possessors the most extraordinary prices. Of the five or six hundred electors who compose the Wigan constituency, from fifty to a hundred—a number sufficient to turn the scale of a contest under ordinary circumstances—are thoroughly indoctrinated with the principle that a man's vote is worth exactly what it will fetch in the market between three and four o'clock on polling-day.

As the Standard has deemed it expedient, apropos of Wigan, to raise the question of the growing or declining popularity of the League and the principles of which the League is the exponent, we may take the opportunity of furnishing our contemporary with a few facts, which may materially help him in arriving at a correct conclusion. Freely admitting that monopoly is, as a general rule, strong where electoral honesty is weak, and electoral independence unknown—that in little borough constituencies where the agencies of bribery and corruption can be conveniently brought to bear—in county constituencies that recognise the proprietary rights of dukes, earls, and marquises, and whose decision may be anticipated by the Stanley rule of political arithmetic—“calculating the number of the great landed proprietors, and weighing the number of occupiers under them,”—and in constituencies which are, as the phrase goes, “under influence,” monopoly is, very generally, in the ascendant;—we beg to remind the Standard, that the large popular constituencies, where the electors really elect, are with us, almost without an exception. It is sufficient to mention the names of Edinburgh, Glasgow, Manchester, Sheffield, Wolverhampton, and Stockport, to show on which side the balance of “popularity” inclines. Birmingham and Leeds are accidentally and temporarily divided on our question, and for the present, answer ambiguously; the next election may possibly elicit a more distinct response. Then we have all the Scottish boroughs, Falkirk and Haddington excepted—exceptions which, we rather expect, will not survive the duration of the present Parliament. A most significant fact is this;—the moral, intelligent, and independent town constituencies of Scotland—untainted by the hereditary corruptions of the old electoral system, and ignorant of what is meant by “influence”—are all but unanimous in the cause of commercial and industrial freedom. It is needless, however, to pursue the enumeration in further detail. There is one short answer to the “popularity” question—THE CITY OF LONDON. Can the Standard inform us how many Wigans it would take, by the political multiplication table, to make one London?

We need hardly go on to remind our readers that such of the large towns as are, wholly or in part, against us, are places which have long been notorious for the venality and debauchery of large portions of their constituencies—as witness Liverpool, Hull, Bristol, Cambridge, Norwich, and Ipswich. Wherever popular opinion is free, and the suffrage exercised honestly and independently, the Free Trade cause is triumphant—triumphant in a tolerably exact proportion to the amount of the freedom, honesty, and independence. All which the monopolists are perfectly well aware of; and accordingly, they take excellent care to avoid the occasions of contests where their defeat is foreknown. It is a curious result and evidence of the present state of opinion in the large and independent popular constituencies, that the monopolist members, by whom a few of them happen just now to be represented, are virtually disabled from taking office under the crown. It is only the members for corrupt or close pocket boroughs, or for equally close pocket counties, that dare accept any Government office which would necessitate an appeal to their constituents for re-election. To be Member for the City of London, or the West Riding of Yorkshire, is a high honour, undoubtedly: but to a monopolist, a painfully embarrassing one. For a gentleman occupying that proud but awkward position, the acceptance of a place in the Cabinet would involve the forfeiture of a place in the Legislature; the superstructure of his political ambition could only be raised at the expense of the foundation. Of course the experiment is never tried. The good things which a monopolist ministry has from time to time to give away among its friends, are for the present monopolised by that humbler but more fortunate class of its Parliamentary adherents whose dependent or venal constituencies may be safely relied upon to give a satisfactory answer to the application for renewed confidence.

As the Standard takes so much interest in this inquiry, may we beg our contemporary to favour us at his earliest leisure with his opinion on the question—Whether is it possible for any monopolist member of the House of Commons, representing South Lancashire, or the West Riding of Yorkshire, or Middlesex, or any one of the metropolitan boroughs, to accept a Government appointment of a nature requiring his re-election by his constituents?

LORD ASHLEY ON “DESTINY.”

We have seldom read any document emanating from a public man, which evinces a more complete and cowardly disregard of public duty—a more thorough lack of the manly and honourable sense of public responsibility—than Lord Ashley's recent letter “to the gentry, clergy, and freeholders of the county of Dorset.” After alluding to a rumoured dissatisfaction, on the part of a “numerous and respectable” section of his constituents, with his political conduct, and informing them that “it is not likely that he shall have the pleasure this year of attending any of their agricultural anniversaries,” his lordship proceeds in the following strain:—

“I will seize this occasion to touch the subject of the Corn Laws, and the certain result of the present movement against them. IT APPEARS TO ME THAT THEIR DESTINY IS FIXED; and that the leading men of the great parties in the legislature are by no means disinclined to their eventual abolition. The debates of last session have left no doubt on this head—both the candidates for power, and the occupants of it, approximated so much more closely than at any former period, that most of the hearers were induced to believe that their difference was less a matter of principle than a question of time.

“If this be so, IT IS NEEDLESS TO ARGUE THE POLICY OR IMPOLICY OF SUCH A CHANGE; it would rather be wise to consider in what way you can break the force of an inevitable blow. The sudden repeal of these laws would be destructive; the gradual abolition of them would be less injurious. You have, at this moment, the power to offer such terms; there is no certainty that you will retain it much longer—our actual prosperity must come to an end; and then the wide and fearful pressure of commercial distress, with the hostility on the one side, and the indifference on the other, of the great political chiefs, will leave you, in an hour of especial difficulty, altogether without a refuge or resource.”

Rather hard on the Dorsetshire “gentry, clergy, and freeholders,” who made Lord Ashley a legislator that he might uphold their “protection” by his votes and speeches, to be told in this cool, off-hand way, that the question is already disposed of by “destiny”—that the Dii Majores of the Legislature, the “leading men of the great parties,” have so ruled it among themselves—and that it doesn't signify talking about “the policy or impolicy of such a change.” There can be no doubt in the world that the “destiny” of protection is “fixed”—though not altogether by the “leading men of the great parties;” but it is not exactly in this way that a representative of the people—especially a man of Lord Ashley's pretensions to political sanctity—should make his constituents acquainted with the fact. Of all the virtues, or substitutes for virtue, that the world ever saw, this of submission to “destiny” is the most equivocal—convenient cloak, as it is, for any cowardice or treachery that a man may deem convenient. Is protection a right or a wrong thing, a good or a bad thing?—is the question for an honest politician to ask, and to answer, as he best may, for his own and the public guidance. If protection be, in Lord Ashley's judgment, just and beneficent, it is his duty to struggle to the last against the adverse destiny that menaces with ruin the rights and interests which have been confided to his guardianship. If protection be unjust and baneful, and the “destiny” but a short way of expressing the necessity which exists for its abrogation, it is Lord Ashley's duty to show its iniquitous and pernicious character, and endeavour to enlist the judgment and conscience of his constituents on the side of truth and right. To run away from the question in this manner is a piece of shabbiness and poltroonery, which no man could be guilty of who respected himself, his constituents, or his duty. Had Lord Ashley told the men of Dorsetshire, in 1841, that according to his notion of the fitness of things, Members of Parliament are mere puppets in the hands of “the leading men of the great parties”—made to move just as the said leading men may be pleased to pull the wires—with no other or higher duty than that of blindly executing, or mutely enduring, the “destiny” of which “great political chiefs” are the sovereign arbiters—we are very sure that the men of Dorsetshire would not have waited till now to look out, as it seems they are doing, for

Lord Ashley's real opinion on the merits of the Corn Law—if he have one—he leaves in the convenient ambiguity which befits a politician who talks about “destiny” when he ought to be thinking of duty, and makes over the fee simple of his conscience and understanding to “the leading men of the great parties in the Legislature.” He speaks of “sudden repeal” as “destructive,” and of “gradual abolition” as only “less injurious:” yet he goes on to say that, as matters stand, “our actual prosperity must come to an end,” and be followed by a “wide and fearful pressure of commercial distress”—of which commercial distress the repeal of the Corn Law is, by implication, indicated as the appropriate remedy. We are not disposed to give ourselves the trouble of finding a meaning which it was probably his lordship's purpose to hide; but we cannot forbear noting the characteristically cold-blooded and heartless tone in which this philanthropic statesman speaks of “commercial distress.” Not a syllable of remonstrance with the gentry, clergy, and freeholders of the county of Dorset, on the cruelty of maintaining a law, of which, in the event of its prolonged continuance, a “wide and fearful pressure of commercial distress” will necessitate the repeal. Not a whispered hint on the Christian and moral duty of preventing the commercial distress by repealing the cruel law beforehand. Not a breath even of anticipatory sympathy with the victims of the coming distress. The good man thinks of “commercial distress”—“wide and fearful” commercial distress—not as a national calamity to be deprecated for its own sake, and if possible prevented by timely legislation, but as an awkward and disagreeable contingency for the agricultural interest, which will seriously embarrass landlords in their negotiations with the Government, and “leave them, in an hour of especial difficulty, altogether without a refuge or resource.”

From this senatorial epistle, farmers may see what they have to expect at the hands of the men in whom they have put their trust. Truly they are living in a “house of cards,” as Sir James Graham calls it. The moment the minister gives the word, down it all comes together. One little sentence in a Queen's speech, and we shall have “farmers' friends” by the dozen discovering impromptu that Free Trade is “destiny,” and that it were an idle waste of words “to argue the policy or impolicy of such a change.” A cool and civil sneer at “agricultural anniversaries” may perhaps serve to season the announcement that the agricultural interest is made for the Peel ministry, and not the Peel ministry for the agricultural interest, and that farmers and farmers' friends have nothing to do with Peel law but to obey it.

If the farmers of England are wise, they will cast off, at once and for ever, all confidence in the legislative promises of men who shuffle off their responsibilities on Peel and destiny; they will demand a SETTLEMENT of the question, such as shall for ever take them and their interests out of the keeping of slippery politicians—and will resolve to be henceforth masters of their own “destiny” as a section of the one great industrial interest of British producers.

CONVERSION AND PERVERSION.

Among the many indications of an approaching change in the system of our commercial policy, not the least significant is the ingenuity displayed by ministerial writers in devising arguments to excuse a departure from the policy which they have hitherto advocated, and to prepare the way for vindicating whatever course they may hereafter deem it expedient to adopt. As a general rule of policy it is wise to receive the aid of new converts without too narrowly scrutinising the motives by which they have been led to adopt the true faith; but when these converts appear to be halting between two opinions, and endeavouring to assume an attitude which may enable them to propose terms of compromise, the reasons which they assign must not pass unquestioned, for from them we may form some opinion of the sort of aid likely to be derived from such new associates. In the Standard of Tuesday night we find the following paragraph: it is a specimen of that style of reasoning which may mean anything or nothing, which may be hereafter quoted to justify the writer for persevering in his present course, or for veering round to any conceivable point of the compass.

"That the repeal of the Corn Laws is only a question of time may be most simply demonstrated by the solution of a very plain question in arithmetic. If the supply of corn increases more rapidly than the population, as has been the case for many years (thanks to the Corn Laws, which have so nearly done their work), it is obvious that a time must arise when supply and demand shall be balanced, and when the price of corn must commence a rapid course of decline, unless in the interim provision be made greatly to augment the pecuniary resources of consumers. But these pecuniary resources cannot be augmented to the extent necessary save by the extension of commerce—a preparative more necessary to the interests of agriculturists than of any other class. The Anti-Corn-Law League say that the time for that preparative has already arrived. We assert, on the other hand, that the difference of average prices in this country, and in the corn-growing countries of the Continent, proves that time to be somewhat distant; but come it must, sooner or later, and they are the worst enemies of agriculturists who would conceal from them the truth."

It is assumed that the home supply of corn has increased more rapidly than the population: we should be glad to see the estimates on which this conclusion is founded; but even supposing that this were the fact, the real question is, whether the supply of home-grown corn is adequate to the wants of our population, and if not, whether there is any prospect of such an increase as would render us independent of foreign supplies? Assuredly there cannot be a sufficient supply of corn in a country where "seven millions are rejoicing in potatoes," and where more than a million and a half of persons are dependent on public charity. Any increase in the growth of wheat has been accompanied by a decrease in the growth of the inferior grains, and the substitution of potatoes for oats, barley, and rye. The extension of manufacturing industry has certainly increased the demand for bread, and the farmers in the agricultural districts which supply the manufacturing towns have exerted themselves to meet this demand by extending the cultivation of wheat; but the wheat sent to the manufacturing districts has been obtained by grinding down the agricultural labourers; and if the food of operatives has been improved, that of farm-labourers has been deteriorated. The proportion between the home supply of food and the wants of the population may be tried by another test—the amount of foreign imports. Now the quantity of foreign wheat retained for home consumption between 1831 and 1835, both years inclusive, was 1,656,189 quarters; and between 1836 and 1840, both years inclusive, it was 6,482,230 quarters; and in the four years ending last January the amount was 6,660,959 quarters.

But whatever increase there has been in the production of wheat, it has clearly arisen not from the Corn Laws but in spite of them. The increase by universal consent is owing to the demand produced by the manufacturing population, but the prosperous career of that population has been most seriously impeded by the restrictions which these laws have placed on commercial enterprise. Now the increase of imports in the periods we have just contemplated shows that English produce has been unable to meet this demand, in spite of the disadvantages to which the manufacturers are subjected. But says the Standard—"The Corn Laws have done their work;" and so they have in one sense; they have not wrought any of the good that was hoped, and they have produced infinitely greater evil than was anticipated.

Looking at the steady increase of imports when we take an average of quinquennial or decennial periods, we cannot anticipate a period when the corn of home-growth will be more than sufficient for the wants of the British people; but we, on the contrary, think that this very season conveys strong indications of a contrary result. Low prices have been the great stimulus to agricultural improvement, by forcing farmers to look for their profits to increased production. Unfortunately we have no authoritative agricultural statistics to which we can refer as evidence, but one fact is within the cognisance of everybody, that the leaders and guides of agricultural societies did not begin to lecture the farmers on the necessity of improvement until the progress of the League had shaken their confidence in the continuance of protection.

We believe that the English farmers, if they had fair play, could easily compete with any in the world in the growth of the superior corn; but to do so they must have command over a cheap supply of the inferior corn. They must be able to feed their cattle with maize, beans, &c., in order to have means of so fertilising the soil as to render it able to support a large growth of wheat. They are now, like the cotton manufacturers two years ago, paying a tax on the raw material, and receiving in return a protecting duty which fails them at the moment that its assistance is most wanted.

The Standard hints that the prices of corn in England are sinking gradually to the Continental level, and when that point is attained, the writer is prepared to consent to the abolition of the Corn Laws. To reach that point, however, England must lose her superiority in manufacturing production, and then the Corn Laws will have done their work with a vengeance. So long as the English farmers have large consuming markets in the manufacturing districts close to their own door, so long and no longer will they be able to command higher prices than their Continental rivals; but if, by perseverance in unjust and impolitic restrictions, they diminish the consuming powers of their customers, and stimulate manufacturing rivalry abroad, they will of necessity produce a decline of their own prices, to an extent which will be directly proportioned to the length of their perseverance in demonstrated absurdity.

THE FREE TRADE BAZAAR.

(From the Manchester Times of Saturday.)

The Free Trade Hall, converted into a Tudor Hall, is at this moment a scene of great attraction. And well it deserves to be; for of all the rare displays we have seen in Manchester at fancy fairs, this surpasses all. We were curious to see what would be the result of Mr. Grieve's skill, and the effect he has produced is beyond our anticipations. The appearance of the place is nothing like what we have been accustomed to in spectacles of this kind—mere temporary fittings of white and pink drapery, designed to convey a notion of eastern magnificence, but disclosing too visibly the presence of more glitter and tinsel: it is a place more accordant with our own English feelings of substance and reality. In fact, the artist has taken the building as it stands to engraft his design upon it, and decorating it so as to resemble the interior of one of our own ancient halls has produced an effect at once calculated to excite surprise and admiration. He has gone back to the middle ages for a design; but in the execution of the details he has brought to bear the perfection and refinement of modern skill, blending the whole with singular judgment. There is nothing gorgeous or grand about it; but the different parts are all in harmony, and everything about it is at once chaste and classic. The place is not one which would excite gaping wonderment at a glance; but it rivets attention and invites examination. It would be idle to attempt a description which would convey a notion to the reader, and we prefer inviting him to a personal inspection—especially as, while gratifying his curiosity, he may be led to aid an undertaking for the accomplishment of a great national benefit.

The stalls are arranged with great judgment, so as to allow the utmost facility of approach, and at the same time plenty of space for promenade. They extend lengthwise up the hall, one range at either side being under the galleries, and then two double ranges down the centre. Between these, in the very centre of the floor, is the elegant bronzed fountain, used at Covent Garden, and contributed by Messrs. Barge and Co., Colebrookdale: it stands in a kind of charmed circle, formed by a double or treble row of choice and rare plants in pots, and throws around it a delightful and refreshing sense of coolness upon the scene. Then at the foot of the room, projecting from the platform, in the form of a half circle, is a stall loaded with confectionary and other refreshments. The platform itself is converted into a picture gallery, stored with a vast collection of paintings, drawings and engravings, many of them works of considerable merit.

Returning to the entrance, which is from Peter-street, to notice the stalls more particularly, we come to those under the gallery. The first is a stall displaying a large collection of ironmongery, contributed by Mr. J. Hayward, and also a considerable quantity of cutlery. The next stall, which stretches for a considerable length up the wall, is a sort of museum, stored with all kinds of curiosities: including stuffed birds, insects, shells, and models of iron bridges, breakwaters, and other scientific inventions. The third stall exhibits a goodly show of geological specimens; and the fourth, which is the top, is a stall for the sale of books, at which Mr. Gadsby and Mr. W. Shuttleworth preside, and exert themselves with wonderful assiduity and patience to disseminate knowledge. The stalls under the other side gallery, that next Wadmill-street—are stored chiefly with mechanical instruments, or models of different machines, and of ships, and of Indian and other foreign curiosities. Indeed, nearly half of this range of stalls are occupied with models of ships—a whole fleet of the British navy in miniature, with a convoy of merchantmen. This, we presume, is meant to illustrate the present state of things; when Free Trade is predominant there will no longer be a need for "protection" of this kind more than the other. Upon these stalls are also observed a set of dies used in the manufacture of screws, and a set of standard gauges, contributed by Messrs. Whitworth. An old spinning-wheel of the time of our great great grandmothers, contributed by Mr. G. S. Dale, is also an object of much curiosity in these times of spinning-jennies and double deckers. Then there is a box of specimens illustrating the process of the Alpaca manufacture, the model of a twist doubling machine, and a case of cotton, in different compartments, exhibiting the material in its raw state and in the different processes of combing and preparation for manufacture. In other parts of the room—in spare corners here and there—are also many objects of interest which would occupy too much room, or are too cumbersome for stalls: such for instance is a case of circular saws, contributed by Messrs. Spear and Co., Sheffield, and one of very costly wrought files.

The ladies' stalls are, as usual, loaded with articles of interest to ladies, and occasionally to gentlemen also; all kinds of needlework, gimcrackers of every description, executed in the most elaborate and skilful manner no doubt, but such as we cannot pretend to understand the use of, and as would more than puzzle a Philadelphia lawyer to explain. These stalls, however, are all the rage, and are literally besieged with visitors from morning till night. They are 23 in number, and are presided over by the following ladies:—

Stall No. 1.—Mrs. Scott, of Manchester, and Mrs. Harrison, of London.

2. Mrs. Stephens and the Misses Bright, of Rochdale.

3. Mrs. Lucas and Mrs. T. Bright, of Rochdale.

4. Mrs. Houtson.

5. Mrs. G. Wilson, Mrs. S. Lees, and Mrs. and the Misses Torkington.

6. Mrs. and the Misses Rawson.

7. Mrs. Massie, Miss Grant, Miss Cathrall, and Miss Bates.

8. Miss Johnson, of Nottingham.

9. Mrs. R. R. Moore.

10. Mrs. Platt, Stalybridge.

11. Mrs. Gill and Miss Gill.

12. Mrs. Hacking, of Bury.

13. Mrs. McKerrow.

14. Mrs. Higgins and Mrs. Cobden.

15. Mrs. Brotherton and Mrs. Harvey.

16. Miss Woolhav.

17. Mrs. Armstrong.

18. Mrs. W. Bickham and Miss Southwell.

19. Miss Satterthwaite and Mrs. Edward Hall.

20. Mrs. Molineux, Mrs. Swindells, and Miss Ker.

21. Mrs. Kershaw and Miss Scott.

22. Mrs. Ashworth.

23. (For refreshment.) Mrs. Woolley, Mrs. Matley, the two Miss Butterworths (of Rochdale), Miss Woodcock, and Miss Owen.

Now that we have given a list of the presiding deities—comprising all that is fair to look upon and agreeable in manners—can we wonder that the ladies' stalls are the most attractive?

The bazaar was opened on Wednesday; and although the day was unfavourable throughout in consequence of a continuous fall of rain, there was a large company, and the receipts at the doors and stalls realised nearly 350*l.*, an amount which in other bazaars would be thought enormous.

The receipts on Thursday, the weather being more favourable, were 480*l.*, but yesterday (Friday) we had bad weather again, and the receipts fell off slightly; we did not hear the exact amount. To-day, there will be a novel attraction—the presence of a youthful Arabian prince, the son and heir of the Imam of Muscat, who, we believe, arrived in town last night. He comes here, we are told, with a request to the mayor from influential quarters that he shall be treated with the consideration he is entitled to by his birth, and introduced to the principal manufacturers for the purpose of witnessing the processes of the cotton manufacture. He breakfasts this morning at the Queen's Hotel, at 10 o'clock, where Mr. Cobden and other gentlemen are invited to meet him, and he visits the bazaar about 12 o'clock.

In our last we gave the receipts of the first three days at this bazaar. On Saturday it was honoured with several visits of a remarkable character. In the afternoon, upwards of nine hundred workpeople of Messrs. John Bright and Brothers, Rochdale, had a holiday given them by their employers. A special train conveyed them to Manchester, and the firm gave them free admission to the bazaar. They walked in procession, headed by a band of music, through the streets from the railway station to the Free Trade Hall, where they promenade with great delight for some time, observing the greatest order and decorum, and most of them making small purchases, chiefly of useful articles. During the afternoon, a still larger body of the workpeople of Mr. John Whitaker and Sons, of Ilrurst, we believe about twelve hundred in number, entered the bazaar, and remained there for some time, much delighted with what they saw, and many of them making trifling purchases at the stalls.—About a quarter past one o'clock, as previously announced, Prince Hilal, son and heir of the Imam of Muscat, attended by two of his officers, Saad Abdah and Hamid Abdah, and also by Captain Cogan and the interpreter, Assad Kayat, entered the Free Trade Hall, and the prince was loudly cheered. He was received by Mr. George Wilson, the chairman of the League, and Mr. R. R. Moore, who conducted him to the platform that he might see the hall; and these gentlemen subsequently conducted him round the hall, that his highness might inspect the various stalls. Mrs. Cobden, Mrs. George Wilson, and Mrs. Thos. Woolley were introduced to his highness; and at one of the stalls Mr. George Wilson presented to his acceptance a very large and magnificent knife, a sort of chef-d'œuvre of Sheffield manufacture, worth about 25*l.*, which his highness much admired and cordially accepted. The prince and his two officers signed their names in a book at one of the stalls, the prince writing his name in Persian characters (we believe) "Hilal Saad;" the other two names we have already given. The orientals all wore their Eastern costume; the prince, from some religious feelings, wearing a dress without any display of magnificence; his turban was of white cotton. He is apparently about 31 or 32 years of age, his countenance and manners interesting, and his features and conversation, especially his interrogatories, put through the interpreter, displayed considerable intelligence and acuteness. His officers followed him at a respectful distance, and they carried richly ornamented scimitars or swords. His highness remained about an hour in the bazaar, during which time the mayor and the mayors were introduced to him; also Mr. Cobden and Mr. G. R. Porter, of the Board of Trade, who has been for some days on a visit to the town and neighbourhood. During the visit of the prince the bazaar was thronged with curious visitors. The receipts of Saturday were, at the doors, 58*l.* 3*s.*; stalls, 339*l.* 18*s.* 10*d.*; total, 397*l.* 1*s.* 10*d.*. On Monday there was a still larger influx of visitors, 74*l.* 5*s.* being received at the doors, and 269*l.* 18*s.* 4*d.* at the stalls; total, 344*l.* 1*s.* 4*d.*, making the total receipts of the five days 1844. 18s. 6d. Yesterday the receipts at the doors were 84l. 6s. and at the stalls, 382l. 2s.; together making the receipts of the sixth and last day, 460l. 8s.; and the total aggregate receipts of the six days 2401l. 6s. 6d. We understand that there still remain articles unsold worth 1400l. or 1500l., and that it is intended to dispose of them by raffle or otherwise, in about a fortnight.

THE REGISTRATION.

WEST RIDING.—It deserves to be mentioned that the success of the recent registration for the West Riding was greatly contributed to by the talented advocates of the Free-Traders. Their names are, Edward Newman, Esq., Barusley, R. G. Gainsford, Esq., Sheffield, Edward Hulston, Esq., Bradford, solicitor, and James Stansfield, jun., Esq., Inner Temple, special pleader.

SOUTH LEICESTERSHIRE.—The registration revision in the southern division of Leicestershire has proceeded satisfactorily for the cause of Free Trade. It having been discovered that the lists in many instances were only signed by the minority of the overseers, they were objected to by wholesale by Mr. Staines, for the liberals. The revising barrister allowed the validity of the objection, when at "one fell swoop" 16 out of 17 lists, for as many parishes, were declared null and void. At Bosworth and Loughborough we understand that similar triumphs have attended the genship of the liberals.—Notts Review.

LEICESTER.—The following is the result for this borough:
Objections made by Monopolists 240
Liberal and Free-trade voters expunged .. 50

Liberal and Free-trade voters allowed .. 190

Objections by Free-traders 186
Voters expunged by the Free-traders .. 134

Monopolist voters allowed 52
Liberal and Free-trade claims allowed 74
Monopolist claims allowed 33
Majority over Monopolists in objections and claims .. 125

NOTTINGHAM.—The following is the result for this borough:—wards of St. Ann, Byron, and St. Mary:—Free-trade and Free-trade claims sustained, 7; Liberal and Free-trade objections sustained, 6; Monopolist objections sustained, 2. Household and Freeholders—Liberal and Free-trade claims sustained, 15; Monopolist claims sustained, 14. Claims to amend list—Liberal and Free-traders, 11; Monopolists, 2. Liberal and Free-trade objections sustained, 18; Monopolist objections sustained, 10. In Castle, Park, Exchange, and Sherwood wards—Liberal and Free-trade claims allowed, 34; Monopolist objections allowed, 34. Liberal and Free-trade claims allowed, 24; Monopolist claims allowed, 18.

SUNDERBY.—League Triumph.—The advice of Messrs. Cobden, Moore, and Bright, given at the contested election of 1844, at Sunderland, has proved exceedingly useful. The parties to whom those duties were entrusted, have proved themselves worthy of the praise of every Liberal and Free Trader in this city; and it also shows the co-operation of others which will not easily be forgotten, seeing that their efforts are crowned with such complete success. The majority of Campbell over Bouvier in 1843 was 47, and the same number by which Mr. Cobden had been beaten at Stockport; and this very number has, on this registration, been achieved. Liberal and Free Trade claims sustained, 31; Monopolist claims sustained, 26; majority on claims, 5. Liberal and Free Trade objections, 34; Monopolist objections, 29; majority in objections, 15. Total majority for Free Traders, 47. Independent of this, a case is presented for the consideration of the court, on the ground of informality; Charles Adey, the objector, who described the petition, but not the street in that parish, which is the basis of the case. Should this suit succeed, no less than 14 Monopolist objections will fail; thus making a League triumph of 61 votes. Here!

WIGAN ELECTION.—As a remarkable proof of the good temper which prevailed in the town, it may be mentioned that while Mr. Falvey, the Anti Corn-Law lecturer, was addressing a large body of Mr. Thicknesse's friends, from a window of his committee-room, a number of men, on their return from another street, looking out of the borough, somewhat indiscreetly presented themselves with their flags and banners flying, on the margin of the crowd, when way was immediately made for them, and they passed on without the slightest harshness or interruption of any sort.—Times.

THE DEMONSTRATION AT MANCHESTER.—The day for the banquet to the Hon. Mr. Villiers, the distinguished advocate of Free Trade, appointed to take place on Thursday, the 15th of November. The demonstration promises to be a most important one, both in regard to the numbers, rank, and influence of those who will be present. Among the contributors who have been promised to take part in the proceedings, we may mention Mr. Cobden, M.P.; Mr. Bright, M.P.; Mr. M. Phillips, M.P., of Manchester; Mr. Brown, of Liverpool; Mr. Thorneley, M.P.; Mr. Wilson, and Mr. G. F. Wilson, of Manchester. It is expected that the demonstration will be a most successful one, and will result in a permanent establishment of the Free Trade cause in this city.

THE DEATH OF A MAN.—A man named John Smith, of the parish of St. Mary, died on the 10th inst. of a disease which had been long in the family.

FAMINE—ITS TEACHINGS.

(From the Nonconformist.)

Ireland is becoming the centre of new interest, and, as usual, of the melancholy kind. Report gives out that her staff of life is broken. The potato-crop, the sole support of her numerous peasantry, is thought to be extensively affected by the prevalent disease. Representations to this effect have reached the castle at Dublin from many quarters, and official steps have been taken to institute inquiry into their correctness. Their causes enough in operation upon which to base a supposition that the actual state of the case has been exaggerated. We earnestly hope that the facts will not be found to justify the rumour. The possibility that they may, however, cannot be denied; and upon this possibility we feel ourselves not merely warranted, but imperatively called upon to hang a few reflections.

Famine is a spectre so hideously cruel that even a distant glimpse of its hard features may well awaken serious alarm. There needs not that we should wait till it is in our very midst, before we ask ourselves, "Why is this terrible visitation?" Before its grim, gaunt outline is well defined—even when, through the haze of general uncertainty, we only think we can descry its awful form—we are required, by all the laws of prudence, to determine the reasons which render its appearance probable. As mariners, when, unexpectedly, they fancy they hear the hoarse roar of breakers ahead, conclude that the bare suspicion indicates that they must be out of their course, so we, satisfied that famine may overtake us, and doubting only whether the warnings we receive be true or false, are driven upon the conviction, that we cannot be just where we ought. Something must be amiss, or why these fears? When the sky is cloudless, none can get up a panic about the fall of thunderbolts. There must be a substratum of possibility, if not of likelihood, in which for alarm to root itself—otherwise impostors, however unsparingly they might sow the seeds of it, would but labour in vain. And the existence of such a substratum is a condemnation of the policy which allows it. The fault may be in a Government, or in a people—but fault there is somewhere, wherever national famine approaches so near to a kingdom, as to justify common apprehension. Seasons, it will be said, are not in the hands of man. This is very partially true. As it respects a particular crop, or a special district of country, it is unquestionably correct; but applied comprehensively, as too often it is, no pretended axiom can be more heavily fraught with falsehood. To all practical purposes, the seasons are providentially put under our control. We can command both the sunshine and the rain. But the privilege in this, as in all other instances, is inseparably connected with the performance of duty. We must go after them, instead of indolently expecting them to come after us. All climates, all soils, all varieties of produce constitute the common inheritance of our race—but industry, forethought, and wisdom must turn them to account. Providence never has left, never will leave the world without a sufficiency of food; it needs only to be properly distributed to meet the wants of all. When therefore any considerable portion of the human family encounter the horrors of starvation, it would far better become us to cast the blame upon our artificial modes of distribution, and search out the remedy, than to regard it as an ordination of supreme power, which can only be submitted to with unrepining patience.

The bare prospect of what Ireland may have ere long to undergo suggests two topics of inquiry, which it were well for us to settle at once. The first respects the desirableness, or otherwise, of encouraging a nation to lean exclusively upon one article of subsistence—the second, the policy of suspending its whole temporal welfare upon the influence of a single climate, and that a proverbially fickle one.

Nature, we are told, wants but little, and that little is easily supplied. True, we reply, if men are destined to remain but one remove above the level of brutes. That such is not the purpose of Providence may be inferred from its own beneficent laws. The countries in which the staple article of food is one, and is obtained in abundance without much labour in the cultivation of it, might, at first sight, be esteemed happier, because simpler, than those in which use has created a considerable variety of animal and social wants. And yet the fact that all such countries are, every now and then, cursed with the visitations of famine, might suffice to convince us, that this easy mode of subsistence—this exclusive reliance upon a single article of food—is not in harmony with the purposes of the Universal Ruler. The truth is, that our temporal wants are constituted the means of our intellectual and moral training. The fewer they are, the less urgency there appears for the exercise of thought. If bread grew spontaneously to our hands, and the crop were sufficient and unfailing, mind would sleep away its existence, or pass it in idle dreams, and we should all be but an upper and respectable class of brutes. But it is not intended that we should be so. Hence, our common craving for variety. As civilisation makes progress, our wants increase—as our wants increase, our dependencies multiply—as they multiply, we are driven upon new resources—and, in proportion to the variety of our resources, mind develops itself, man puts forth his inherent energies, and nations escape from the evils of those vicissitudes which, in their rude states, would have gone far to overwhelm them. Famine, then, or the possibility of famine, we take to be indicative of the savage state of being—and the community exposed to it must needs, in our judgment, be near the bottom of the scale of intelligence.

Another lesson is taught us by the prospective danger. We see the folly, nay, the impiety, of those artificial restrictions upon commerce which place all the comforts of nations within the range and influence of one climate. Providence has not so shut us up. There is abundance for all, and it asks but an equal distribution. This secured, famine would be impossible. And why is it not secured? Why, but that a dominating class may reap unnatural advantages? If the trade of the world were open to us, failure of a particular crop, or dearth in a particular district, would prove nothing more than a partial and temporary inconvenience. Want in one locality would be compensated for by superfluity in another. If, therefore, we have a famine in Ireland, the landlords' law must take the responsibility of it. Let us hear nothing about the mysteries and afflictive ordinations of Providence. Man alone is to blame. A nation which cuts off its own means has no right to clamour because thus mutilated, it cannot pluck fruit from the remoter branches of the tree of life. It is all very well to be patient, but patience is not the only virtue. If it were, the disciples of Mohammed might put Christians to the blush. What we want is active and manly industry, and, wherever this is found, upon us, we are more likely to be contented than we ourselves have been in the past. The only remedy for the present state of things is to be a free and open market, so that the produce of the soil may be distributed to all who are entitled to it.

would fain hope it will make a due impression upon the minds of our legislators. Famine, indeed, is a dreadful scourge, but its teachings may be highly beneficial and necessary. "Spare the rod, and spoil the child."

LEGISLATION FOR SCARCITY.

(From the Economist.)

The question, How are the people to be fed? is becoming urgent at home and abroad. Every day brings us new evidences of defective vegetation. It is not in wheat or other grain alone, but in all that constitutes vegetable food, that deficiency becomes apparent. In the latter end of August we gave the first account of the appearance of the potato disease on the coast of Kent. Since then it has spread in every direction, and has become almost universal, not only in England but in Ireland. Since that time, too, the weather has been extremely unpropitious, not only for the ripening, but for the gathering of the grain crop. Wheat is everywhere defective in quality, and in many places deficient in quantity. The price to the consumer, taking quality and condition into account, is 20s. per quarter dearer than it was a year ago. THE NATIONAL EXPENDITURE FOR BREAD IS NOW AT THE RATE OF TWENTY MILLIONS A YEAR, OR FOUR HUNDRED THOUSAND POUNDS WEEKLY MORE THAN DURING THE WHOLE OF LAST WINTER AND SPRING. This increased expenditure for a first necessary could not fail to have a serious effect, especially in ordinary times, on the demand for all other less necessary articles. No doubt the extraordinary expenditure of capital in public works, in addition to the usual income, will make a high price less felt in the meantime than it otherwise would have been; but still the fact of scarcity and deficiency, with all their horrors and privations, is now to be dealt with.

The necessity of an immediate removal of all existing restrictions from the free import of food appears even greater when we consider the condition of the great bulk of the Continental countries. We have on former occasions referred to the precautions used by the Dutch and Belgian governments in order to induce the largest foreign supply of food. At this time every steambot leaving this country for Antwerp carries large quantities of potatoes. We would place no restriction on exports, but we would remove all restriction from imports; and then we might rest satisfied that no exchange would take place that was not beneficial to the country. But with our high duties on grain, we are placed at a fearful disadvantage with other states. In Holland, Belgium, and Russia all duties are suspended; and by the latest accounts from the latter country (Russia), the government has issued an order relieving foreign vessels carrying grain to the Baltic provinces from all the customary port charges.

With such a state of facts existing abroad, and with the complexion of affairs at home, it is scarcely possible to conceive that Sir Robert Peel will wait until the beginning of February without making some extraordinary effort to avert or mitigate so much threatened suffering.

It cannot be denied that there exists at this moment a more favourable opportunity of getting rid of all restrictions on the import of food than at any former time. The combination of events renders such a step not only easy, but needful. No one denies the insufficiency of our home supply to carry us over the next year. No one can be alarmed for excessive supplies from any part of the world. There never was a period when any change of the kind could even momentarily interfere less with the demand for labour, which, for a long time to come, must be much greater than the supply; and the large consumption which must exist as a consequence of full employment, and high wages would be an ample guarantee to the home producer against any temporary or sudden reduction of price. All admit that the change is inevitable before long; necessity and common prudence demand that it should not be delayed.

The question which, even with a removal of all restrictions, creates with us the greatest solicitude, is, whence are supplies to be obtained? In Europe generally they are buyers and not sellers, and the most trivial imports would raise their prices to an equivalent with our own. From the Black Sea we might look for some supply. But our chief reliance must be upon the United States. Their crop of Indian corn has been good, and that of wheat taken altogether, has been an average one. But even there, as well as in British America, we regret to find by our latest advices the potato disease has again for the third year made its appearance. Still with a removal of all restrictions, we may hope for considerable supplies of flour and Indian corn, for the latter of which the poor Irish are now craving. And there is another consideration which at this moment should weigh much with the minister. Of late years we have relied greatly upon a Continental demand for many of our leading articles of manufacture. The high price of food throughout the Continent at this time must affect very unfavourably the prospects of our trade for the next year, especially in the cotton districts. A free intercourse opened up with the corn-producing states of America would secure us an increased demand for our goods, and prevent that reaction in our manufacturing districts which we otherwise may apprehend—a reaction which would be felt by no class more prejudicially than by our own farmers.

It is impossible to calculate the amount of evil which may be averted, and of positive good which may be secured, by an immediate and bold removal of all existing impediments to a free supply of food. If the law be permitted to remain as it is, the future must be to every reflecting man a subject of considerable apprehension and solicitude.

WHAT IS TO BE DONE?—It is expected that the leading members of the Cabinet will assemble in London about the second week in November, and it cannot be denied that most grave considerations await them. By that time they will be in full possession of the information which, in the meanwhile, will be sedulously procured from all parts of the country as to that most vital of all questions, the food of the people—in fact, the means of sustaining life among millions of our humble fellow-beings. Should such information show that the public safety requires energetic action, no party considerations or monopolist clamours will, we are confident, be suffered to influence their deliberations.—Observer.

IMPORTATION OF CATTLE.—From Friday to Sunday last there were imported in this country 101 head of cattle and 25 sheep, from the Hamburg and Rotterdam steamers, viz., per Leeds, 12 oxen, 1 cow, per Helen Macgregor, 30 oxen, 15 cows, and two calves; per Victoria, 30 oxen and seven cows; and per another ship, 63 oxen, 1 cow, and 25 sheep.

LORD ASHLEY UPON THE CORN LAWS.

(From the Dorset County Chronicle, of Oct. 18.)

TO THE GENTRY, CLERGY, AND FREEHOLDERS OF THE COUNTY OF DORSET.

Gentlemen,—The interval of the recess from public duties affords me leisure to address you on the subject of my conduct as a member of the House of Commons.

I have taken the course of addressing you by letter, because it is not likely that I shall have the pleasure, this year, of attending any of your agricultural anniversaries; and if, moreover, the period of a dissolution of Parliament be nigh at hand, you may possibly be summoned to exercise the elective franchise before another such opportunity occur for inquiry or explanation.

A requisition has, I understand, been numerous and respectfully signed, and circulated throughout the county, to call upon some other gentleman whose principles and whose practice are more in accordance with the views of those who have subscribed it, to offer himself as a candidate at the general election for the honour of representing you.

I do not complain of this proceeding on the part of the requisitionists; they have exercised, openly and legitimately, a constitutional right, and probably a duty—yet it renders inevitable a declaration on my part of the course I shall pursue, that we may not remain in ignorance of the views of each other, and that I may not have anything to suppress now, and explain away hereafter.

But it will be very short, because I cannot promise you any alteration. It would be desirable, I know; for I am fully aware of the incompetent manner in which I have discharged the trust committed to my hand; but that is an imperfection beyond my power to amend; and thus, as I am unable to improve my abilities, and altogether indisposed to change my conduct, I have the pain to find myself at variance, for the first time during the space of 14 years, with many of those who have hitherto honoured me by their countenance and support.

I will seize this occasion to touch the subject of the Corn Laws, and the certain result of the present movement against them. It appears to me that their destiny is fixed; and that the leading men of the great parties in the Legislature are by no means disinclined to their eventual abolition. The debates of last session have left no doubt on this head—both the candidates for power, and the occupants of it, approximated so much more closely than at any former period, that most of the hearers were induced to believe that their difference was less a matter of principle than a question of time.

If this be so, it is needless to argue the policy or impolicy of such a change; it would rather be wise to consider in what way you can break the force of an inevitable blow. The sudden repeal of these laws would be destructive; the gradual abolition of them would be less injurious. You have, at this moment, the power to offer such terms; there is no certainty that you will retain it much longer—our actual prosperity must come to an end; and then the wide and fearful pressure of commercial distress, with the hostility on the one side, and the indifference on the other, of the great political chiefs, will leave you, in an hour of especial difficulty, altogether without a refuge or resource.

And now, gentlemen, with many and sincere thanks for the kindness and confidence you have hitherto bestowed upon me, allow me to subscribe myself, with much respect,

Your very faithful friend and servant,

London, Oct. 10.

ASHLEY.

THE POTATO FAILURE IN IRELAND.

(From the Times.)

The accounts of the potato crop in Ireland are of a nature to excite the most serious apprehensions for the ensuing year. The alarm, we are told, is somewhat abated; still, under the most favourable circumstances, and allowing for every exaggeration, there will be a lamentable deficiency of the crop, which will be far under an average one.

The accounts from Meath, from the neighbourhood of Dublin, from Tyrone, Roscommon, Waterford, Kilkenny and Carlow, Down and Armagh, are all to the same effect. The vegetable pestilence, though not universal, and in some instances happily ascertained to have been exaggerated, is yet known to be spreading, and to be most destructive. The extent of the loss cannot be at present known. The first appearance has often proved delusive.

The failure of this crop would now be a calamity in any of the north-western countries of Europe, far beyond what it would have been in the last generation; a greater calamity, indeed, than any could realise till they saw it fulfilled. But Ireland above all other countries is dependent on this crop not only for well-being, but for existence. England and Belgium, and other Continental districts which share the disaster, have all many resources. The potato is only part of their labourers' diet. They have manufactures, and commerce, and capital, to procure foreign supplies equal to their deficiency at home. They have large accumulations both of money, and of stock, and food, which enable them to draw on their neighbours and on the future. The vast population is only provisioned for one year. Of a food which no human ingenuity can preserve longer than one year it raises just enough to last one year. That is the one string to its bow. Reduce it by an inch or two, and the bow is useless. There are tribes which live on the fish that visit their shores. The shoal changes its route, and they perish. There are tribes that live by the chase. The deer are exterminated, and so are their pursuers. There are those who live on the track of the bear and the elk. The prey gets a day's too much start, and they die before they can come up. Such is the rude providence of Ireland.

The peasant reckons not quite from day to day, but, what is not much better, from year to year. He puts into the ground as much as on a narrow calculation will serve for a twelvemonth. It falls short, and he must starve for a month or two. He may be helped by his neighbours, but should all be in the same case, how are all to be helped?

It would be premature to suggest an immediate remedy till the extent of the disaster is known and reduced to calculation. To forbid exportation, as has been proposed, would be the surest way to prevent Ireland from ever having a stock in hand beyond her present needs. To remove the duties on imported food, whatever its merits as a permanent measure, would be a very responsible act for a Minister, and even for a Legislature, if adopted only for the occasion. So abrupt an interference would not be very encouraging to that useful class which tills the ground and buys and sells for profit. Whatever is done, for mercy's sake, let it be for good.

LATEST ACCOUNT.—The Dublin Evening Post of Tuesday says: "Referring to the potato crop, the following are the places, and the extent of the crop, in the county of Kerry and Galway. In the former, the potato crop was still unaffected—in the latter, the disease was extending far and wide. Our Meath correspondent, who is a sensible man, and had been in the beginning a stern sceptic, reports that the disease in that county, especially about Kells and the surrounding district, has been much more destructive than he had any notion of when writing last week. He states that, even if the rot should proceed no further, the supply of potatoes cannot last beyond the 1st of March, and that the peasantry were beginning to talk of the injustice of drawing away oats and other provisions from the country. The oat crop in Meath is described as a very abundant one. From some northern districts, the returns are much more favourable—less injury being suffered than had been apprehended, and the disease apparently dying away. But we should observe that the rot has commenced in some parts of Cavan.—We understand that Professors Lindley and Playfair are to be sent over by the Government, in the course of the week, to be associated with Professor Kane, of this city, in the duty of investigating the disease in the potato crop.—A second circular has been very properly issued by the Royal Agricultural Society of Ireland, requesting further information as to the progress and extent of the disease. We trust that all local societies and country gentlemen will promptly return answers to the queries in the circular. It is of the last importance to have the fullest and most authentic information.

I called your attention yesterday to some slight symptoms of improvement in the potato crop in one or two localities. I have gone very carefully over the reports to day, and I feel happy in stating that the grounds for alarm seem somewhat diminishing; although, doubtless, terrible losses have been suffered, and most serious apprehensions exist as to a scarcity of food for the people.—Dublin Letter, Chronicle.

ISLE OF MAN.—We are sorry to learn that the prevailing disease in this useful esculent has made its appearance in this island since the prevalence of the late wet weather. The crop, we understand, is an average one. Mr. Faulder turned up the crop in a field in the immediate neighbourhood of Castletown this week by the plough, which proved an extraordinary one, averaging, it is supposed, from 12 to 14 tons of fine healthy potatoes per acre, of the Brocklebanks seedlings.—Manx Sun.

CROPS IN PRINCE EDWARD'S ISLAND.—It appears that the potato pestilence has made fearful ravages in Prince Edward's Island, and that the grain harvest has been also unpropitious.

THE POTATO CROP IN DENMARK.—We have accounts from Copenhagen of the 3d of this month, which state that the disease in the potatoes is spreading more and more in Denmark, as in Funen, Lolland, Falster, and likewise Sealand, especially in Amak, near Copenhagen. It has likewise appeared in the Duchy. It is stated that the disease is beginning to show itself in Sweden, and as the crops, particularly of the later kinds, are more backward than in the Netherlands, it is feared that the disease may spread wider. It will, therefore, be advisable to take measures in the discharging of cargoes from that country, to ascertain the quality of the potatoes.—Dutch Paper.

FREE TRADE.—POTATOES.—In the course of the last eight days, three cargoes of potatoes have been shipped for the Continent—two for Ghent, and one for Rotterdam—while another is announced as passing the Sound from Stettin to the southward; all with a view to relieve the distresses of the inhabitants of the Low Countries. Reciprocity involves an excellent principle, and should be extended and consolidated.—Dundee Advertiser.

OPENING OF THE PORTS.—Finding that there is such a lamentable failure of the potato crop, so essential to the sustenance of the people of the three kingdoms, and to prevent a consequent but unnatural rise in the price of other provisions, we understand, from a well-informed source, that Sir Robert Peel is already devoting his most anxious attention to the subject, and that in all probability he will recommend to her most Gracious Majesty to summon an immediate meeting of the Privy Council to proclaim the opening of the ports for the admission of foreign grain, for the next three months, duty free. If Sir Robert Peel does this, we have no hesitation whatever in stating, that he will sit enshrined in the hearts of the people, and make himself one of the best and greatest ministers that ever counselled the sovereign of these realms.—Scotch Reformers' Gazette.

STORING POTATOES.—We cannot too strongly urge on all who are now taking up potatoes, the importance of keeping them out of the earth for a few days previous to storing them, of drying them as much as possible, and of sorting out all that appear in any way diseased. Considering the infectious nature of the potato rot, and the rapidity with which it sometimes spreads, the extra time and trouble consumed in doing this will be well bestowed if it enables us to save a portion of the crop.—Leeds Mercury.

THE HARVEST.

Though the weather has not been uniformly favourable during the present week, we have had several fine harvest days, and a good deal of the corn that was in stock in the fields in this and the neighbouring counties has been secured—we fear, not in very good condition, but we hope not essentially damaged. It would probably not be an over-estimate to say, that not less than a tenth of the corn grown north of the Humber is yet exposed to the hazards of the weather, so that the deficiency already ascertained to exist in the harvest may be still further increased. Beans would also suffer from wet weather. Potato gathering for the winter supply will soon be general, should the weather, on the other hand, be dry; at all events, it cannot safely be delayed beyond the first of November. The promise of this root in Yorkshire and Lancashire is still good. It is not improbable, from the result of observations which have been made, that the disease will be found most extensive on ill-drained soils.—Leeds Mercury.

SCOTCH CATTLE.—Within the last few days several droves of Scotch cattle, on their way to the south, have been detained in the immediate neighbourhood of this town, in consequence of suffering under the severities of the prevailing epidemic. At one time they amounted in number to more than 800. Some of them were unable to rise from the ground, and had to be fed with hay; but all of them required almost incessant attention. It is to be feared that this lamentable disease will occasion very serious losses to the dealers in Scotch cattle, because the expenses on the road are not only increased, but the quality of the animals is very much depreciated.—Doncaster Gazette.

Information from Genoa of the 3d October announces that very large consignments of Piedmontese wheat, and other provisions, are preparing in the ports, destined for the Netherlands.

TAXATION.

(From the Sun.)

In the last number of the Edinburgh Review there is an article on a work by Mr. McCulloch, called "A Treatise on the Principles and Practical Influence of Taxation and the Funding System." This is a comprehensive title for a book published in a country that surpasses all others in taxation, and in the amount of its public debt, and from the introductory remarks of the reviewer we anticipated much information on these important subjects, and entertained hopes that political economy at last had discovered some means by which taxation might be lightened, and the enormous debt which oppresses us might be diminished. The exordium would lead to such an inference. The author is extolled to the skies by the writer. "This work," he says, "embraces one of the most extensive and pre-eminently the most practical department of the all-important science to which it belongs; and it comes to us recommended by the authorship of one of the most distinguished cultivators of that science." And further on, "It need hardly be said that a writer at once so deeply versed in scientific deductions, and so thoroughly conversant with statistical details, is peculiarly qualified to meet such a subject as taxation, in which conclusions drawn from abstract premises and general principles continually demand the correction of practical knowledge." We had looked at the work and tried to derive some advantage from it, but in vain. This mishap we attributed to our ignorance of political economy, and the peculiar phrases which Mr. McCulloch uses in conveying his sentiments to the public, and we therefore after this high praise in a journal so celebrated for its ability, and especially for its numerous articles on the principles which regulate the economy of trade, commerce, and manufactures, expected to find some light thrown on the chaos of confusion, and to behold at a glance the discoveries made by one "so deeply versed in scientific deductions and so thoroughly conversant with statistical details." But miserable was our disappointment, for the reviewer seems as much bewildered as ourselves. He, in fact, can make nothing of the work, and when he begins to analyse its parts, he only points out faults, or defects, or contradictions. In the very first page we find that the work contains no great amount of absolute novelty, and that so much deep study and careful observation have suggested but little in the way of practical amendment; and in the second page the writer boldly speaks out, and asserts that "it would not be easy altogether to reconcile in Mr. McCulloch the theorist with the statistician." He gives a good reason, too, for this left-handed blow at "so able and experienced a writer." McCulloch, in alluding to the condition of the working-classes, states that during the last 20 or 30 years, notwithstanding a considerable reduction of taxation, "their condition has certainly not in any degree been improved, but has rather, we incline to think, been sensibly deteriorated." To which this eulogist sarcastically replies: "In some of Mr. Culloch's previous statistical inquiries, he seems, if we recollect rightly, to have proved that during a period in which the population of England has doubled, its agricultural produce, chiefly for the use of man, has quadrupled; and this although, in the interval, England has become an importing instead of an exporting country; from which it follows that an Englishman at this day eats twice as much as his ancestor 80 years ago—a fact difficult to digest in itself; more difficult still when we are informed that for 30 years the condition of the great bulk of the people has been falling off." This shows that political economists, as well as liars, ought to have good memories. Throughout the whole review of the work similar criticism prevails. We do not find one principle laid down which bears the test of examination; and though the writer to keep up the appearance with which he commenced, throws in now and then a little "soft sawdust," he is evidently highly dissatisfied with a production which comes forth with such high pretensions. We are not surprised at this, for really it contains nothing new except staggering dogmas, without any attempt at elucidation or the slightest proof. It abounds with all the stock phrases of political economists, and expresses a common idea or the plainest proposition in such a complication of high-sounding words and peculiar phraseology, that ordinary readers cannot arrive at the meaning without translating the paragraph, and sometimes the whole chapter, into plain English, and after sifting it are astonished to find nothing but chaff—not even one grain of wheat. Such phrases as these meet you at every turn—"incidence of taxes," "the natural or necessary price of labour," "population increasing with appalling rapidity," "the irremediable helotism of the great majority," "the horoscope of the system," "net or taxable incomes," "funds, mortgages, capital, industry," and 50 other terms of the same stamp, to which, however, we should not object, if they were used in such a way as to produce any good effect, or afford the least consolation for the enormous taxes under which the population, and especially the working population, labours. But they all come to nothing. Population is increasing at a fearful rate; Watt and Arkwright, and others so celebrated for their wondrous inventions and discoveries, are the great culprits; even the poor Irish are blamed for coming over to this country, and reducing the comforts of the English population. The command of the Creator, "to increase and multiply," is to be disobeyed, though the world is not yet half peopled; the condition of the labouring classes is every day becoming more and more deteriorated; and then comes this sage reflection:—"There may, however, be, and we trust there are, countervailing principles at work, of which we cannot at present trace the operation; and at all events we are, whether for good or for evil, too far advanced in manufactures to think of seriously checking their progress. And what does he recommend in the meantime? "Opening additional markets for our manufactured goods, lightening the burdens of the lower classes, and repealing or modifying injudicious or oppressive taxation." Why, the first would act precisely in the same way as Watt's and Arkwright's inventions, for the manufacturing population increase or diminish according to the demand for their labour, and by lightening the burdens on the industrious classes, new burdens must be cast on others, of course on men who have capital in land or money, and according to his own showing, this would "lessen the means of capitalists to employ labour, and increase the temptation to carry capital abroad; and it has not yet been shown how a measure productive of such results should be otherwise than injurious to the labouring classes. But he even despairs of his own remedy, and it is not to be wondered at, after such a jumble of confused ideas. "When this has been done," he says up, "Government had better pause; and, how unphilosophical soever it may seem, the safest course will then probably be to fold our arms, and to leave the denouement to time and Providence." We have only space to notice two or three of the glaring contradictions and unfounded statements with which the work abounds. Mr. McCulloch contends that every shilling raised by the Income-tax is so much deducted from the fund for the employment of labour; that it lessens the means of capitalists to employ labour, and increases the temptation to carry capital abroad. Why, any man who possesses common sense, without a particle of that science called political economy, knows that there are as many false statements here as paragraphs. The money raised by the Income-tax is not thrown into the sea: it still exists, and forms a fund for the employment of labour, either in improving or forming harbours; in constructing machinery for steam-vessels; in building ships and making railroads, bridges, &c. for the service of the country. And if a heavy Income-tax drives capital to other countries, has not every tax the same tendency? If families find themselves burdened with taxes here more grievously than in other countries, or if manufacturers ascertain that they can carry on their trade on the Continent at a cheaper rate, they would be as likely to emigrate for one tax as for another. But after all, these high taxes do not, to any perceptible extent, drive capital abroad. This is a mere bugbear, to be found only in the imagination of the author, and at direct variance too with one of his indisputable dogmas. What country ever was so taxed as Great Britain during the war with France? The Income-tax alone was three times heavier than it is now. Did capital emigrate on that account? Not in the least, and McCulloch is our authority, for he is of opinion that all taxes, when judiciously imposed, and not carried to an oppressive height, occasion an increase of industry and economy, and 'but rarely encroach on capital.' Nay, he deems it probable that "the capital of this country, notwithstanding the enormous expenditure occasioned by the American and late French wars, is about as great as it would have been had we enjoyed profound peace since 1770." What is to be done with a writer like this? It is impossible to bind Mr. McCulloch to anything, for what he advances as an indisputable fact in one place, he contradicts in another, and leaves the reader at an utter loss to know what he means by "true," and what he means by "false." The perusal of the work has only more confirmed us in the opinion of Mr. Cobden, who, in animadverting on McCulloch's notes and comments on the "Wealth of Nations," said that he was a good collector of statistical facts, but a miserable political economist; and in attempting to elucidate the theories of the immortal Adam Smith, had "only made that obscure which was before clear."

RISE IN THE PRICE OF GRAIN.—We have this day to report a very considerable rise in prices. Yesterday wheat advanced 3d., barley 2d., and oats 1d. This day the rise on wheat is 6d., barley 4d. to 6d., and oats 2d., being an advance since our report on Saturday of 9d. on wheat, 6d. to 8d. on barley, and 3d. on oats.—York Reporter.

RICHES OF PENNSYLVANIA.—The United States Gazette says, measures have been adopted which will insure the prompt payment of the interest, due next February. This rich state produces annually 15,000,000 bushels of wheat, and 45,000,000 bushels of other grain, and is capable of increasing the amount fourfold; she will send to market this year 2,000,000 tons of anthracite coal, yielding a return to the state of 7,000,000 dols.; she manufactures three-fourths of the iron made in the whole Union, and has the means of supplying the consumption of the world; she has a bituminous coal field through which the main line passes, for 130 miles, containing 1000 square miles, or 6,400,000 acres; while all Europe contains only 2000 square miles of bituminous coal land.

IMPORTANT TO DEALERS IN WOOD.—The Commissioners of the Treasury, on the application of an eminent merchant, praying that a parcel of partridge wood, recently imported into Liverpool from Antigua, may be admitted to entry on importation into this country free of duty, as furniture wood; and on a memorial from Messrs. Folke and Boulton, of Liverpool, requesting that the description of wood known by the trade as cherry wood may be added to the list of furniture woods, admissible to entry, under the tariff of the last session, duty free, and that a parcel of this cherry wood recently imported by them into the port of Liverpool from New Orleans may be so admitted, their Lordships have been pleased to authorise compliance with the request of the parties. These decisions, which are of very considerable importance to the importers and dealers in woods used in the manufacture of furniture, have been communicated to the revenue officers at the various outposts.—Leeds Mercury.

RAILWAY SPECULATION.—The increase within the last ten days of new railway speculations announced, answers to a capital in round numbers of £50,000,000, the schemes being about forty in number. There had previously been advertised about 450 new railway schemes to be brought before the Parliamentary session of 1846, and representing a capital of nearly £500,000,000, the first calls on which may be roughly estimated at £45,000,000. The maddest of railway speculators, who is invulnerable to reason and to argument, must be startled, one would think, and pause a little at such facts.—Times of Monday.

AGRICULTURAL MACHINERY.—At a meeting of the Harlow Farmers' Club, held by adjournment on the 6th inst., the following was the subject of discussion, and the resolution at which the Society arrived. Subject: Agricultural Machinery—its effect upon our labourers. Resolution.—That in the opinion of this meeting, the employment of machinery in agriculture, where there is sufficient capital at the occupier's command, is both beneficial and effective, as to the employment and moral condition of the labourer; but where it is employed for the purpose of extinguishing labour, there it is most baneful in every point of view. The great expense of good implements and perfect machinery, can only be borne where the tenant is sufficiently secured by the terms of his tenure.—Nonch Mercury.

TURN OUT OF POWER-LOOM WEAVERS AT OLDHAM.—The thousands of power-loom weavers of Messrs. Jones, Wallshaw mills, and Mr. Dronfield, Werneth mill, still continue. Mr. Dronfield has sent forth an announcement that he is willing to give the same prices as other masters, and inviting new hands to take the places of the turn-outs.

ADVANCE IN THE PRICE OF WHISKY.—The Dublin distillers have made a considerable advance in the price of whisky. The failure of the potato crop, and the consequent anticipated consumption of oats, is the cause of the advance.

"A Berkshire Farmer," writing in the Mark Lane Express, says, that on putting up some of his Scotch turnips, on the 1st instant, he found about a tenth part of them at root, much in the same way as the potatoes are this season.

STOCKPORT. MONOPOLY IN FULL FORCE AGAIN. To the Editor of THE LEAGUE.

Sir,—During the last three years, until very recently, the condition of all classes in this borough was rapidly and progressively improving. Many large and long unoccupied manufacturing houses having been put in motion, employing thousands of additional hands, and paying some thousands of pounds weekly in wages, the shops of our tradesmen became crowded with customers, and hundreds of previously empty houses got filled with tenants; the workhouse has been emptied of its able-bodied inmates, and the poor-rates are reduced very low. Such has been the happy and progressively prosperous state of this borough for the last two or three years.

If we look at the dress of its inhabitants at the present time, as compared with what it was three years ago, we cannot but be astonished on reflecting how much in this limited period the expenditure of this one town has done to stimulate and sustain the industry of every place in the kingdom, which is the seat of any useful branch of manufacture and trade, and how in like manner the increased expenditure of other places has tended to the prosperity of this. The happy progress which Stockport was making has, however, received a sudden and serious check, and from the nature of the cause, and the intimate and immediate connection between all our seats of industry, we may shortly expect wide-spread distress. A large, a very large amount of the money which until lately was spent weekly in clothing, &c., is now paid for common daily indispensable food. The apparently trifling advance of one penny per 13 lbs. of flour, makes a difference in this borough of 125l. per week! The advance within the last few months is not less than from 1s. 8d. to 2s. 6d. per 12 lbs.!! Now, the weekly consumption in this borough, when not put upon W. T. Egerton's short-common Corn Law duty, is 1500 loads of 12 casks each; and, consequently, its 10,000 families are now paying exactly 1000l. per week more for flour than they did a few months ago!!

The above being a fact which every head of a family but too well knows, do we need to at all wonder at the daily increasing complaints of all those classes of tradesmen who do not make or deal in the dire necessities of life?

In addition to the advance in the price of bread, we have been paying at least 20 per cent. more for butter, cheese, and all sorts of animal food, during the past 12 months, than we did the year before; so that for four of the principal articles of human subsistence the people of this borough are actually paying about 1500l. per week, or after the rate of 80,000l. per annum more than last year!

In the last session of Parliament, state taxes to the amount of 3,700,000l. were repealed. This afforded relief to the extent of 2s. 6d. per head per annum to the whole population. Now, this was thought at the time to be a large and comprehensive financial operation, and a very wise and liberal reduction of the national burthens. But when we come to compare this reduction in state with the subsequent increase in monopoly taxation, how insignificant the former appears.

The relief by the repeal of the Government taxes was, for Stockport, to the amount of about 6000l. a-year, whereas we are now paying at the rate of 80,000l. a-year more taxes than we did last year to W. T. Egerton and his monopolist confederates!

If the evil was not likely to extend further than to deprive large classes of retail tradesmen of custom, whilst the cost of maintaining their families increased, and of making the working classes work a full day a week more than they previously did, to support the extravagance of Egerton and Co., even then the gross injustice of the system is such that it ought to be at once put down by the resolute and stern demand of an indignant nation. But when we come to calculate the certain and immediate consequences which must result, unless something can be promptly done, to relax the iron grasp of the monopolists, the prospect before us becomes certainly most appalling.

Stockport is only the 560th part of the kingdom in point of population; and if that town is paying 1000l. per week more for bread than it did a few months ago, what must be the amount paid by the kingdom? and from the falling-off which must generally take place in the purchase of manufactures, we may expect soon to see reductions of wages, stopping of works, emptying of houses, and filling of "Bastilles," and general prostration and distress.

I purpose troubling you with more detailed statistics of the condition of this borough.

Oct. 22. Yours, &c. A LEAGUER.

The Monmouth Merlin publishes a long account of the twelfth anniversary of the Abergavenny Cymreigyddion, which took place with great ceremony on Wednesday and Thursday last. A procession of harpers and singers and other members of the society marched along, and a large waggon containing a printing-press was in the cavalcade, in which two printers, dressed in Welch flannel, printed cards of the festival, and distributed them to the crowd as the procession moved on. Sir Benjamin Hall, who presided, delivered a long oration; and among the company assembled in the hall were the Indian Prince, Dwarakanath Tagore, dressed in the costume of his country; Count Pollon, Sardinian Minister; Count Reventlow, Danish Minister, and many of the highest families of the principality. There was a dinner and a distribution of prizes for lyric odes, Welch songs, essays, harpists, singers, and Welch flannels. The festival appears to have gone off remarkably well.

A very superior class of steam vessels is now in the course of building, intended to run as packets between Dover and Calais. Two of them, of iron, are on the stocks, and a third of diagonal timber is under construction at Chatham. They are spoken of in the highest terms, and are expected to be far beyond any vessel that has yet been launched.—United Service Gazette.

MINERAL DISCOVERIES IN AUSTRALIA.—New discoveries of copper have been made at about two miles beyond the Light, and the probable extent of the minerals there will shortly superinduce the occupation of the valuable corn lands and pastures comprised in the two special surveys intersected by the river above mentioned. A copper lode recently discovered on the estate of Mr. A. Hallett, beyond O'Halloran's, has been sufficiently examined, and is pronounced a most valuable property. Nor are these all the current discoveries. Messrs. Philcox and Campbell have purchased a section near Wollunga, on which a copper lode has been laid bare to the extent of about eight fathoms, the quality of the ore being such as can be pronounced upon "at sight." We are almost tired of hearing about manganese; if all the reports are true, and we see no reason to doubt them, the deposits of this useful mineral are obviously great, if not incalculable.—Adelaide Observer, May 5.

ILMINSTER PLOUGHING MATCH.

This match took place on Wednesday. A great number of ploughs were entered for the prizes, and some excellent work was exhibited. The dinner took place, as usual, at the Grapes Tavern, and was admirably served up, the whole fully sustaining the well-known reputation of that respectable establishment.

The chair was taken by WILLIAM SPEKE, Esq., of Andovers, who ably performed the duties which devolved upon him.

Several gentlemen addressed the company; among them were Bickham Escott, Esq., M.P., P. V. T. Langworthy, Esq., &c.

We regret that our limited space will not allow of our inserting more than an important speech delivered by Mr. Escott.

The CHAIRMAN having proposed "The health of the Member for Winchester,"

Mr. ESCOTT rose amid loud cheering, and spoke to the following effect:—He said he might almost complain of the kindness of the chairman, in thus repeatedly bringing his name before the company present, but that he had neither the wish nor the power to conceal what sincere gratification he derived from the kind and hearty welcome which they had given him. He had peculiar pleasure in meeting a large body of farmers, and others interested in agriculture, in this town of Ilminster, because he had not forgotten that here, three years ago, he had met a like party, and had been allowed by them the opportunity of stating frankly to the public his opinion on certain questions in which they were all deeply interested—(cheers). The agricultural societies had in some places, and in some other parts of the country, a little fallen into disrepute with farmers—(hear)—and why was it? because they had fettered the expression of public opinion on public questions, by absurd restrictions—(loud and continued cheers); whereas, he was sure that here every man might express what each believed to be true, and that all would be best pleased by plainness and freedom of speech—(cheers). There was, then, a great practical question, on which all men's minds were more or less interested, and which was every day becoming more and more a subject of intent thought and anxious reflection. Of course he meant the question of restriction on imported food—(hear, hear)—duties for the purpose of keeping up price—the present Corn Law. (Hear, hear.) He had that morning read a letter from Lord Ashley to his constituents on this subject. The noble lord had, indeed written what to his mind seemed a curious epistle—(a laugh)—he had spoken of his own incompetence and want of ability. He was the only man in the country who would have spoken of that. No (proceeded the hon. gentleman), Lord Ashley is an able man, sees truly what is coming; but then Lord Ashley is tainted with that which is the feeling of so many county members, or, if not their feeling it is the mode in which they speak and write. He writes of the Corn Law as given up; but then he describes its loss as a blow, and a blow in another place, destructive of the prosperity of his constituents. Why, surely, if the noble lords think this, then the House of Commons is the place where he and others who think the same should ward off the blow—(hear and cheers). Lord Ashley is quite right in saying the Corn Law is given up, but how can he be right in submitting quietly to allow his constituents to suffer heavy blows?—(cheers). Gentlemen, the truth is, and it had better be spoken plainly, it is the conduct of the special representatives of what they call agricultural opinions which has precipitated the fall of this Corn Law—(tremendous cheering). Why, I have sat in the House of Commons, and heard a gentleman, a worthy friend of my own, pure in character, high in fortune and station, harangue the representatives of the people by the hour, on the low price of beef, mutton, veal, and lamb (hear and great laughter), and do this avowedly for the purpose of supporting agriculture, and propping up protection—(hear, hear); in other words, arraying the supposed interests of agriculture against the real interests of the people—(cheers). Whereas I always thought that the only way to maintain any system of protection was to shew, if you can, that the interests of the community required it, and that the friends of the farmer are the friends of the consumer—(cheers). Gentlemen, so soon as I had heard that speech and others of a similar, though none quite of so monstrous a tendency, and so indiscreet in its expression, I feel, as Lord Ashley feels, that the game of protection was up. This was an attempt to maintain a contest with the bellies of the people—(great laughter and cheers). But I differ with Lord Ashley in one important respect. I dread no blow. I think the change is inevitable, but I do not despond for the result—(cheers). It is true things might have been better if we could have foreseen all that has happened. Late last session I gave a notice for the admission of Indian corn (the very best food for stock), free of duty. Oh, if that measure could have been carried last session, what a blessing would it have been for the country!—"hear" and "no". I hear some gentlemen dispute that opinion. Now, consider for a moment. We import the fat beast and give the Dutch grazer the profit, and the Dutch farmer the manure. Why on earth should we not import the food which is to fatten our own (hundreds were starving last March and April), and keep to ourselves the profit of the grazer, and nourish our own crops with the increased manure? (loud cheers and cries of "that's common sense.") Common sense, says some gentlemen, yes it is indeed common sense; and that is what the Secretary of State has said of the wise course in which we are proceeding. Lord Ashley is, indeed, right on one point; when the leading men of all parties are agreed to support common sense, it must be very unbecomingly common sense that can prevail against them—(laughter and cheers). I have thought it right to speak openly. I have wondered how it is that at so many of these dinners so little or nothing is said of the great question. One recommends better farming, another advises the granting of leases, but both forget the facts that better farming requires capital and security—(great cheering), and the other fact, that the security of leases can never be generally obtained, while there is uncertainty about these laws of importation—(cheers). Let us all, then, endeavour to meet the times, not by concealing the truth, but by preparing for its inevitable conclusions. It will be thus that temporary difficulties will be surmounted, as they have been surmounted before, by the kindness and consideration of some, by the energy and unfettered enterprise of others, and for myself, I feel very grateful that you, to whom I owe no public allegiance, and have no concessions to make, or votes to regret, have allowed me to express to men whom I respect, something of my own convictions on the greatest public question of the day.

The whole company then rose and cheered tumultuously for some minutes.

NATIONAL ANTI-CORN-LAW LEAGUE.—A SPECIAL GENERAL MEETING of the MEMBERS of the LEAGUE will be held in the FREE-TRADE HALL, MANCHESTER, on TUESDAY evening, the 28th inst. The Chair will be taken by GEORGE WILSON, Esq., at half-past seven o'clock precisely. The meeting will be addressed by Richard Cobden, Esq., M.P., John Bright, Esq., M.P., and Henry Ashworth, Esq., of Bolton. Members of the Council, and gentlemen from the country, may obtain tickets of admission to the platform by application to the Secretary, on and after Saturday next, the 25th inst., at the Offices, Newall's-buildings, Manchester. Members of the League will be admitted on showing their cards of Membership. The gallery will be, as usual, reserved for ladies. By Order of the Council.

JOSEPH HICKIN, Secretary.

LETTERS ON THE CORN LAWS, No. XLVII.

TO THE RIGHT HON. LORD ASHLEY.

My LORD,—The gift of foresight is of little avail without the power of action. It only produces a pitiable exhibition of feebleness. Your lordship predicts the approaching downfall of the Corn Laws. You admonish the freeholders of Dorsetshire to prepare for their "destiny." You consider it "needless to argue the policy or impolicy of such a change." And having relieved your mind of its prophetic burden, you turn away from the agriculturists of Dorset, whose representative you are, to discuss the hours of labour with the operatives of Lancashire.

Your lordship possesses this negative mark of true inspiration, that you seem scarcely to understand the full import and extent of your own prediction. The decisive sign of the times and prognostic of the coming change, is, with you, the agreement of "the leading men of the great parties in the Legislature." Others foresaw it while those same "leading men" were agreed in their hostility to Corn Law repeal. They reckoned on the power of principles, which has only become visible to your lordship when embodied in the influence of persons. You anticipate a "wide and fearful pressure of commercial distress" as the constraining cause of Corn Law repeal, for its relief; and yet you counsel the agriculturists to "consider in what way they can break the force" of that relief. Assuring them that such a course would "be wise," you announce your purpose of not "attending any of their agricultural anniversaries," to assist in reducing this wisdom to practical shape. You hold yourself better engaged with the wants of other classes, for whom the coming change, whether as an improvement or as a deliverance, is undoubtedly propitious.

It is not very long since you professed to stand appalled and self-reproached at disclosures of the wretched condition of the peasantry in your own county of Dorset. Their tattered garments, their coarse and scanty fare, their crowded hovels, present pictures of misery not to be paralleled amongst the cotton-spinners towards whom your heart is overflowing. But you leave their guardian angels, if such they have, to guide them through a change which, you say, may be "destructive." You renounce the annual gatherings of farmers and labourers now that the "destiny is fixed" of the Corn Laws. The love of the labourer is waxing cold. The philanthropic anniversary, with its prize ploughmen and toasted thrashers, is involved in the "fixed destiny" of abolition. "It is not likely that you will have the pleasure this year" of sympathy with the peasantry. No more agricultural "protection," and no more agricultural philanthropy. One would have thought that meetings which can no longer uphold monopoly might still have promoted charity. It was the more prominent topic of the two in the professions of their presidents. No doubt your lordship has some benevolent purpose hid beneath the mystery of this withdrawal at a critical period; but the potato-fed serfs of Dorsetshire must feel it an inscrutable abandonment.

You think you are more wanted in the north. The people are better paid, and consequently better clad, better fed, better housed, better taught, than your hungry and ragged labourers at home. But you are their champion for short hours. Remember, my lord, your prophecy of "the wide and fearful pressure of commercial distress" that is impending. Remember that "our actual prosperity must come to an end." Who will thank you, when that period arrives, for having abridged the operative's right of hiring out his labour, and disposing of his time? When leaves become less, and meat vanishes from the table, who will bless your name for the annihilation even of one profitable hour? Think of the mine-women, of whom so many have been punished for evading your law on their behalf! Think of the poor girl who perished by falling down the coal-pit, into which she was endeavouring to steal, in boy's clothes, to earn needful food by forbidden work! Distress can only be mitigated by increased exertion, and would be ill prepared for by a legal limitation of labour.

If your lordship expects commercial distress to be averted by the repeal of the Corn Laws, the case is not less strong against interposition. The factory operatives can make their own terms in proportion times. Food, cheap and plenty, is to them a ten hours' bill, or an eight hours' bill, that executes itself. It needs no informers or inspectors. Prosperous trade ensures better bargains. You may trust the Corn Law Repeal Act for relief. But why, then, has your lordship always opposed Corn Law repeal?

You involve yourself in terrible entanglement by declining to look the Corn Law question fairly in the face. Sir Robert Peel and Lord John Russell, shaken into one, do not constitute a "destiny," even for an Act of Parliament. If the present law be wise and just, your constituents and the country have a claim on your uncompromising support of it, whatever parties may combine for its abolition. If that law be neither just nor wise, they have an equal claim for your exertions against its continuance. You cannot evade the question of "policy or impolicy," and yet discharge your duty as a legislator. Nay more, you cannot evade that question, and yet sustain your position as a philanthropist.

In the field or in the factory, the prospect of an ameliorated condition is bound up in the great point at issue. All efficient aid, and all consistent charity, must proceed on the assumption of the policy or impolicy of the Corn Laws. It is a previous question to all others. You assume the repeal to be an evil when you advise the agriculturists to "break the force" of the blow. You assume the repeal to be a good when you describe its inevitable contingency on commercial distress. The same breath blows hot and cold. If the repeal will be no relief to commerce, and even "gradual abolition" be "injurious" to the farmer, it is little in harmony with your benevolent professions to couple such measures with impending calamity, and become accessory to a disastrous national delusion, even though it should be patronised by "the leading men of the great parties in the Legislature." If, on the other hand, it be a measure which the prospect of distress ought to render "inevitable," you ought assuredly to re-consider your counsel to agriculturists, that they should diminish the good as much as possible, make "terms" on behalf of an expiring mischief, and save a nest-egg of monopoly for future vivification.

The extent of this question as one, not merely of a particular enactment, but of national policy, seems not to have impressed itself on your lordship's mind. If Free Trade be inevitable, every kind of influence claiming to be useful should direct itself towards rendering the principles of Free Trade all-pervading. It cannot co-exist with a system of minute legislation, however kindly in its purposes. The best help to the working classes is that which enables them to help themselves. You might enact that no man shall wear a hat with a hole in it; and if at the same time you enact that he shall not work the hours required for a new hat, what follows? I know an establishment in which a wholly unnecessary legislative interference about white-washing, last year, cost the workpeople employed therein no less than 2000*l.* in suspended wages, and did no good to any living being. Such cruel kindnesses are, I fear, not uncommon in the history of legislative philanthropies. They must happen when good gentlemen intermeddle with what in detail they cannot understand. And they must also happen, so long as desired and most desirable improvements in the food and clothing of the poor, in their hours of toil, in the cleanliness and wholesomeness of their homes, &c., are not based upon the general improvement of their condition, adequate wages, and full employment. This general improvement might still leave the working classes in need of instruction and suggestion. There might still be occasion to direct, stimulate, and aid their struggles into a better mode of daily existence. A wide field would be open for much of the beneficent enterprise in which your lordship is engaged. Happy results would cheer on philanthropic exertion. The case of the farm labourer would no longer be so desperate as to be relinquished for a more promising solicitude on behalf of the manufacturing operative. All classes would have vantage ground to start from in the career of improvement.

However near the termination of the corn monopoly may be, your course, my lord, must needs be one of helping or of hindering. Even in such a change as that, much must be contingent on the spirit in which it is accomplished. Ill would it become you to leave your name associated, in Parliamentary records, with what you deem "destructive" or "injurious;" or, on the other hand, to connect yourself to the last with a doomed system, whose existence is incompatible with the kindly purposes to which your life is devoted. You must take a side, my lord. You thwart and falsify all for what you profess to live, unless you take the right side.

A NORWICH WEAVER BOY.

THE HOP GROWERS AND THE HOP CULTIVATION.

Last week I gave some account of Weyhill hop fair. Perhaps it will be interesting to many readers, if I give some account in continuation of that of the hop culture.

The hop is used in the brewing of beer. When the liquor is drawn off the malt, it is sweet; hops being added to it, produces an acidity. The longer beer is intended to be kept, the more liberally it is "hopped;" for instance, the directions to brew strong ale and strong beer are the following:—"Twelve bushels of malt to the hogshead for beer, (or fourteen, if you wish it of a very good body); eight for ale. For either pour the whole quantity of water hot, but not boiling, on at once, and let it infuse three hours close covered; mash it in the first half hour, and let it stand the remainder of the time. Run it on the hops previously infused in water. For strong beer, three quarters of a pound to a bushel; of malt, if for ale, half-a-pound. Boil them with the malt three hours from the time it begins to boil. Cool a paleful to add three quarts of yeast to, which will prepare it for putting to the rest when ready next day; but if possible, put together the same night. Turn as usual. Cover the bung-hole with paper when the beer has done working; and when it is to be stopped, have ready a pound-and-a-half of hops dried before the fire, put them into the bung-hole, and fasten it up. Let it stand twelve months in casks, and twelve in bottles, before it be drank. It will keep five, eight, or ten years. It should be brewed the beginning of March."

Such are the uses to which the hop are put. The nature of the plant, and the portion of it used, will be seen presently.

The cultivation of the hop is a species of husbandry principally confined to that part of the island, comprised in the counties of Kent, Surrey, and Sussex. Each of these counties presents a great variety of external features when taken by itself; but when collected and compared together, they exhibit a remarkable uniformity and sameness. The great formations of the wealden, the sand, and the chalk, belong to each and to all. In the core of the district lies the wealden, comprising the wealds of Kent, Surrey and Sussex. This large and central tract of country is girt with a belt of chalk hills, which, rising from the sea about the Isle of Thanet, range in a westerly course over the north of Kent, and passing through Surrey, return in a circular sweep along the south of Sussex to the channel. A fringe of sand forms the union between the chalk and the wealden.

These three varieties of soil govern the kinds of agricultural occupation, afforded at different seasons. The woodland is the great feature of the wealden. The sand, as it rises into the chalk, furnishes some of the most celebrated hop-gardens and orchards. The most highly-cultivated arable land is found upon the chalk of the Isle of Thanet.

There is perhaps no produce in the country that requires so much, or such varied human labour, as the hop at the different stages of its progress. The ground is at one time a field, at another a garden. Great outlay of force must be expended on the soil as on the corn-land; but the force is that of the human arm, not that of the beast of burden; which, in some plantations, as those about Farnham, scarcely enters. Unlike corn, too, and other produce, which, when the soil has been prepared, and the seed committed to the ground, is left in the main to the course of nature and the order of the seasons to bring to perfection, it must be trained and tended from its first shoot to its ripening. Then it is not gathered like corn, and stored upon the stalk, but is cut at once by the farmer. It thus call into play the energies of all ages and of either sex. The soil is tilled and subdued by the man; the plant is trained and tended by the woman; in the gathering, are united all—man, woman, and child. The practice of tilling and sowing, however, has in some places the character of a man's work, and in others of a woman's; and even times the girl in the more laborious treatment of the land. The women do much of the men's labour at task-work, and in the hop-picking, which is the most laborious of all. But, however, only the higher portion of the female population is called upon to do the hop-picking; and the men, who are called upon to do the hop-picking, are the men who are called upon to do the hop-picking.

In describing the various processes through which the hop passes before it reaches the market, I will begin at the beginning.

Digging is usually begun in the month of December, and performed by the acre. The rate of payment is from 18s. to 17. an acre. A man and a boy will dig about an acre in the week. The next stage is opening the hops—that is, levelling the hills which have been piled round the plants in the preceding summer. Women and boys are occasionally employed at this; but it is usually done by the men as taskwork. Sometimes they contract to do it by the acre, but it is nice work, and therefore seldom done in this way. When the woman is hired to do it by the day, she gets about 10d. or 1s. It lasts for about a week in the month of March. It is hard work for a woman; the moving the ground is heavy. When men contract, they are paid about 4d. per hundred.

About the month of April, when the hop plants begin to shoot, the poles are fixed in the ground. It is common for men to contract to do this by the acre. It is called "poling the hops." The wife often assists at this, generally by carrying the poles to the hills, where the man fixes them, and by fastening them after he has done so by a "rammer," with which she beats the ground into the hole. This commonly lasts about a fortnight, but it depends on the weather, and some farmers will only do it when the moon is new. 1200 hops are planted on an acre, and when it is done by contract it is at the rate of about 4d. per 100. After the "poling," boys and women are employed at "chokeclearing," or picking up the chips and old pieces of poles from the ground; they are hired to do this by the day. It lasts only for a day or two. At the beginning of May, or latter end of April, the hops are "tied." Neither boys nor men are ever employed at this work. It is an "endless" job for a man; a man cannot get on with it. Women generally contract with a farmer to "tie" for the season, at 9s. an acre. A woman will generally take two acres, or two acres and a half. The trouble depends on the weather. If it is boisterous, she has to bind them over and over again, as the wind blows them from the pole, or blows them round in a wrong direction away from the sun. She can bind about two acres and a half in about a week, and must visit them to rebind them every three or four days, till they grow out of her reach. This takes place on an average in five or six weeks.

The next process is that of "shimming," which is effected by an implement called the "shim," in other places it is called "breaking," "nidging," or "nidgeting," from the term "break," nidge, and nidget, being applied to the implement, which during the summer months is occasionally drawn by horse through the hop gardens and between the hills, to loosen the earth, and remove the weeds. Boys of various ages are made use of to lead and direct the horse, which must, in the narrow spaces through which they are driven, be held in strict command. When the hops reach the top of the poles, it is a common occupation with the women to fasten the bines which may have been blown off again to their places; this is called "horsing the hops," and is so named from a kind of ladder they mount for the purpose.

The hop is now prepared for the last out-door process, that of "picking." Few things are more beautiful than a hop-garden in this state. As the plant approaches to maturity, the numerous green and over-arching alleys are brightened by the light-tinted flowers, which hang in clusters from the top to the bottom of the poles. The air is scented with the pleasant perfume they exhale to a considerable distance, and many who wander into foreign lands to look at the vine-clad hills of the sunny south, leave a much more beautiful sight unvisited at home, in the fertile and highly cultivated landscapes of Kent and Surrey.

Hop-picking begins generally about the second week in September. All hands are employed at this—men, women, boys, and girls, down to the youngest that can work. The better the crop, the less money is given for picking the same quantity. In an average year 1s. is given for picking seven bushels, and a good picker in the same year could pick 11 bushels. Picking is usually continued for 12 hours in the day. A woman can pick rather more than a man. Immediately after the poles are gathered, the poles are stripped and stacked. Labourers commonly contract to do this at from 5s. 6d. to 7s. an acre. Their wives and children often assist them; the refuse bine is their perquisite, in addition to the pay.

Rags are extensively used in manuring hops. The women are occasionally employed in cutting them; but it is more generally done by the men on rainy days. The average price is about 9d. per cwt. In some parishes, where the population is large, the black and spud," which are used manually do the work of the "shim," and horse-power is but little used. The work is very laborious, and the same observation applies to all the work on hop-grounds which men perform.

The "Report on the Employment of Women and Children in Agriculture," presented to Parliament in 1843, contains some interesting statements with reference to the physical, social, and moral condition of the population employed in the culture of the hop. It does not appear that any dangerous disease is generated by the occupation; on the contrary, it seems to be decidedly healthy. W. Newnham, Esq., surgeon, Farnham, says: "There is no work performed by women or children in the hop plantations calculated to produce disease, or to which these disorders can be fairly traceable, with the following exception: If the hop-picking season proves a wet one, they are exposed frequently to become wet, and to stand for many hours upon the ground saturated with moisture; and when this happens to be the case, disorder of the digestive functions ensues, commonly showing itself in the form of diarrhoea, and not usually of an obstinate or severe character. With regard to the imported population at this [hop-picking] season, they of course are exposed to the same causes of disorder, aggravated by their being lodged in very crowded and ill-ventilated apartments, and by their great want of cleanliness and generally imprudent and dissolute habits. Even here malady is not of a severe character; and a death among the imported population is scarcely ever heard of. . . . I have never been able to trace any endemic or epidemic malady, arising after the hop-picking season, which could fairly be attributed to it as a consequence."

Much evil results from the intermixture of the "imported population" here spoken of with the regularly employed inhabitants of the hop districts. As the season approaches, a new population of men, women, and children is poured into them. The crowd is motley, and differently composed in different districts. Mr. Paine, a large grower, states, that there resort to Farnham about 4000 or 5000 strangers, being an addition not far short of the whole stationary population, which is 7000 for the parish. These strangers "come chiefly from the towns and villages within 20 miles of Farnham, some few from a greater distance, and others are labourers who have no settled home: among these last are gipsies. Various means are provided for their reception; part are admitted into barracks constructed for the purpose, others into spare rooms in cottages which are specially reserved from the tenants." This vast influx of strangers, in addition to the confusion which their very number produces in a small town or village, often bring with them habits and language calculated to degrade if not to pollute their companions. Farnham becomes thronged with a temporary population of country people, vagrants, and gipsies; the last of whom are in some few instances preferred to the others from their wild and active habits which speed the work during the day, and are content with any lair to rest in at night. The intercourse between them and the inhabitant work-people is more complete, because it is the custom for the mother of the family to take the very youngest into the hop-gardens, where the children pick, and the infants rest and play while the work goes forward; and at night many are crowded into the inhabitants' cottages by virtue of the reservation already mentioned. The Rev. R. Sankie, Curate of Farnham, says: "I think the parish stands under considerable disadvantages from the peculiar nature of the labour which is employed at the hop-picking. I have seen the cottages crowded with strangers and their families at this season, who so much disturb the order of the household, that provisions are bought for the day instead of a longer period, lest in the confusion they should be lost or made away with. The crowded intercourse, both on the hop-ground and in the cottages, must be productive of mischief, especially to the young. There is little uproar until the close of the picking. The labours of the day, and as is commonly alleged, a soporific influence from the hop itself, disposes them to be quiet. At the close of the labour in the grounds, when the workmen are being paid off, the scene changes. There is much drinking, fighting, and bad language."

The rector of the village of Brede, in the neighbourhood of Rye, speaks of the same influences in a different part of the country. "I am of opinion that the imported hop-pickers do much to demoralise the parish, as they are generally persons of the lowest character in both sexes; the very effect of whose manner of living while here is sufficient to produce the worst feelings and consequences. It is by no means uncommon to see from eight to ten, or more, sleeping under one shed, without any other partition between them than that which the darkness of the night may provide. It is a common practice for servant girls at this season to give their employers notice to quit their service, and to go to the hop-picking, where they will be paid for their services."

Those who frequent the neighbourhood of Maidstone are stated to "come from all parts of England and Ireland, and amongst them may be found many unfortunate members of various classes. A great number of the English come from St. Giles's, Saffron Hill, White-chapel, and Kent-street, and they are the most vicious and refractory. The Irish, who are the most numerous, are extremely dirty, both in their persons and habits, and are very indelicate in their conduct and appearance. They frequently bring contagious disorders."

All the witnesses concur in representing female chastity as being at a very low ebb—and some go to the length of saying, that in many instances the women are utterly devoid of the feeling. This, however, is not entirely attributable to the periodical influx of strangers into these districts. It has its root deeper, and is to be sought for in the disgraceful physical condition in which the labourers generally are permitted to rest by those who profit by their toil. The undivided state of the larger families acting upon the scantiness of house room and general poverty, or high rents, often crowds them together in their sleeping apartments, so as seriously to infringe on the decencies which guard female morals. Mr. Hart, a professional gentleman, of Reigate, says:—"The great difficulty is to say at what age brothers and sisters do not sleep together in one apartment, but generally until they leave home, be that at ever so late a period."

In the neighbourhood of Cuckfield, in Sussex, it is common for children of both sexes to use the same sleeping-room and bed, up to the age of 12, and even 14. The Rev. W. Sankie, of Farnham, in Surrey, mentioned a case where two sisters and a brother, all above 14, habitually slept together. These are mere glimpses of the ordinary and every-day influences to which the labouring class are subjected, and it can be no matter of wonder that they lose, or rather never acquire, that delicacy and purity of mind which is the origin and the safeguard of chastity.

Nor are the deteriorating effects of these vicious domestic arrangements counteracted by an education likely to promote the growth of principles of resistance or self-restraint. But upon this wide subject I have left myself no room to dilate, important as it is, and necessary to be fully understood, in order to form an accurate idea of the state of society in the hop-growing districts. It may briefly be said that education in the ordinary sense of the term is almost unknown. Superstition as a consequence lurks among the labouring classes of these counties to an extent of which the career of Mad Thom d'as Sir William Courtenay, at Canterbury, and its fatal termination, affords a melancholy illustration. The belief in charms for the healing of bodily hurts is not uncommon; faith in the same means of fertilising the ground and trees is said to exist; and that in witchcraft has not yet expired. A very substantial farmer in the north-east of Kent, within a few years, used to arrange scythes in a particular order around his stables to secure his horses from witchcraft.

I was present one day this week at an interesting assemblage of landed gentlemen, clergy, farmers, and farm labourers at Stockbridge in Hampshire; and a short while before that, I was present at a public entertainment given to the farming population by one of these landed gentlemen, in his own park, at his own house; I mean Charles Baring Wall, Esq., M.P., of Norman Court. These friendly gatherings gave a pleasant proof of the advance that is making towards the elevation of the working people, in some of the rural districts. An excellent library provided by Mr. Wall, for all who will read, and read free of expence, is another pleasing feature.

I had prepared for this week a full description of those proceedings at Stockbridge, and at Norman Court, but have mismanaged it so as to make it much too long to follow this letter. No for the present it stands over.

ONE WHO HAS WHISTLED AT THE PLUGH.

HAMER STANFIELD, Esq.—We are informed of a fact, which, though not strictly public, yet deserves to be made such, both for its own nature, and as characteristic of a highly respected fellow-townsmen. It is well known that several years since the firm of Stanfield, Briggs, and Stanfield, of which Sir Hamer Stanfield was a junior partner, became unfortunate. Ever since that period, this gentleman has contemplated the present, if Providence should prosper him, of his share of the debts owing by the above firm; and just previous to his marriage, which took place a few weeks since, he sent round a circular to all his former creditors, accompanied by 20s. in the pound on his proportion of every debt. Such instances of mercantile honour as this should be widely known, in order that they may be both admired and imitated. Leeds Mercury.

CHURCHMAN.—At the Oxfordshire Quarter Sessions, held last week, William A. Hey was charged with stealing half a pint of wheat in the straw, of the value of one penny, the property of Robert Abbot, Newton, of Benson. The prisoner was acquitted. Anne Cook and Harriet Harding were charged with stealing about two pints and a half of wheat in the straw, of the value of two pence, the property of John Collins Ditchings, Thomas Hutchings, and William Hutchings of Benson. These prisoners were also acquitted.

AGRICULTURE.

POLITICAL RIP VAN WINKLES!

Washington Irving tells the story of an idle, do-nothing fellow, called Rip Van Winkle—a creature living on the industry of others—who went up into the mountains one day, there remained playing bowls with certain unearthly Dutchmen for 40 years, and returned to his native village perfectly unconscious of the length of time he had been absent, and of the changes which had occurred during that time. Now the Morning Post tells of a meeting of gentlemen in Essex, under the title of the "Hinckford Agricultural and Conservative Club," which forcibly calls to mind the story of Rip Van Winkle. Had the Conservative gentlemen who spoke on that occasion been buried for the last two years in the recesses of the Catskill mountains, they could scarcely have betrayed more ignorance of what has passed in this country with relation to the Corn Laws. This Club met under the Presidency of Sir John Tyrell, a fact which will prepare the reader for some curious, if not very statesmanlike, opinions. The meeting was itself a curiosity, for the union of "Conservative and Agricultural," since Sir Robert Peel has avowed himself a Free Trader in principle, must be to Monopolists something of an anomaly. However, unless the Post is "poking its fun" at its readers, such a meeting really did take place. Sir John began by stating that the duties of a Member of Parliament were "of a very careful and anxious character," involving "great steadiness of judgment, prudence, and perseverance;" and went on, and by implication claimed for himself all those high qualities. Sir John then said "Lord Western, Mr. Coke, and others, had for their object plenty, and security for plenty; that is the object of the Corn Laws." After the discussion the subject has undergone, and the admissions made by protectionists, we think even the Hinckford Agricultural-Conservatives must have stared at that assertion. But what must have been their astonishment when afterwards Sir John Tyrell gravely said—

"The poor man has lost his potato crop; Belgium has been a great portion of the summer under water, and I heard a gentleman from there describe it as a great sponge; and all this may have tended to raise the price of corn; but if there had been no protection I believe the price of corn would have been much higher than it is now."

The price of corn has risen because another kind of food was deficient, and yet restrictions on the importation of corn has prevented a rise of price!! Verily, the Essex baronet is an original reasoner. He then put forth this oft-refuted plea for protection, and supported it by a—falschood.

"There are rates and taxes, and burthens of that description which belong to the land; and, though committee after committee had inquired into them, I think it would be highly inexpedient for the agricultural members to place themselves in the hands of the Anti-Corn Law League; if I cannot defend my course of protection let it be taken from me; though I think from the good sense of the people of this country that we have nothing to fear from an investigation."

Here is a bundle of absurdities which must have been most puzzling to the audience, if they tried to make "head or tail" of the chairman's speech. And Sir John actually believes, or pretends to believe, that the farce of "protection societies" may be revived. He said:

"When we look to the Protection Society, which emanated from an individual in this club, although the fruits of that combination may not have answered the expectations of many gentlemen present, it has moved in the right direction, and is capable of being improved; we have the same parties who called it forth in a state of efficiency."

Poor Mr. Round, an out-and-out supporter of Sir Robert Peel, laboured earnestly, if not very successfully, to show that Sir Robert is an ardent supporter of "agricultural protection." And, in direct contradiction of all that the most sensible men amongst the supporters of the Government have been saying for the last year, at least, Mr. Round ventured to assert that he believed "protection would be maintained to them."

A Mr. Fulcher then made a speech full of abuse of the League, quite in the style of the protection societies, a style of which all but the Rip Van Winkles of monopoly are now heartily ashamed. He then said:

"The last time I had the pleasure of meeting you, the Anti Corn Law League was traversing unopposed the length and breadth of the land. Since that time, it has received 'a heavy blow and great discouragement,' by the formation of the Agricultural Protection Societies. 'The great fact' has become 'small by degrees and beautifully less.'"

Fancy a gentleman waking up from a political nap of two years' duration, and stating that the League had received a heavy blow from the "Protection societies!!" He then claimed for the Rev. Mr. Cox "the high honour of originating the protection societies." The rev. founder then spoke, and said:

"I will say a word or two on what has been the result produced by it. Some people say, 'It is a very pretty thing, but you have done nothing at all—you are just where you began.' Why, that is where we wish to be; the principle on which we began was, that the protection we have we mean to maintain; and I think we have effected everything we could possibly have anticipated."

Why, if the almost universal abandonment of "protection" is what they anticipated, the protection societies may claim some credit, for the present state of public opinion on the subject is unquestionably owing in some degree to the exhibition of the principles of monopoly made by those societies. Next to the teaching of the League, the cause of Free Trade has been most indebted to the self-exposure of monopoly made by the protection societies. They have been what drunken helots are said to have been to the youth of Sparta,—they have been awful warnings to all men of sense or humanity to avoid monopoly. Mr. Cox then attributed Mr. Hudson's success at Sunderland "to the sound information spread over the country at large" by the protection societies! He then explained an ambiguous passage of the President's speech thus:

"There was one expression of Sir John Tyrell's, which might be misconstrued to your disadvantage. He said that the price of corn would have been higher now if the Corn Laws had been repealed. I agree in the truth of that; but I think he meant to refer to the experience of the present moment, and to say, that if we had no Corn Laws a vast quantity of land would have been thrown out of cultivation, and from the failure of the potato crop, and the state of the harvest, we should not have had sufficient corn to make up what we wanted, and prices would have been higher; but he did not mean to say that the British farmers would have had a better remunerating price without Corn Laws."

It is clear Mr. Cox has slept since his mind gave birth to the grand conception of the protection societies, for there are not 20 persons out of Essex—we should have thought but for this meeting that there had not been so many there—who do not know that the present means of meeting Free Trade in corn recommended by the protectionists, is better cultivation at home. Let us hear what Mr. Cox says of the present Corn Law:

"I told you I thought the Corn Law of the Government was a good measure, for there were many false figures in the old law that never came into operation, and the present law was more likely to give you a steady price of corn, though I thought the scale a little too low. That has been fully borne out; for under the present Corn Law you have had a protection when you required it, of 14s. a quarter. The great bulk of foreign corn has been brought in at 14s. a quarter duty. Under the old law they would have paid no such sum. They would have run up the averages, and when they got them to an exorbitantly high pitch the duty would vanish, and in would come all the corn. This is my justification of what I said. I think the present Corn Law has been productive of very material good; and I wish to impress on you that you have had a protection of 14s. a quarter when wheat was 12s. or 14s. a load. There is now no difference between Lord John Russell and Mr. Cobden; and therefore when there is anything worth fighting for, recollect you have a protection of 14s. a quarter."

The time is coming, the time indeed is come, when such a statement of the operation of the present Corn Law ought to be remembered. Prices have advanced from actual and apprehended deficiency, and prices would have advanced had there been a perfectly Free Trade in corn; but the end is not yet. We believe before another harvest none will more bitterly regret the effects of monopoly than the British farmer.

THEORY AND PRACTICE.

DILETTANTI FARMERS' INSTRUCTORS.

Perhaps nothing is more remarkable to the practical agriculturist, first turning his attention to chemistry and geology as applicable to agriculture, than the strict accordance between theory and practice. He begins to find that the practices of the best farmers conform, with more or less precision, to the dictates of science; and that the great value to him of scientific knowledge is its power of carrying out his former system with more certainty, and often with greater economy. It is to the practical farmer, therefore, that scientific knowledge applicable to farming is of the greatest advantage; and to practical farmers, its cultivation, earnest, business-like cultivation, is to be recommended. But there is a class of scientific farmers, or rather of talkers about scientific farming, whose influence and example certainly do not tend to give the ordinary farmer a very high notion of the value of science. These are gentlemen, landholders, who get a smattering of chemical science, and retail it often most erroneously at agricultural meetings. Some time since, every landlord throughout the land seemed to have run wild on the merits of guano, and its chemical properties and scientific uses were constantly and elaborately detailed. Now, however, the squires—the ordinary kind of squires—seem rather to draw back from and discountenance scientific farming, and hint that it may be all very well “in theory,” but is to be dealt with slowly and cautiously in practice. Now the hot haste with which the farmers were to be lectured into chemical knowledge at the one time, and the sage cautions against “theory” at the other—as if theory rightly formed could ever be placed in contrast with practice—are easily to be traced to the same source. When prices were low, crops had partially failed, and fear of Free Trade existed in the farming mind, it was very convenient to anticipate applications for abatements of rent by suggesting that a top dressing of guano scientifically used was a specific for all the evils farmers suffered; and that men who were so benighted as not to adopt such an easy remedy, could scarcely expect help from their landlords. Farmers understood well enough at the time that this was the real meaning of all the squirearchical lectures on guano and chemical farming. In the landowners’ mouths, if not in their minds, Liebig and his fellow-labourers had a short cure for agricultural distress. Lately, however, prices have got better, and science has shown the farmers that they waste upon their own farms in one way or another more of produce, or of the elements of production, than the most lavish use of guano could supply, and that such waste is chiefly caused by circumstances in great measure beyond the farmers’, but entirely within the landlord’s control.

Artificial scarcity, produced by the landlords’ game; artificial shade and barrenness, caused by the landlords’ trees; superabundant moisture, because the landlord’s won’t drain; waste of manure and deficiency of manure, from the want or ill construction of the landlords’ farm-buildings, and the rules and restrictions of landlords’ agreements, form a part, and only a part, of those evils which an exact estimate of the position of the farming business discloses. Now, farmers very naturally say, “We know the value of science, but here are the preliminary obstacles which prevent its application to the business of husbandry in England; these the landowners must remove, if they expect to keep up their rents.” The truth is, that farmers, knowing little perhaps of the vocabulary of scientific chemistry, are far beyond the landlords in the knowledge of its practical value, and of the impediments to its reduction into practice; and landlords are conscious of such truth, for whenever they now hear a farmer talking of improved or scientific farming, they know that his talk implies the previous conditions of no game preserves and a fair lease. This is what they really object to when they decry “theory.” We have been led into this line of remark by the observations of the chairman at the Cleveland Cattle Show. At that meeting, as the reporter tells:

“The Hon. Octavius Duncombe, M.P., for North York, (son of Lord Feversham, of Duncombe Park, and cousin of Mr. T. S. Duncombe, M.P. for Finsbury), was in the chair.”

As if the pedigree of a chairman was to be given with all the precision of that of a short-horn. The honourable Chairman said:

“Much was now said, at agricultural meetings, on the application of science, chemical and geological, to the cultivation of the soil. He was inclined to think, however, that practice was in advance of theory;—and that more was to be learned from practical men than from the geologist and the chemist. Theory was often at variance with practice. Thus, the farmer was told that he should cover his manure, and exclude the atmosphere, or the ammonia would escape, and the value of the heap would be deteriorated. And yet, in practice, top-dressing was found to be of great service to the land, notwithstanding the exposure of the manure to the action of the atmosphere.”

That “top-dressing is of great use to the land” there can be no doubt, when it comes, as it commonly does, in the place of a more effective dressing; but that does not disprove the statement of the agricultural chemist, that it is a wasteful mode of using manure.

Mr. Duncombe then expatiated on the importance of “deep draining,” and the benefits derived from his own practice of draining at three feet deep.

We quite agree with the necessity of deep draining, where draining is wanted; but it is not by telling the farmers what he has done on his own pet farm that a landlord can benefit his tenants, but by draining their farms in the same complete manner. A shrewd observer, who is much employed as an agricultural architect and surveyor, remarked to us the other day, “that most of the improvements we hear of in England by the landowners are done upon their own farms—they are doing nothing for their tenants;” and this remark, which applied especially to the improvements of farming buildings and yards, is in the main true.

At the Cleveland meeting, the Earl of Zetland said:

“He had listened with much interest to the worthy President’s recommendation of deep draining. Having himself had considerable experience in various parts of the kingdom, and especially in Scotland, he had no doubt of the advantages of draining deep; and he was glad to find that a change of feeling had shown itself in Cleveland on this important question. Those who had drained 15 or 16 inches deep, now saw the wisdom of going to twice that depth; and he believed they would do better still, if they went to three feet. As to deep draining, theory and practice, however they might clash on other subjects, were in perfect harmony; for if the drain were not deep enough to carry the water from the roots, the object aimed at, as a matter of course, was not accomplished. The root struck deeper than 15 or 16 inches; and the drain must go to 30 or 36 inches, or the plant would not flourish.”

As a rule, we have found tenants much more ready converts to the system of deep draining than landlords. But there is one obstacle to deep draining in many places which requires the interference of the Legislature, viz., the difficulty of obtaining an outfall for the water of sufficient depth, because the owners or occupiers of the lands through which such outfalls or brooks pass will neither deepen them, nor, in many cases, permit them to be deepened; and they cannot be compelled. This is a serious evil.

Another speaker on deep draining was Mr. Wharton, of Skelton Castle, who we have been informed is draining all his farms in the best manner, in some instances in opposition to the prejudices of inferior tenants. Mr. Wharton said:

“He had come into the district almost totally ignorant of the theory and practice of agriculture; for he had previously been confined in London, where he held an official situation. But he had come with an anxiety and a determination to do his duty as a landed proprietor, and therefore to set to work to learn his business. (Laughter and applause.) He first consulted that eminent drainer and foremost friend of agriculture, Mr. Smith, of Deanston. (Loud cheers.) The feeling of the district was against him; but that he did not care much about. (Laughter.) He persevered in his course, and was now happy to find so many others pursuing it, and acting upon the system so well recommended by the worthy Patron and President. (Applause.) He would add his testimony to theirs, and say that no drain should be allowed under 30 inches; and, like them, he was not sure that that was deep enough.”

This is learning the business of a landlord, and doing it to some purpose. Some one had hinted that Mr. Wharton would have obtained the premium for “the leanest beast on the ground,” had such a prize been offered, in reference to which he said:

“As to the exhibition of stock, he did believe he was fully entitled, at the very least, to what the judges had awarded him. (Laughter.) He had often thought that holders of stock were too shy of sending their cattle for competition, and he had determined therefore to set them an example, and send to the show-field every animal he had. (Laughter and cheers.) He hoped to be more successful another year. At present he could not say much for the pasturage in the parish of Skelton (laughter); but when the land was drained there would be better keep, and he trusted he would be able to show something better. (Cheers.)”

And Mr. Wharton’s notion of what a cattle show ought to be is not far wrong. It ought to be a fair specimen of the farmer’s stock, not a mere picked specimen which he has perhaps brought for the purpose, and pampered for a year or two, while the rest of his stock has been but poorly fed.

At some shows, we believe it is so at Smithfield, there is a prize for cattle which have nothad oilcake, meal, grains, and so forth, the object being to have grass-fed animals shown (of what use such a restriction may be we don’t presume to guess)—and how is this accomplished? Why, in addition to grass, the prize beast has often the cream from several cows given daily.

And there is another reason why farmers should show a good many of their stock, viz., the worst sometimes get the prize. We heard lately an instance of the kind. We need not tell our readers that a keen competition exists amongst the breeders of sheep; and to men who let their rams for 30, 40, and 50 guineas for a season, it is of much importance to carry off the prizes at the great cattle-shows. If they fail, it is immediately said their flock is going down. Now, a celebrated breeder of Southdowns in Cambridgeshire, in selecting several lots of sheep to be shown at the late meeting of the Royal Agricultural Society at Shrewsbury, was about to put back one lot so decidedly inferior to the other lots as not to be worth sending, but was persuaded to send them in case of accident. The rejected lot obtained a first class prize, and the better sheep were unnoticed!!!

We have often said, the fair, or the market, is the best cattle show, and that is the place in which the best practical farmers strive for pre-eminence.

Mr. Mauleverer afterwards made the following allusion to the cheap feeding of stock, that its quantity might be increased.

“With respect to the feeding of stock, to which attention had been directed by the worthy President and Mr. Wharton, there could be no doubt the English farmer had been going on like a spendthrift. The land would rear and feed far more cattle than it was allowed to do. Look at, he would not say the alarming, but certainly the serious imports of stock. (A cry of ‘Oh!’) Within the last year or two, there had been an increase in the imports to the extent of 800 per cent. The effect might be little felt as yet, but the imports would pinch the home breeder by and bye. His only defence was to feed faster than at present—with boiled linseed, mixed with meal, and beans, and chopped straw and turnips, &c. Mr. Marshall, of Bedale, and Mr. Warrnes, of Norfolk, with whom he had been in correspondence, did so, and at only half the expense incurred by the ordinary method.”

It is curious to remark how contemptuously the alarmist reference of Mr. Mauleverer to the “cattle tariff” panic was received by the farmers.

Whilst amongst the Yorkshire men, let us hear what a shrewd Yorkshire landholder says of the “simplest duties of a landlord,” and their method of performing them. At the Richmond Agricultural Meeting, held about three weeks ago, Wm. Lister, Esq., said:

“He attended a large meeting of this county, where toast after toast was given by the landlords, and in the speeches that were made he heard little or nothing of the duties of landlords, whilst he heard it continually impressed upon the tenant farmer that he was to cultivate his mind scientifically, and educate his children, and give higher wages to agricultural labourers. All that was very good, but he should have liked the landlord to have impartially stated his duties. (APPLAUSE.) The landlord should have borne in mind that many of the tenant farmers could not carry on their farms; he should drain their soil, improve their fields, and in some instances shelter their property. The landlords met on that occasion ought to have stated impartially their duties as well as impress upon the tenant farmers what they should do. If he might be allowed to offer an opinion—it was perhaps a bold one, and might be condemned—he certainly thought that the labourer and tenant farmer were individually as well able to fulfil their duties as the landlords; and if generally landlords would pay more attention to their estates, that is, the practical management of them, it would be much better for the nation. He could not help hearing and observing these very usual remarks from landlords, and he believed their intentions were good, but many of them were not able to do one practical thing. There were many bright exceptions, but generally they were not able to manage their estates, and what was the consequence? They very often chose men as agents who were not able to manage either—money was spent without care and knowledge, and bad results ensued. He thought Mr. Colborne had spoken well, if he had not misunderstood him; he (Mr. Colborne) had told them the farming interest was not well supported in the House of Commons, by which he supposed Mr. Colborne meant they were not practical men, and were not so competent as the practical men of the manufacturing interest. (APPLAUSE.) He (Mr. Lister) believed that was one great cause why the House of Commons did not listen to the agricultural members so readily as the manufacturing members, because they are not acquainted with the practical workings of agriculture. He wished to drink the health of the tenant farmers with that honour which they deserved.”

And Mr. Outhwaite, a farmer, in reply to the toast, said:

“He thought with Mr. Lister that the tenant farmers had not been looked after in Parliament as they ought to have been; but he did not go the whole length with him respecting the want of knowledge in landowners and their agents. Many landlords allow their tenants to do as they like; whilst others would only allow them to do certain things, much to the injury of the tenant. Lord Feversham had acted in that way; so had Lord Bolton, but his restrictions were broken through now. Lord Powlett has been asking the landed proprietors if it would be beneficial to the tenant farmers to be allowed to sow a rotation of bean crops instead of growing clover, and has allowed his tenants to do so; but he (Mr. Outhwaite) did not think Lord Feversham had yet altered his system. At all meetings of this description it was often said that farms would let well, if only the landowners would allow them to sow such crops as they thought proper.”

PREPARATION FOR COMING EVENTS.

It is satisfactory to find that the landowners in all directions are preparing themselves for Free Trade. We believe that the more sensible of them are heartily ashamed of their former advocacy of protection, and we are convinced that they will, when the change has come, be still more so. Instances of the sort are to be found at nearly every agricultural meeting, from which we have culled a few specimens. At the Preston Association, Mr. Talbot Clifton, M.P., said

“It was undeniable that great improvements were going on, though not so rapidly, perhaps, as could be wished; yet though slow, they were on that account, probably, the more sure and permanent. He attributed these improvements mainly to the landlords, who appeared to be preparing for what might happen, and which was likely to be for the worst.”

At the Hollywell Farming Society in Flintshire, Sir Richard Bulkeley said:

“Being zealously devoted to agricultural pursuits, their welfare was concurred with his own, and the general prosperity of agriculture must be the first impulse in all their hearts. A legislative change must be looked forward to, of this there could be no doubt; and whatever opinions might prevail, that change could not be looked upon without anxiety. He felt that anxiety in common with others; yet that anxiety was rather akin to hope than to dismay. (CHEERS.) He of course alluded to a contemplated change in the Corn Laws (unrenewed cheers). That change demanded, on their parts, increased energy in every thing connected with the cultivation of the soil.

Now there is no mistaking this warning, and the way in which it was received is a significant sign of the IMPORTANT COMMERCIAL INTELLIGENCE.—We have just received a communication from an esteemed correspondent at Karlsruhe, on whose means of information we can place every reliance. He announces the most gratifying intelligence that the Zollverein tariff is at length finished, and will speedily be made public. He is a good German, and seems to recognize our advantages, for he says, the duties on British manufactures are not raised at all on any one article of the least importance; indeed, only on one or two, and trifling ones, is needed. He speaks of the national feeling for us, under his article, the Zollverein, as "what disappointed," because there are, so he felt, in Germany as elsewhere, thoughtful people, who suppose the liberties of commerce with this country are not granted, and thus create us our own artificial tariff. However, a national feeling, even of enmity, now exceedingly gratifying—M. Irving Herald

REVIEW.

Credit, the Life of Commerce; being a Defence of the British Merchant against the unjust and demoralising tendency of the recent Alterations in the Laws of Debtor and Creditor, with an Outline of Remedial Measures. 12mo. pp. 220. London. Madden and Makohn.

In the Newgate Calendar, some 60 years ago, may be seen the picture of a bankrupt, hanged in Smithfield, for cheating his creditors. Within the last two years one Bromley, a distinguished attorney, and as distinguished a bankrupt, after a career of magnificent misappropriation, received a gentle reproof, and was discharged from the Court! During the period marked by these extremes, rapid changes have been made in our Insolvency Laws; and from having been most cruelly vindictive, they have become as cruelly indulgent. An enlightened people neither require the one nor the other; but they require just laws, which shall punish duly all evildoers, protect commerce, not against either home or foreign competition, but against dishonest adventurers, and shall secure to all men the fruits of their industry. The extreme insecurity of all commercial transactions, especially in retail, caused by the various Acts of Lord Brougham, excited a more general discussion during the present year than the subject of insolvency had ever before undergone. Among the various productions that are now before us, "Credit, the Life of Commerce," is perhaps the most elaborate, while it is at the same time most suited to the popular reader. The author is "a merchant," and he attempts to develop only the principles of commercial law; but being "not a lawyer," he presumes not to meddle with the details of law process. Just such an inquiry has long been wanted, wherein to set forth the claims of commercial transactions to protection, and to expose the common fallacies with which the matter has been encumbered. Mr. Elliott has certainly turned up new ground; his propositions are startling, and sometimes a little paradoxical; and we therefore give their substance without comment. The author claims for property existing in the necessary shape of debt that protection which political economists have required for property in general, and which they have shown is indispensable for the purposes of civilisation. Mr. Elliott maintains that:

"It is hardly possible to exaggerate the influence over happiness, of those laws which govern the relations of debtor and creditor. On these depend, in a great degree, the moral relations of nearly all the people, but especially of that most important section, the middle class; whose very existence must gradually dissolve away, when their industry, frugality, and probity, and the visible product thereof—their property—are debilitated, discouraged, and openly exposed to waste and destruction, by the laws of the country in which they live. Without complete protection in these respects, those who now compose the middle class must soon lose their nobler attributes, and fall into that murky multitude of poor, and destitute, and desperate persons, whose increasing numbers and social disorganisation are already a source of painful alarm to the statesman and philanthropist; and who, without any impulse from that body, (the middle class,) hitherto antagonistic, will soon attain an acme of suffering that will burst through, as gossamer threads, all the gentle influences of religion, state education, or Free Trade. Between these and the privileged orders, the aristocracy, stands as yet the middle class."

In opposition to the prevailing opinions, it is maintained that

"Credit is an indispensable thing in a civilised country, it is the second mark, indeed, of civilisation. That people may transfer themselves from one end of the land to the other, the poor, the weak, and the defenceless, even women and children, with the utmost confidence and security, is the first mark of civilisation. This is already attained with such perfection, that had any philosopher in the first or second century after the Norman conquest, indicated the almost boundless and absolute security of liberty that the people of England now enjoy, going about, yet entirely unarmed, trusting nothing to their own powers of self-defence, not at all dreaming that they must be always vigilant themselves, but trusting entirely to the laws and to the officers of the law, for which they pay; such an indication of the first mark of civilisation would have been clamoured down as an idle dream. Then would it have been said, 'Great men, surrounded with all the instruments of protection which wealth can purchase, may be safe; but as for the rest of the nation, poor people, they cannot obtain nor must they expect the protection of the law; they are not worth protecting; the machinery is too costly for them.' Thank God such a dream has in our day been realised! That people should transfer their property, the products of human ingenuity and toil, from one end of the country to the other, either the largest or smallest parcels thereof, with the utmost confidence and security, is the second mark of civilisation. Amid the fear and doubt, the ruin and disaster, that people now-a-days endure, in consequence of an invasion of their laws, scarcely less furious than the Norman invasion itself, any poor philosopher would be called a dreamer, who should declare, that property in all its states might enjoy the same absolute security, if proper means were employed. That the time will come, when people need not be told, that they must trust to their own vigilance and alertness, but that they will repose confidence in the laws, and the officers of the law, for whose services they pay, and that rents and taxes and masses of wealth protected by such curious securities, will not be deemed more deserving, nor more capable of receiving protection, than the 'petty debts' of a mechanic. England must be very quiet about her civilisation, until she renders human men's property as secure as she has rendered humble men's lives."

It is then insisted, that no debts, however small, should be considered beneath protection; and as the need of obtaining the money or the goods of another on credit is incessantly occurring, Mr. McCulloch is declared to be wrong, who, in his article Credit (see "Dictionary of Commerce"), could prevent the contracting of all small debts by denying to the creditor legal powers of recovery; that is to say, he would uphold powerful monopolies by denying to all but rich merchants and large dealers the privilege of obtaining the commodities they deem they require, giving in exchange their "word-of-mouth promise to pay," an instrument of currency as indispensable (and indeed more so) in a civilised country as corn or bank-notes; for what is a bank-note but a written promise to pay, issued by some publicly known person—an instrument many worthy persons cannot obtain, but whose "word-of-mouth promise" may be as safe, and may deserve to circulate within their narrow circle of reputation with as much confidence, and which, if it is not to be so circulated—that is, if the receivers thereof are not to be protected against all who wilfully and knowingly utter base promises, then are all persons in humble life denied the blessings of civilisation; they are refused the privilege of contracting a debt, and are put in a state of outlawry. It is said, people need not get into debt; Mr. Elliott, on the contrary, maintains that they have as much need of contracting a debt as they have of going in and out of doors; and illustrates this by a number of facts drawn from various affairs of life of every class; and that petty debts are no more to be outlawed than petty persons or children, whose lives the law as strongly protects as it does those of the most important and distinguished men. Again, men cannot protect themselves against dishonest or extravagant insolvents any more than they can protect themselves against forgers or coiners whom the law seizes and punishes, and does not say to the injured person, "You should have used more discretion, and not have parted with your goods or your change for such a note; your carelessness encourages dishonesty, and the accused must be discharged," which is what the law does say commonly in the complaint against an insolvent debtor. By an exposition of the errors of the Commissioners' Report of 1840, and by some remarkable returns obtained from various Courts of Request, the efficacy of imprisonment for debt in persuading reluctant debtors to pay is but too clearly made out. Creditors are defended against the vulgar accusation of being vindictive and rapacious, against whom debtors require protection; on the contrary, they are declared to be too lax and indulgent, and too often tolerate conduct which they ought to punish.* The Report of 1840, though the fact is adduced for a contrary purpose, shows that out of 1679 persons who had been arrested in six months, 1147, or nearly three-fourths, were discharged unopposed, the creditor or creditors having tried coercion up to the point of putting their debtors in prison, usually but for a few days, and then allowing them to obtain their discharge as a matter of course.

Wilful insolvency is declared to be not merely a private wrong, as heretofore assumed, but a public wrong, just as is forgery or theft, because it renders property insecure; weakens the motives to the exercise of industry and frugality; prevents people from obtaining credit when they most need it; and in a time of difficulty and misfortune, leaves them no chance or hope, but casts them at once among thieves or paupers. The following in reference to the Dutch laws, (which though much more stringent and salutary than ours, do not allow of constraint of the person for debts contracted for food &c.) seems not easy of contraction:

"The effects of this are not so humane as they are intended to be. If bread debts are not as securely protected as wine debts, bread cannot be so readily obtained on credit as wine. But it is more desirable to enable men to obtain bread (without which they cannot exist) on credit than wine. If men who have no ready money cannot obtain bread on credit, the blow is at once struck, they must perish, which they will not submit to, or they will on the instant become paupers or thieves; in a week or a month something may happen: surely a little breathing time may as well be allowed, because at worst they then become only imprisoned debtors, instead of paupers or imprisoned thieves. To which may be added their second chance, that their creditors will not imprison them. All experience shows that insolvents

19th JULY, 1845.
Name of Insolvent.	Number of Creditors.	Number of Creditors who had sued.
Doyle	61	8

The extreme improbability of being sued makes men leave by, under a better system, would not honestly. Moderate punishment is a kindness."

are less closely followed up than thieves. To protect a bread debt is, therefore, most humane, since it clearly diminishes the number of paupers and thieves. Take one hundred persons in destitution, the whole hundred must become thieves or paupers; there is no middle course; but protect debts, and sixty of them may contract a debt, forty may recover and pay; of the other twenty, not more than ten may be imprisoned by their creditors. Under one set of circumstances destitution has one hundred victims; under the other, but fifty. While there is life there is hope. Nothing is more cruel in its consequences than misplaced humanity."

The causes of wilful insolvency are said to be—Idleness, especially the not keeping books of accounts. Extravagance, especially in domestic expenditure. Gambling, which is not confined to games of hazard, but is made to include commercial speculation, there being more gambling on the Stock Exchange, or in Mincing-lane than on the turf, or at Crockford's, the results of which are highly injurious to the community; they divert attention from the steady plodding course of industry; stop the transit of commodities from producer to consumer; and raise their price, and cause a toll to be levied on them for the advantage of the non-producer—the speculator—at the expense of the public. When men become insolvent through speculation, they are in a high degree delinquents. Dishonesty is the fourth and most flagrant cause of wilful insolvency. The result of the inquiry is thus set forth:

1. Credit must be, or commerce cannot be; and without it no civilisation. All transactions have a claim to credit, from the milk-score or the newspaper-bill, to the state loan. Therefore the whole of such transactions, with regard to magnitude, have a claim to protection.
2. Broken credit or insolvency is a wrong—a public as well as a private wrong.
3. Insolvency is commonly, but not universally, a voluntary or wilful wrong.
4. Wilful wrong is punishment-worthy, because
5. The fear of punishment constrains men in their conduct with respect to wilful wrongs.
6. Involuntary wrong is not punishment-worthy, because men cannot be restrained thereby.
7. Wilful insolvency is a wrong, punishment-worthy, and will be duly punished in all virtuous and civilised countries, because wilful insolvency is more or less preventable, according to the due pressure of law-sanctions.

PROCEDURE.
1. Allow and assist any man (the creditor) to accuse any other man (the debtor), but at his peril, of having done him the wrong of not paying a just and due debt; just as any man is allowed and assisted (but at his peril) to accuse any other man of having done him any other kind of injury.

2. Bring the accused before the magistrate—time and manner at the discretion of the accuser, but within the limits of prescribed forms—to inquire: 1. Truth of the accusation; 2. Explanation of accused; can he pay the debt, and will he; or if not, why not? 3. Being able, he may have good reason for not paying the debt; on which issue is joined. 4. Or he may be unable by reason of any of the before-named causes, combined or not, called voluntary or involuntary. 5. During inquiry the debtor must be held to bail, or kept in safe custody, or by any the easiest means that can be devised, be held to be forthcoming, to give from time to time what explanations are needed, that he may not escape with or without property, and that he may receive what punishment the inquiry may show to be due to his offence, if it be a wilful one.

3. Concurrently with this, means must be employed to obtain possession of debtors' property of all kinds for the benefit of creditors.

4. Proceedings having been commenced (or information laid) by one creditor, the detention of the debtor, and the subsequent inquiry shall be for the protection of all the creditors (if more than one), as is now in bankruptcy.

5. The issue of the inquiry will determine the nature of the insolvency; if involuntary, the insolvent must be treated as an unfortunate person, and discharged. It must be a cruel code that would hurt such a man, and which I for one abhor.

6. If a wilful insolvent, the liability to punishment should depend on the amount of dividend, modified by the cause or causes already examined, and classed in the order of their intensity of wrong.

The amount of dividend will, generally, be an index of the cause of insolvency; the rogue paying a smaller dividend than the gambler or the idler.

Such a rule will be useful to the whole debtor class, as well as creditor class. A man will be urged to pursue that very course which is so conducive to his own security. He will keep proper books, watched and balanced, and will stop early in his career, and not persevere, hoping against hope, until all his creditors' property as well as his own is gone.

Facilitate cessio bonorum; but this is no bar against punishment: he who surrenders himself, if a knave, is still to be tried and punished. But a prompt surrender will tend to render those whom he has injured less hostile, and to induce them to assist him in a new effort; for, strange as it may appear to the superficial in these matters, the creditors whom an insolvent has just injured, are those amongst whom he must look for his best friends; if he obtain credit again, it will be from them, not from strangers. It is something, far the law to place such antagonistic parties in the least hostile, or the most friendly relation to one another."

Though by no means so severe in many respects as is that of some European nations, the author's code of punishment is stringent. This could not fairly be set before our readers without in their minds were prepared by the facts and reasonings in the body of the book. The writer thinks that a little suffering must be endured, if by it the great and increasing evil of insolvency can be curtailed. Insolvency, according to Mr. Elliott, is the beginning of a sad career, which too often ends in pauperism, forgery, or some other dreadful crime. It is as much the interest of the debtor as of the creditor class that economical and good business habits should be enforced; and experience too painfully proves that men are not to be restrained without law and law-sanctions. The law is the greatest of schoolmasters. Lord Brougham should think of this in his law reforms—if, indeed, he have time to think of anything.

Without yielding implicit adherence to all the opinions of Mr. Elliott, we do not hesitate to say that his book deserves the attention of mercantile men.

POSTSCRIPT.

LONDON, Saturday Morning, October 25, 1845.

The probable opening of the ports by an Order in Council has been the chief subject of discussion during the week, and it seems to be generally admitted that recourse must be had to this remedy if the accounts of the failure of the potato crop in Ireland are confirmed. A leading article on the subject, in the Standard of Thursday evening, has excited much attention not only from the semi-official character of that journal, but from the tone of authority which pervades the article itself. Independent of these characteristics there is, in the supposed manifesto, such a strange blending of right with wrong,—such a mixture of honest confession and daring misrepresentation—such large admissions on one hand and such gross perversion of facts on the other, that it well merits notice as a curiosity in logic and literature. Having given a survey of the extent of the potato disease, and glanced at some of the remedies proposed, the writer says:

"The ultimate consideration, however—that to which all other considerations must give place—is the duty of the State to ensure that not one of the Queen's subjects shall perish from famine. In the discharge of this duty, statesmen must not fear to venture upon anomalies, however violent and daring; for anomalous dangers must be met by anomalous remedies. Sir Robert Peel, we are convinced, is not the statesman to shrink from the most urgent of all a statesman's duties—the preservation of the lives of his fellow-citizens; he is not the man to allow considerations of expense, or of uniformity of system, or to allow his Ministerial responsibility to stand in the way of the protection of the people from famine. Should it prove necessary, as we trust it will not, Sir Robert, we are persuaded, will not hesitate to suspend the Corn Laws, as has been suggested by more than one journal; nay, the case requiring it, a good and a bold Minister would not scruple to award a bounty upon the importation of foreign grain, extravagantly impolitic as such a measure would be for permanent operation. In the supposed case of a very great deficiency in the potato-crop, it seems pretty plain that a suspension of the Corn Laws ought to be resorted to, cruelly as such suspension would weigh upon the agricultural body, already sufferers in a greater degree than their fellow-subjects by the calamity calling for it. It is true that when grain arrives at a certain price, not a very high price, to those accustomed to subsist on grain, the Corn Laws are self-suspended; but the failure of the potato-crop augments the number of consumers of grain by the addition of millions too poor to consume it at its ordinary price, or they would not subsist upon potatoes; and therefore much too poor to purchase it at that higher price at which the Corn Laws cease to operate."

The duty of the state becomes imperative on those who administer power, when they have taken upon themselves the responsibility of regulating the supply of food; they are accountable for every life lost in consequence of their artificial restrictions. The dangers are anomalous, because they have resulted from an interference with the operations of nature and the laws of Providence; a temporary remedy may suffice for the present exigency, but who is to secure us against its recurrence?

But while the Standard strenuously argues for the suspension of the Corn Laws, at the present crisis, it labours hard to prove that the maintenance of those laws hitherto not only have had no share in producing the prospective calamity, but that they have tended to diminish both its intensity and amount. To establish this strange position, he asserts that the stock of corn in this country is greater than it would have been, under a system of Free Trade; and secondly, that the Corn Laws have diminished the use of potatoes, as an article of staple food for the population. Now the first assertion is so purely gratuitous, that we feel almost ashamed at being obliged to meet it with a reply. So long as Holland had a free trade in corn, the warehouses of Amsterdam had always large stocks in store to meet any contingency; but will the Standard calculate the amount of reserved stock in the stores of England? It is not so much on the import of wheat as on that of the inferior grains, that these restrictive laws act most injuriously. Wheat is the growth of temperate climes, the inferior grain is most abundant in warmer regions. Maize, or Indian corn, which could be had in abundance from America, the Mediterranean, and the Atlantic islands, has been in effect excluded from our ports; and vessels laden with it in any one of our harbours would be prevented from landing any portion of it, even if starvation raged on the shore. In fact, the operation of the Corn Laws has led to the very reverse of the results ascribed to them by the Standard; they have prevented the accumulation of stock, for they have forced sales at home, and prevented importation from abroad.

The second point urged by the writer, that the Corn-Laws have tended to check the use of potatoes as a staple provision for the people, may be answered by an appeal to the experience of any person of middle age. Are potatoes in a greater or less degree the food of the labouring population than they were thirty years ago? There is not a man who has reached the age of forty, who does not know that the labourers have every year used less and less of bread, and more and more of "the famine root." The Standard seems to think that a corn-growing, must, of necessity, be a corn-fed country; and, led away by this supposed identity, favours us with this singular specimen of inconclusive reasoning:

"The great objection, however, to a potato diet, as the staple diet of a people, is that now so painfully felt—the uncertainty of the crop. This uncertainty is no novelty in Ireland. Since potatoes became the staple food of the peasantry in that island—little more than a century, by the way—scarcely five years have passed without a famine, arising from the deficiency of the crop, visiting one or other considerable division of the island. This never happens in any corn-fed country of the temperate zone. Corn crops are uncertain, it is true, but then as corn will keep from year to year, and as it is easily transportable from place to place at little cost, the surplus of one year or one country is always at hand to supply the deficiency in another year or another country; by consequence a famine in a corn-fed and corn-growing country is, humanly speaking, almost an impossibility, while in potato-fed countries periodical famines are as certain as the revolution of the seasons."

The Standard has just reversed the laws of cause and effect. The corn-fed population will stimulate the production of corn by creating a demand for that kind of food. To preserve that balance, which the Standard itself describes as the perfection of a system of supply, the corn-fed country must have the means of receiving and storing the surplus necessary to counteract the effect of possible failures, and this is precisely the wise provision which the Corn Laws render impossible.

Whatever may be the ultimate result of the potato crop in Ireland, and the consequent determination of the ministers as to the opening of the ports, we are persuaded that the discussions to which both uncertainties have given rise, must greatly accelerate the doom of the Corn Laws. Sir Robert Peel's position as a statesman at this moment must be too painful to be endured with equanimity; and no Englishman capable of reflection can contemplate the condition of his country, without feeling it to be as humiliating to national pride as it is dangerous to national prosperity.

On Tuesday evening next, a GREAT LEAGUE MEETING will be held in the FREE TRADE HALL, MANCHESTER, which will be addressed by Mr. Cobden, Mr. Bright, and other leading advocates of Free Trade. The critical circumstances of the times will no doubt render this demonstration one of peculiar interest, and rouse the Free Traders of South Lancashire to an attitude of preparation commensurate with the importance and magnitude of coming emergencies. At this crisis of our struggle, a grave responsibility devolves upon the Free Traders of Manchester; and we feel confident that they will nobly vindicate the urgent requirements of the time by an overwhelming demonstration of unsubdued earnestness and determination.

GEORGE HUDSON, ESQ., M.P., AND THE ELECTORS OF SUNDERLAND.

Holy Writ records that the selfish silversmiths of Ephesus collected the citizens together that they might join for an hour in shouting, "Great is Diana, the Goddess of the Ephesians!" Similar examples of interested and unmeaning eulogy applied to dumb and to speaking idols may be found in every country and in every time, and if the objects of such adulation possess either the sense or the modesty to estimate such exhibitions at anything near their real worth, the world is generally sufficiently generous to leave them to enjoy their temporary glorification, until time has fixed their deserts at their proper level. Mr. George Hudson has not used this wise discretion; he has not only set himself forward to claim the tribute of public homage as a public man, but he has assailed the motives of other men, and has, therefore, challenged a comparison which ordinary prudence would have taught him to avoid.

Mr. Hudson has ventured to characterise the League as a selfish body; can he point out any one of its members to whom selfishness can be attributed? Which of them has made half a million of money by his agitation? Their sacrifices of time, health, and money, in endeavouring to effect a great national object, are notorious; but where are the profits, to support the charge of selfishness? In his railway agitation, Mr. Hudson professes to be actuated by pure and patriotic principles; but "doth Job serve God for nought?" We have neither the right nor the inclination to enter into the results of any person's private speculations, so long as he conducts those speculations in his private capacity; but if any man sets himself up as a public character, and claims public rewards, he must not hope to escape public responsibility. It is Mr. Hudson's own affair to determine whether he has exercised a wise discretion in courting such responsibility; but he makes it imperative on the world to institute investigations when he provokes comparisons.

Having endorsed the calumnies of his rather notorious chairman, Mr. Wright, he has the hardihood to charge with selfishness a body of men, any one of whom may well challenge comparison with Mr. Hudson in honour, intelligence, and integrity. He must not be surprised if men begin to contrast the agitation of a railway speculator with that of a member of the Anti-Corn Law League. Is he prepared for such a result? As a public man—boasting of his personal performances as grounds for public confidence—he cannot demand privacy for any of his transactions. He had better be quiet, if his vanity will permit him to hold his tongue.

It is easy to calumniate the absent and the undefended. Surrounded by parasites and expectants he may

"Like Cato give his little senate laws,
And sit attentive to his own applause;"

But there is a different arena in which his powers remain to be tested. He is now a Member of the Legislature; and on the floor of the House of Commons he will find Free Traders ready and willing to defend the League. The encounter will take place before an audience very different from those to which he has been accustomed, and the weapons of debate must be still more different from those with which his public speeches hitherto have shown him to be familiar. A little more mistrust of his own powers, a less ostentatious display of information—the most shallow, conveyed in forms not the most elegant—would be better training for a legislative career, than the course of instruction to be obtained under the presidency of Mr. Wright. The Normal school of oratory in which Mr. Hudson has entered himself as a pupil, and where he appears to have made some proficiency, is one which dispenses with argument, and covers lack of reason by hardihood of assertion. If he would avoid the ridicule and disgrace which is sure to overwhelm the proficients in such eloquence, he should pause for reflection, if he is capable of exercising that faculty. Above all things, he should endeavour to cultivate his modesty, if he perchance possesses any undeveloped stores of that virtue.

RAILROADS VERSUS MONOPOLY.—We foresee very clearly too, that the development of railroads in England will ultimately destroy the landlords' monopoly. A powerful interest is now rising up to compete with the landlords' class interest; this new interest being almost entirely dependent on the prosperity of trade and commerce. And when it finds that it cannot thrive unless trade be free, then away will go the restrictive monopolies of the landlords for ever.—Leeds Times.

INCENDIARISM IN CAMBRIDGESHIRE.—We are very much concerned to state that two more incendiary fires occurred in the village of Waterbeach last Thursday night.—Cambridge Chronicle.—On Monday morning the neighbourhood of Gamlingay was thrown into the utmost state of alarm by the discovery of a fire on the premises of Mr. Payne, called Brocken, in the village, which we understand extended to nearly the whole of the corn stacks and farm buildings. At 10 o'clock on Monday morning the fire was blazing fearfully. We have not received the particulars of the catastrophe, but there is no doubt as to its origin.—Cambridge Independent.

EPITOME OF NEWS.

FOREIGN.

FRANCE.—The Moniteur Parisien of Monday night had an article which intimated that Marshal Soult had been prevailed upon to forego his intention to withdraw from the Ministry. To the management of the king this change was attributed, but we are assured, that "the withdrawal of the Marshal from the Cabinet was only postponed on a representation that it might possibly break up the Ministry, or, at least, add to the alarm on the Bourse, already sufficiently great."—The run upon the savings-bank of Paris continued. The deposits received at this establishment on Sunday and Monday, the 19th and 20th inst., amounted to 621,785*f*. The sums withdrawn during the same period amounted to 1,090,770*f*. A desire to obtain a higher rate of interest for their money, by placing it in railroad undertakings, is the only motive assigned in our private letter for this proceeding on the part of depositors.—The Constitutionnel quotes a letter from Oran of the 10th instant, stating that on the 3d, General Cavaignac had not yet been able to relieve the garrison of Djennah Ghazouat, which was still besieged by the Arabs. The inhabitants of Nedroma had been kept in constant alarm ever since the small column of Colonel Barral had fallen back upon the division of General Cavaignac, and had called for assistance. They declared that unless speedily relieved, they would be obliged to surrender to Abd-el-Kader, in order to obtain favourable conditions from him. Communications between Oran and the interior were interrupted by the insurgents, and along the coast by the bad weather.—The Journal des Débats has a long article on the distressing accounts from Ireland. Our contemporary thinks it impossible under such circumstances that Sir Robert Peel will venture any longer to bolster up the Corn Laws.—The Moniteur publishes a royal ordinance authorising the calling out of 14,000 recruits of the class of 1844 to join the army. The expenses of the new expedition against Abd-el-Kader will amount to at least 20 millions of francs.

COMMERCIAL TREATY.—It is stated that the commercial treaty between France and Belgium, about to expire, will be renewed by royal ordinance for one year, the existing duties remaining without modification.

SPAIN.—THE CONScription.—The Government has ordered another contingent conscription to be levied in Catalonia. It appears that the quota corresponding to the year 1843 has not been filled up, and the Government now demand its completion. It would be difficult to describe the sensation produced here by this order. The deepest state of excitement has existed for several months past, as I detailed to you in my communications, and it now assumes a deeper and more dangerous character, because it begins to be universally believed that the Navarez administration is resolved to measure its strength with Catalonia, and force on them all those measures which have been so long obnoxious to the province. The new contributory system is being opposed at every step, and all the dispositions of the local authorities to carry it out have been successively evaded, and collectors cannot be procured, even at a considerable remuneration, because the passive resistance plan has been brought to act in all the details of the measure. The conviction beginning to be felt that the Government had seriously taken into consideration the question of tariff duties and prohibitions on cotton goods, with a view to the repeal of the one and a modification of the other, awakened fresh discontent, in which the manufacturers participated, and which they are now preparing to foment with all the influence they are naturally possessed.—Times.

HOLLAND.—The King opened the session of the states on Monday. By the annual revenue accounts just published, there is a deficit of nearly 548,000 florins, 226,572 florins of this amount being caused by the reduction of the duty on corn.

GERMANY.—Letters from various parts of Germany speak of a financial crisis as inevitable, and state that several failures to a large amount are expected. At Leipzig some failures have already been announced, but the amount is not stated.

JAMAICA.—The weather, since the departure of the last steamer, has continued extremely dry, and in most of the lowland parishes the drought has been so severe as to threaten serious injury to the ensuing crop, unless the early setting in of the October seasons should happily rescue it from peril.—The House of Assembly has been convened for the 21st October, and one of the principal measures which will come before it for legislation, will be the question of immigration.—Jamaica Dispatch of Sept. 23.

INDIA.—An extraordinary express of the Herald brings intelligence from Calcutta, September 8th, and Bombay, September 15th. Much disaster and misery has been caused in the country to the west of Calcutta, by the inundations which have lately prevailed. The indigo crop has suffered considerably. The news from China is not important.

DOMESTIC.

The excellent and philanthropic Mrs. Fry, so long and so deservedly known for her labours in ameliorating and improving the condition, and elevating the characters of female criminals, as well as for her munificent liberality, died on Tuesday last week, after a protracted illness.

The report of the death of Lieut. Col. Mitchell under peculiar circumstances, which appeared in the metropolitan journals last week, turns out to be a hoax.

Sir Robert Peel arrived on Tuesday last at his seat, Drayton Manor, where he has been passing the remainder of the week, surrounded by several scientific and agricultural friends and gentlemen of eminence. It is currently reported that the Premier is about to set the laudable example to all extensive landed proprietors and tenants of an entire drainage of all lands requiring it on his own estates, on the new, economical, and effective system recommended in the reports of the influential association. We regret to state that Sir Francis Lawley's absence from this important social meeting was occasioned by indisposition.—Birmingham Gazette.

An alarming fire broke out on the night of Monday last on the farm of Mr. Charles Machin, at Erlington. Information was immediately forwarded to this town, and the engines from the various fire offices having been despatched to the spot, the flames were quickly subdued. The fire is supposed to have been the act of an incendiary, and a reward of 50 guineas has been offered for the apprehension of the offender.—Birmingham paper.

Saturday Mr. Payne went into an inquiry at the Crown, Brompton street, touching the death of John Conolly, aged 35, a dentist. Latterly the deceased had suffered a good deal from nightmare. On Friday evening he went home rather depressed in spirits, and retired to rest at a quarter to 10. His companion, Samuel McMahon, who slept in the same bed with him, on awaking next morning discovered him apparently lifeless. Believing him at first to have been labouring under some paroxysm of his complaint, he shook him, when he breathed very heavily. A surgeon was immediately sent for, but before his arrival life was extinct. The surgeon was of opinion that death was caused by the breaking of some blood-vessel in the region of the heart, no doubt from the excitement consequent upon nightmare.—Verdict accordingly.

It is rumoured that her Majesty purposes visiting Liverpool next summer. We have made inquiry, and believe that such is the royal intention. Of course much depends on events; but the visit is, under all circumstances, more than probable.—Liverpool Journal.

Advertisements follow each other in succession in the Morning Chronicle, beseeching surveyors to appear. One wants sixty, and offers £5 a day and all expenses.

A collision took place on Monday on the North Midland Railway, near Bousley. Several of the passengers received severe injuries. An old gentleman was completely jammed between two carriages, while one of his legs hung nearly severed from his body.

On Friday night Mr. Coxhead, well known in the theatrical world, and who, it is said, has lost £15,000 in theatrical speculations, went into a hairdresser's shop in Kennington, where, after he was shaved, he inflicted a dreadful gash across his throat. Surgical assistance was instantly provided, and as soon as the necessary remedies were applied the unfortunate gentleman was conveyed in a cab to his residence in a very hopeless state.

The Repeal Association met at the Conciliation Hall, Dublin, on Monday. The attendance, Mr. O'Connell being present, was better than it had been for some weeks past. Among other topics, Mr. O'Connell mentioned the existence of dissensions among repealers in various parts of the country, which prevented the collection and transmission of "rent" to head quarters. He expressed his intention to visit the disaffected districts, in order to restore union, &c. Among other complaints of the hon. gentleman was one against placing Cromwell's statue in the new Houses of Parliament. The rent for the week was 377*l*. 5*s*. 2*d*.

MARKETS.

CORN MARKET.

MONDAY, OCT. 20.—We have a fair show of Wheat samples by land carriage, and a moderate one coastways; the quality and condition of most of it is only indifferent. With fine weather, the trade is not so brisk as last Monday, but the prices of that day are supported, both for English and free foreign. There is a fair arrival of foreign, which fetches 1*s*. to 2*s*. more money in hand. There are still very scanty supplies of Barley, and most of what arrives is of a coarse quality; there is no alteration in the price of any sort. On the whole we have been pretty well supplied with Oats during the past week, but the previous deficiency, together with an increased alarm respecting the Potato crop, has caused a free sale at 3*s*. to 4*s*. over the prices of this day week. Beans fully as dear, and White Peas 4*s*. dearer than Monday last.

FRIDAY, OCT. 24.—With the exception of Foreign Wheat, of which there is a moderate arrival, the supply of all grain during the week has been scanty. The Wheat trade has notwithstanding been dull, both on Wednesday and this morning. Lower prices are not admitted to, but the amount of business doing has not been extensive. The landed Wheat trade is more buoyant than that for other English or Free foreign. In Barley there is not much stirring, and prices remain the same as on Monday. Beans and Peas are without alteration. Great excitement has prevailed in our market for several days past, caused partly by short supplies and partly by the increase of fears for the safety of the Irish Potato crop, the accounts of which are more alarming from the generally entertained fears as to their keeping in the pits. To day such high prices are asked that none will purchase unless absolutely obliged to do so. Prices of British Oats are 2*s*. to 3*s*. higher than Monday, and for Bonded Corn 3*s*. to 4*s*. advance is asked. These prices have caused speculators to pause, but a good business might be done at fully 1*s*. to 2*s*. over Monday's rates. The duties on Wheat and Peas declined each 1*d*. yesterday. There is no other alteration in the duties.

Account of COIN, &c., arrived in the Port of London, from the 20th of October to the 24th of October, both inclusive.

THE LEAGUE.

No. 110.—VOL. III.]

SATURDAY, NOVEMBER 1, 1845.

[3d.]

NOTICE TO THE PUBLIC.

LEAGUE FUND.

All Subscribers of £1 and upwards to the LEAGUE FUND will be entitled to, and receive, a copy weekly of this publication for twelve months from the date of the receipt of their subscription.

Subscribers of half-a-crown, and under £1, will have forwarded to them a copy of THE LEAGUE, containing an acknowledgment of their subscription; and it is requested that all subscribers will be kind enough to send their names and addresses to the offices of THE LEAGUE, Newall's-buildings, Manchester, or 67, Fleet-street, London.

N.B. As there is considerable risk in the transmission of gold and silver by post, parties wishing to forward small contributions to THE LEAGUE FUND are particularly requested to make their remittances by post-office orders.

The Council of the League would also suggest to their friends in the country the importance of transmitting their copies of THE LEAGUE newspaper, after perusal, to such parties (more especially farmers) as may be either hostile or indifferent to the question of Free Trade.

By order of the Council,

JOSEPH HICKIN, Secretary.

We beg to inform our subscribers that bound volumes of the LEAGUE newspaper, containing the whole of the first year's Numbers, may be had on application at the offices, either in London or Manchester.

OBSERVE!

Samples of good Wheat were sold in Mark Lane on Friday at 74s. per quarter.

The duty on Foreign Wheat is 16s. per qr.

The national expenditure for bread is NOW at the rate of 20 millions a-year, or FOUR HUNDRED THOUSAND pounds weekly MORE than during the whole of last winter and spring.

WHAT WILL SIR ROBERT PEEL DO WHEN PARLIAMENT MEETS?

The profound and breathless interest—qualified only by a sense of quiet, self-relying strength—with which the country now awaits the answer to this question, is itself an answer. Sir Robert Peel will do that which the palpable, overwhelming exigencies of the empire, as interpreted by the voice of the empire—which his own judgment and convictions, echoed back to him by waiting and expecting millions—enforce him to do. He will not higggle and haggle; he will not botch and patch; he will not go tinkering again. This time he will act the statesman. He will get quit, once and for ever, of a responsibility too vast for Minister or man to bear.

For what CAN Sir Robert Peel do? Fixed duty, improved sliding-scale, vanishing scale, or any other conceivable expedient that the genius of compromise itself could suggest, would, one and all, be as diametrically opposed to the Premier's matured and avowed convictions, as they would be shamefully and insultingly inadequate to the necessities and demands of the country. Against "fixed duty," in particular, he is pledged in a way that renders it almost ludicrously "needless," as Lord Ashley would say, "to argue the policy or impolicy of such a change." From his earliest Corn Law speeches to his latest, he has been clear, uniform, and self-consistent on this matter. So far back as April, 1828, he objected entirely to the principle of a fixed duty; for, "in times of scarcity, the duty could not be levied," and he has never missed an occasion since of repeating and enforcing the objection. Thus we find him, on the 3d of April, 1840, urging that "when the price of corn becomes inconveniently high, it may be difficult for a weak, or even for a strong Government to maintain such duty;" and he asks, almost derisively, "would it tend to promote a final settlement of the question?" "In times of scarcity," he continues, "the duty still remaining, would be described as a 'tyrannical impost on the staff of life;' and, as I do not hesitate to say, it must be soon practically removed—and, if removed, I profess myself unable to see how it can be re-imposed." And—not to multiply quotations, for which it is scarcely necessary to give any other reference than "vide Hansard passim"—in his speech at the Tamworth hustings, in June, 1841, we have the pregnant question, so strikingly applicable to the present crisis, "If corn be at 70s. or 80s. a quarter, will it be possible to levy the fixed duty of 8s. a quarter? By whom is it to be taken off? and when? Once off, by whom is it to be laid on again?"

The query is equally decisive now against any conundrum of new pivot, or vanishing scale. The ports once open—and who shall dare to close them by a new Corn Law? "ONCE OFF, BY WHOM IS IT TO BE LAID ON AGAIN?"

Most assuredly, not by Sir Robert Peel. Sir Robert Peel has had enough, by this time, of "regulating" prices and duties. It is enough for him to have failed once. Why, who could tell but that, by this time next year, he would have to ask the Privy Council again to mend his work? How can he expect to succeed better in 1846 than in 1842, in constructing a patent self-acting Corn Law. He cannot take more time for deliberation; he cannot go to work with a better intention of succeeding; and he has derived no new aids from the experience of the intervening years. Experience has not given him new securities against failure, but rather demonstrated its certainty. He did his very best then to make a self-acting Corn Law; he put all his strength into the task; he went on "large and comprehensive views;" he flattered himself that he had succeeded to a nicety in keeping out corn when it is not wanted, and letting it in when it is wanted; and the result is, a prohibitory duty of 16s. a quarter, with scarcity officially declared over half Europe, and gaunt famine menacing one-third of the empire. His clock has every possible excellence—only it won't go, without somebody to keep pushing the hands. It is a most beautiful sliding-scale—only it doesn't slide; the index marks sixteen, when it ought to be at zero. Is it conceivable that this farce should be announced for repetition? Is such a burlesque on Government and legislation endurable? Can any statesman, with a statesman's character to lose, risk a second such failure as that of the Corn Law of 1842?

On more general grounds, we are convinced that there is only one thing which Sir Robert Peel can do. The opening of the ports makes the Corn Law question a res integra; a thing to be dealt with on its merits as an abstract question. The "special circumstances" which the Premier once regarded as modifying the action, and restricting the application of sound abstract views, are swept away by the flood of an overwhelming necessity; and the ground is clear for "sound" and "enlightened" principles. There will be nothing to be said next February of the perils of "innovation"—the dangers of "rash and sudden change." The innovation will then have been established—the change will have been already made. Free Trade will be one of "the existing circumstances of the country." A new Corn Law would then be the "innovation." Prescription and establishment will be at one with abstract principles. What Sir Robert Peel has long believed to be true "in the abstract," he will then find realised in the concrete. Now, will he—can he—meddle with this state of things, otherwise than by legislating for its permanence? Why should he? Will "consistency" exact it from him? That he has had his fears and hesitations about changing from wrong to right—will this be any reason for changing back again from right to wrong, when the right is already established de facto? Can Hansard justify anything so preposterous? Could there be a more outrageous self-contradiction? His work will have been done for him; will he undo it, merely because it has been done not quite in his way? He is irresistibly borne along, with hurried impetuosity, to the goal to which he was leisurely travelling by very easy stages; we may expect to see him a little discomposed and out of breath, but it is perfectly incredible that he should be for retracing his path. Depend upon it, once there, there he will stay. There is nothing in Hansard and "consistency" to bind Sir Robert Peel to create a Corn Law where no Corn Law exists. He has fulfilled his old engagements to landlordism, to the very best of his ability and judgment; and now that nature herself has rescinded the contract, he is a free man again.

In the present circumstances and prospects of this country and of Europe, the re-imposition of a tax on corn would be downright impiety. With scarcity proclaimed over the half of Europe—famine, in its worst form, menacing Ireland—and our people growing at the rate of four hundred thousand per annum, it would be a high crime against God and man to interpose a sixpence of duty between the hunger of an empire and the harvests of the world. We must have all we can get. Let it be as much as it may, it will still be too little. We cannot afford to drive from our shores even that small quantity which a sixpenny duty would cause to be sent elsewhere. Instead of repelling, we must invite. We must instantly set all the husbandry of the world to work, sowing and growing for us. We shall want it all. Sir Robert Peel cannot meditate such an insult to the religious feeling and moral sense of the British people as to ask Parliament, at a time like this, to provide against a possible superabundance of food twelve months hence.

In writing thus confidently of what Sir Robert Peel will and will not do, we assume something over and above Sir Robert Peel's sense of public duty and intelligence of national exigencies: it is for the British people to make good the assumption. We assume that they have already determined what Sir Robert Peel, or any other Minister who may hold office, SHALL do. And we warn them that they must be thus determined. Believe not that Sir Robert Peel either will or can do the right thing without a perfect assurance of the most earnest, hearty, and resolute popular support. It is just possible that monopoly may submit to be snuffed out quietly; but it were most perilous to count on this. We expect it will take a tremendous wrench to tear up this Upas, root and branch; and if we do not make root and branch work of it—if a living slip be left, to be planted and grow again—we shall have bitter cause to repent it. No doubt in the world, Sir Robert Peel would like to be rid of it, and would gladly be the Minister to perform the office. The Premier has avowed himself not indifferent to "posthumous fame," and never did a more enviable posthumous fame glorify the name and memory of a statesman than that which history will award to the emancipator of British commerce and industry. But, if Sir Robert Peel likes posthumous fame, he also likes ease. Make it easy to him. Make it impossible to him to shrink or quail. For this honour on him—of being the Free Trade Minister of the British empire. The opportunity which the needs of the hour offer to him and to us, for a victory that will last while England lasts, is indeed precious, but it may be lost. Only by action and effort—resolute, prompt, and concentrated—can this great occasion be improved into a full and final success.

FAILURE OF THE POTATO-CROP.

We have taken great pains to collect from the Irish papers and from private sources of information on which we can rely, the extent of the failure of the potato crop in Ireland. The disease is described by the Government commissioners as "an enemy whose history and habits are yet but imperfectly known." The following facts, however, have been ascertained:

1. The superior kinds of potatoes have not been tainted in the same proportion as those of inferior qualities, and when symptoms of the taint are discovered on them, the progress of the disease appears capable of being arrested.

2. The disease frequently exists where there is no external appearance on the skin; potatoes that have been housed in Cork, Waterford, and Kerry, apparently in good condition, have proved unexpectedly to be tainted.

3. The disease is very contagious, spreading rapidly from the unsound to the sound tubers; and it appears to be in some degree dependent on atmospheric influence, since its progress is far more rapid in damp weather than in dry.

4. It is believed by many experienced farmers that even the best potatoes of the present year will be found very difficult to keep, and that there is little chance of preserving a store until the coming in of the next harvest.

5. The extent of the loss, making every allowance for exaggeration, may be estimated at less than one-half, and more than one-third, of the crop. But this calculation is based on the supposition that all the potatoes stored as sound continue to be so, which is, however, very questionable.

6. The dread of not being able to preserve their potatoes has induced many farmers to bring them at once to market; and hence prices are lower, and the present consumption greater than we should have been led to expect from the ascertained fact of deficiency.

7. From the railroads, and other causes, employment is more abundant and wages are higher in Ireland at present than has been the case for some years past; the general impression seems to be, that the deficiency will not begin to be seriously felt until late in the spring, and that we have more reason to be alarmed for the summer than the winter.

8. The soundness of the seed for the next year's crop is doubted by many eminent agriculturists. They assert that potatoes have been gradually degenerating for the last 10 years; and that within the last three or four the rapidity of the decline has been very perceptible.

We give these results as we have obtained them from a patient analysis of the evidence before us; there are some apparent contradictions in the statements transmitted to us; but these are easily explained by a reference to the Ordnance survey. On limestone, the crops have suffered comparatively but little; this also has been the case where seaweed has been used for manure; but in the heavy clays and boggy soils, the amount of loss is fearful.

Lime has been recommended to be sprinkled on those potatoes where the presence of disease is suspected; but some medical men have declared that the chemical agency of the lime renders the vegetables deleterious. This point at present engages the attention of her Majesty's commissioners, who are making minute and accurate experiments on the subject.

The other crops in Ireland have not engaged much attention; oats are said to be above an average crop, but wheat is deficient both in yield and quality. Many Irish landlords have addressed circulars to their tenants, recommending them to keep back their corn; and the supplies in most of the markets are reported to be unusually short for this season of the year. It is gratifying, however, to observe that the Irish have struck at once at the source of the calamity, and have urged from all sides on the Government the necessity of immediately opening the ports, and abolishing the Corn Laws in the next session of Parliament.

MR. BICKHAM ESCOTT AND THE ILMINSTER FARMERS.

The wide spread and settled public conviction—amounting now to little short of a moral certainty—that not only is the "destiny" of protection "fixed," but that the next session of Parliament will, once for all, register the decree of destiny on the statute-book, materially diminishes the interest and importance attaching to particular indications of agricultural opinion. But Mr. Bickham Escott's speech at Ilminster on Wednesday week—still more the reception which it met with from a purely agricultural audience—is too striking a sign of the times to be passed over in silence. Nor can we refuse ourselves the pleasure of expressing the high respect in which we hold this gentleman's sincerity, frankness, good sense, and moral courage. Mr. Bickham Escott does not, like Lord Ashley, shuffle off his responsibilities on "destiny," and "the great political chiefs." He does not pin his faith, nor ask other people to pin their faith, on "the leading men of the great parties in the Legislature." He does not run away from "agricultural anniversaries" the moment he adopts an opinion which agricultural assemblies may possibly find distasteful. He does not talk like a coward of "inevitable blows," of which it were "needless to argue the policy or impolicy." He thinks and speaks for himself. He argues and invites argument. He has a generous confidence in the good sense of his brother agriculturists, and pays them the respect of reasoning with them—believing that the reasons which have acted on his mind will act on their minds. He "dreads no blow." If he thought a blow was coming, he would feel himself called on to do his best to ward it off. He is disgusted with protection, and with the protectionist argument—and he says so, and gives his reasons why. He loathes the policy of "arraying the supposed interests of agriculture against the real interests of the people." He abhors the impudent selfishness which makes a grievance of cheapness and plenty, and he shrinks from the wicked madness of "maintaining a contest with the bellies of the people." He has the sense likewise to see, and the straightforwardness to say, that all the talk about "agricultural improvement" is so much moonshine, until agriculturists are in possession of that "security" which "can never be generally obtained while there is uncertainty about these laws of importation." It is highly honourable to the farmers of Somersetshire, that they like this plain thinking and plain speaking. The "tremendous cheering" which occasionally interrupted the speaker, and the "tumultuous cheering for some minutes" when he sat down, are among the greatest of all the "great facts" which our agitation has to show.

We last week transferred this most remarkable speech to our columns, but we cannot refrain from again putting before our readers one or two of its more important and characteristic passages:

"Gentlemen, the truth is, and it had better be spoken plainly, it is the conduct of the special representatives of what they call agricultural opinions which has precipitated the fall of this Corn Law. (Tremendous cheering.) Why I have sat in the House of Commons, and heard a gentleman, a worthy friend of my own—pure in character, high in fortune and station, harangue the representatives of the people by the hour, on the low price of beef, mutton, veal, and lamb (hear, hear, and great laughter), and do this avowedly for the purpose of supporting agriculture and propping up protection (hear, hear); in other words, arraying the supposed interests of agriculture against the real interests of the people (cheers); whereas, I always thought that the only way to maintain any system of protection was to show, if you can, that the interests of the community required it, and that the friends of the farmer are the friends of the consumer. (Cheers.) Gentlemen, so soon as I heard that speech, and others of a similar, though none quite so monstrous a tendency, and so indiscreet in its expression, I felt, as Lord Ashley feels, that the game of protection was up. This was an attempt to maintain a contest with the bellies of the people. (Great laughter and cheers.) But I differ with Lord Ashley in one important respect. I dread no blow. I think the change is inevitable, but I do not despair for the result. . . . I have thought it right to speak openly. I have wondered how it is that at so many of these dinners so little or nothing is said of the great question. One recommends better farming, another advises the granting of leases, but both forget the facts that better farming requires capital and security (great cheering); and the other fact, that the security of leases can never be generally obtained while there is uncertainty about these laws of importation. (Cheers.) Let us all, then, endeavour to meet the times, not by concealing the truth, but by preparing for its inevitable conclusions; it will be thus that temporary difficulties will be surmounted, as they have been surmounted before, by the kindness and consideration of some, by the energy and unfettered enterprise of others, and for myself, I feel very grateful that you, to whom I owe no public allegiance, and have no concessions to make or votes to regret, have allowed me to express to men whom I respect something of my own convictions on the greatest public question of the day."

Whereupon, adds the report, "the whole company rose, and cheered tumultuously for some minutes." There is more of "destiny" in those honest farmers' cheers, than even in the "inclination" of the "leading men of the great parties in the Legislature." When farmers not only tolerate, but approve, and not only approve, but enthusiastically applaud, such home truths as these, "the game of protection is up" indeed. Not a whole Parliament of Richmonds and Buckinghams could carry on the hoax now.

THE RAILWAY KING AND HIS FLATTERERS.

The new Member for Sunderland does not seem to be a man much given to serious reflection; else we should think the festivities of last week must have left, in some respects, a deeply painful impression on his mind—an impression of grave responsibilities incurred, and sacred duties neglected. Without, of course, contending that a public man is answerable for all the nonsense that is said and believed of him by ignorant and foolish persons; and freely allowing that it is an embarrassing and somewhat ungracious task for the guest of a political dinner party to repel the adulation, and rebuke the follies, of his entertainers—we cannot understand how any man, with a sense of public duty, can feel justified in allowing such wild and perilous extravagances as those which, on the occasion alluded to, were indulged in by the Chairman, Mr. J. J. Wright, to go uncorrected, even for a brief convivial hour. A wise and earnest man, with a just sense of his responsibility to those who look up to him for counsel, guidance, and example, would assuredly have found some courteous, but effectual mode of intimating his entire dissent from the latter portion, at least, of such a rhapsody as the following:—

"The reputation of Mr. Hudson as a man of business and enterprise stands unrivalled in the present day. As the great accomplisher of railway undertakings, the public spirit and the indomitable perseverance which have marked all his operations, the astonishing rapidity with which all his great works have been executed, and the signal success which has attended all his efforts, have become matters of national record, and the theme of wonder throughout Europe. So strongly, gentlemen, is his fame felt, that you cannot take up a newspaper, whether Tory, Whig, or Radical—whether local or metropolitan—may, whether English or Continental, without finding some article to his praise, or observations to his honour." (Applause.) He has identified his name with the national character by the works he has already accomplished; and such is the opinion formed of his power, and such the reliance placed on his judgment and integrity, that he wields at command and presides over an amount of pecuniary capital exceeding that of any other man in this empire. He may be said to be a sort of Chancellor of the Exchequer in railway matters, whose duties, however, are more to give than to receive; for he has founded a national stock which has not only provided for the security of the investments, but returned to the possessors their capital doubled, trebled, or quadrupled in premiums and dividends, and opened a new fountain of prosperity which has flowed in copious and refreshing streams through the country."

And Mr. Hudson returns thanks for this trash, and for the "enthusiastic acclamations" that followed its delivery. Mr. Hudson takes it all as a "compliment," and has "difficulty in giving expression to the grateful feelings that warm his heart." That is to say, Mr. Hudson, knowingly and wilfully, allows himself to be taken for a man who holds a Fortunatus's purse. He likes to have it thought that his mere individual pat can "found a national stock"—"double, treble, and quadruple" people's capital, in the shape of "premiums and dividends," and open "new fountains of prosperity," beside whose "copious and refreshing streams" a thirsty country has only to lie down and drink. Nothing said as to where the premiums and dividends are to come from in the first instance. No attempt to indicate the original sources, and explain the conditions and limitations of this wealth-creating power. Not a thought of the rights, interests, and might of that commerce and industry, which are the true fountains of the wealth of which railways are but the conduits and channels. Not a hint at the dependence of the "national stock," and the "premiums and dividends," on the prosperity of the labouring and trading millions—and the dependence of this on free markets for industry, and a plentiful and steady supply of the necessities of life. Not a syllable of allusion to the possibility of a tightening of the money-market and a diminution of the surplus of national capital available for railway enterprise. Not a whisper of cautionary warning, from which his worshippers can infer that the thing may, in certain imaginable emergencies, be carried too far. Nothing said or suggested of conditions, limitations, contingencies, casualties, and natural laws. Mr. Hudson is vain enough, and reckless enough, to like to have it thought that he does it all. He makes the laws. National prosperity is in his gift. It all comes out of his magic bank, at the open sesame of his mere individual will. With scarcity and dearth officially proclaimed over half Europe; with the Queen's commissioners in Ireland, anxiously taking the gauge of the damaged and diminished resources that stand between one-third of the empire, and the horrors of famine; and with a law on the statute-book (Mr. Hudson consenting and approving), to make the empire "independent of foreigners;"—this man thinks—or likes to have it thought—that he, Mr. Hudson, can double, treble, and quadruple people's capital, and open new fountains of prosperity to flow in copious and refreshing streams through the country. Mr. Hudson, or the firm of Hudson, Wright, and Co., might as well set up for the philosopher's stone at once. The most audacious quack of an alchemist never came this length.

Has this "sort of Chancellor of the Exchequer," whose duties lie in the way "more of giving than of receiving," ever heard of a certain real Chancellor of the Exchequer, whose "prosperity" speech was the prelude to a general commercial crash, the memory of which has fastened a sobriquet to the luckless gentleman's name that will stick by him to the end of his days? We earnestly trust, for the sake of dearer interests than even those of railways and the railway-system, that the friends and admirers of the Member for Sunderland may never have to speak, in bitter derision, of Mr. Prosperity Hudson.

GREAT LEAGUE MEETING AT MANCHESTER.

In another part of our paper will be found an ample report of the proceedings at the Free Trade Hall, in Manchester, on Tuesday night; but that report will but faintly portray the earnestness, the firmness, and the unabated zeal which characterised the meeting. On no former occasion was equal anxiety displayed to learn the course of proceedings which should be adopted under the unexpected circumstances in which the great question of food and employment is placed. Eight thousand persons crowded the hall; multitudes remained outside unable to obtain admission. On the platform were the representatives of an amount of wealth and capital such as has never before been collected in one assembly in the north of England. Many who have hitherto been lukewarm and neutral, many that had passionately doubted, and not a few who had opposed, appeared to testify that the repeal of the Corn Laws has become—what the League has laboured to make it—a national question, independent of men and parties, but identified and bound up with the vital interests of the people. With a universal conviction on all hands, that something must be done—with famine imminent in Ireland, and scarcity threatened in England—with the leading journals of the most opposite views in politics, proclaiming that the time is come when the policy of interfering with the laws of Providence, and intercepting the compensations of Nature, must be abandoned—with proclamations of European scarcity issued on the shores of the German Ocean, the Baltic, and the Propontis—with demands on all our energies to complete labours the most stupendous, it was to be expected that men should come together deeply impressed with the weight and urgency of the matters to be deliberated upon. But this was not the only source of the deep interest and importance of the meeting. Events have, indeed, become teachers; they have set to work active agencies potent for change. But those who assembled in the Free Trade Hall on Tuesday evening, felt that it would be neither the part of wisdom nor of sound policy to watch the course of events with folded arms, and to trust the results of a great struggle to the doctrine of chances. They came together, convinced that the signs of the times are invitations to action; that the events to which we have alluded are appeals for co-operation, and that we may endanger our great cause of truth and justice by trusting too much to the power of circumstances, however unexpected or however favourable.

There was probably never any meeting in which the feelings of the audience were more faithfully reflected in the speeches delivered. The speakers seemed only to give utterance to the thoughts of the assembled thousands; there was a unanimity of opinion which seemed the result of previous concert, but which was derived from all having reflected on facts which all knew. The connection between high prices of food and manufacturing distress—between low prices of provisions and manufacturing prosperity is no longer a lesson to be taught in Manchester,—it is a conviction so thoroughly inwrought and impressed, that it forms a part of every man's existence. It is a truth of consciousness rather than of reasoning.

We trust that the other great towns of the empire will imitate the example of the men of Manchester, and give utterance to those feelings which are now universally experienced through the nation. It is not enough to say that the Corn Laws are doomed, and then wait, in the spirit of Turkish fatalism, until their destiny is accomplished. The destiny is in our own hands; let unity and direction be given to the enlightened opinion which is spread abroad, and the barriers erected by fraud and folly will be swept away by the tide.

OPENING OF THE PORTS.

(From a Correspondent.)

EDINBURGH, 28TH OCT.—It may be satisfactory to you and to your readers to know, that at a special general meeting this day of "the company of merchants of the City of Edinburgh," one of the oldest chartered companies in this kingdom, and one which has greatly given the tone to other public bodies in Scotland, called by requisition, a memorial to her Majesty's Government was unanimously agreed to, generally condemnatory of the Corn Laws, and specifically praying for the "opening of the ports" for the free admission, without duty, of corn and provisions, as a measure dictated at once by the necessity of the time, and a measure of sound policy.

Further, the company resolved to publish their resolutions in all our papers, that by calling public sentiment forth, Sir R. Peel might have his hands strengthened against all sinister influence, which might prevent or delay so necessary a step being taken.

On Wednesday the Lord Provost, magistrates, and council of Glasgow unanimously resolved to memorialise her Majesty's Government to open the ports for the admission of grain duty free; and a memorial to that effect has already, we believe, been transmitted to Sir Robert Peel. —Scotch Reformers' Gazette of Saturday.

We have also received the following intelligence:

"At the meeting of the Town Council of Hull on Thursday last, it was moved by Dr. Gordon, and seconded by Geo. Cookman, Esq., that a petition be presented to her Majesty in Council to pass an order to admit all kinds of foreign grain duty free, which motion was powerfully supported, and carried unanimously."

MANCHESTER ATHENÆUM SOIREE. —The annual soirée or literary meeting of the members and friends of this institution was held on Thursday evening in the Free Trade Hall, Pease-street. The interest manifested by the people of this locality was, perhaps, greater than on any former occasion. Tickets were issued for 3,600 persons, but the demand far exceeded that number; and on the day before the meeting as much as three guineas was offered for tickets which originally cost 7s. 6d. The directors had provided ample accommodation for the company, and the attraction offered was of a high character. Mr. Charles Dickens, M. Eugene Sue, and Mr. Thiers, were expected to be present, but from various causes those gentlemen were absent. Mr. Sergeant Talfourd, the chairman, eloquently addressed the meeting on the advantages of such institutions, and on the progress made by that of Manchester. Mr. Mark Phillips, Mr. F. Stone, Mr. John Bright, Mr. Douglas Jerrold, Mr. M. Gibson, and Mr. Cobden, also delivered speeches on the occasion.

A man, dressed in the garb of a labourer, was killed on the Creydon railway, on Sunday, having been accidentally run over by a train. How he came on the railway could not be ascertained.

GREAT MEETING OF THE LEAGUE.

(From the Manchester Guardian.)

Tuesday evening another of those extraordinary gatherings, the aggregate meetings of members of the Anti Corn Law League resident in Manchester and the neighbourhood, was held in the Free Trade Hall, Pease-street, convened by advertisement, as a special general meeting of the members; and it being announced that the meeting would be addressed by Mr. Cobden, Mr. Bright, and Mr. Henry Ashworth, the greatest interest was manifested, and the demand for tickets of admission, both for ladies and members from the country, was unprecedentedly great. To give every facility to the attendance of the members of the League from Ashton, Rochdale, and their neighbourhoods, it was arranged by the Council that railway-trains should leave Manchester for those towns and their neighbourhoods at 10 o'clock. Though there was no subject announced for discussion, no resolutions of an important character to be proposed, no proposition to be considered for another vast subscription, in order to raise a 50,000l. or 100,000l. fund, the greatest excitement prevailed, and the most intense interest was manifested at the meeting; as it was justly anticipated that it would naturally have reference to the present critical state of the country consequent upon the failure of the potato crops, both in England, Ireland, and the principal countries of Europe. It was expected that allusion would be made to several recent and remarkable indications of a change of opinion amongst those who have hitherto been the advocates of protection and monopoly; and to the supposed intentions of ministers—the probable issue of orders in council for a temporary suspension of the Corn Law—would be adverted to, if not discussed, and their several advantages and disadvantages pointed out. Even amongst those less informed, it was felt that the addresses of the leaders on this occasion would have a direct bearing upon that new phase of the food question, suggested by the too great probability of a famine year in Ireland. To these causes we may attribute the vast congregation of individuals collected within the walls of the Free Trade Hall last night.

As usual on these occasions, the galleries were reserved for ladies, and gentlemen accompanying them. They were densely filled; as indeed was the whole area of the hall, and every inch of space on the large platform, long before half-past seven o'clock, the time appointed for the chair being taken. Great as has been our experience of large assemblies within the walls of this vast building, we do not remember any previous occasion on which it was so closely packed in every part; and we understand that hundreds were unable to gain admission. The usual space in front of the platform, on both sides the reporters' table, was crowded with ladies and gentlemen, many of them unable to obtain seats.

Exactly at half-past seven o'clock, Mr. George Wilson, Chairman of the Council of the League, took the chair; he was accompanied by Mr. Cobden, Mr. Bright, Mr. Henry Ashworth, Mr. John Brooks, Mr. William Rawson, and various other members of the Council, who were loudly cheered as they took their seats.

Amongst the gentlemen on the platform we may name the following:—R. Cobden, Esq., M.P.; J. Bright, Esq., M.P.; J. Brotherton, Esq., M.P.; H. Ashworth, Esq., of Turton; Mr. Alderman Walker, Mr. W. H. Callender, Mr. Alderman Armitage, Mr. Alderman Burd; Messrs. J. Brooks, T. Bazley, E. Davy, of Crediton, Devon; J. Whitaker, of Ashton; S. Lees; R. Platt, Salford; C. Howard, Hyde; Mons. A. Fonteyraud, of Paris; D. Collins, Oldham; T. Garside, ditto; R. Ascroft, Preston; R. Welsh, Huddersfield; Jacob Bright, jun., Rochdale; C. Cobden, H. Rawson; T. Bright, Burnage; P. Seville, Lees; W. Evans; J. G. McMinnies, Warrington; W. Ascroft, Burnage; Rev. Thomas Hudson, Wesleyan minister; J. Potter; William Littlewood, Rochdale; James Littlewood, ditto; Oliver Ormerod, ditto; W. Coates, ditto; John Petrie, ditto; John Hoyle, ditto; J. B. Scott; W. Harvey; W. Lockett, mayor of Salford; C. H. Lattimore, Wheatthamstead; J. Harding, J. Barratt, T. Woodcock; J. Schofield, Littleborough; J. Rawson, J. Chadwick, P. Walker, S. Lucas; J. T. Crook, Liverpool; T. H. Williams; W. Black, London; O. Whitaker, Ashton; J. B. Smith, W. Rawson, J. Simpson, R. B. Moore, J. C. Dyer; T. Eskridge, Stockport; J. Hampson; Nathan Lees, Ashton; Nicholas Heald, B. Nicholls; J. D. Fernley, Stockport; Alderman P. H. Willert, Watkin Lees, G. Higginbottom; A. Darby, Coalbrookdale; Mr. Alderman Tysoe.

The CHAIRMAN: We anticipated at this, the opening meeting of the season, that we should be in a position to place before this meeting, and through this meeting before the country, some few of the results of the registration labours of the League. Owing, however, to the non-reception of some documents essential to that purpose, we are obliged—reluctantly, it is true, but still obliged—to postpone that important report until the next meeting of the League, which I trust will be on a very early day. (Hear.) Under these circumstances I shall not occupy your time any longer, but proceed at once to the business, by calling on Mr. Cobden to address you. (Loud and prolonged applause.)

MR. COBDEN: Mr. Chairman, Ladies, and Gentlemen,—Many as have been the meetings which I have had the honour of addressing in Manchester, yet I think I can truly say, that none will lay claim to the present in numbers and intelligence; and, if I look around me on the platform I am led to the conclusion that for weight, influence, and moral power, this constitutes altogether about one of the strongest meetings I have ever known held in this great country. (Hear, hear.) As I came along the street just now, I saw such a rushing and struggling to gain access to this meeting, that I could not help asking myself what it was that we were called together for. You have nothing particular to learn, we have nothing particular to communicate in reference to this cause, and yet there seems to be something in our question which naturally and instinctively draws us together. I think there is some danger of a misapprehension on the part of some as to the particular object which again draws us together to-night in this building. Our business here to-night is to state the position in which our cause stands at the present moment, to draw some consolation from the past, and to indicate the way in which we are now placed, and to make some allusion to the dilemma in which our opponents, as many suppose, are now placed. (Applause.) We are not met here to-night to exult in the fallen and menacing condition of our unhappy sister-land, Ireland, whose inhabitants, in consequence of the failure of the potato crop, and the deficiency of the wheat harvest, seem to have starvation staring them in the face, and famine impending over them. But, ladies and gentlemen, let it be perfectly understood that we do not meet here to exult over the calamity in which a large portion of our countrymen are likely to be placed, or over the scarcity and famine which impend over our unhappy sister island. (Hear.) The objects for which we have laboured for seven years have been abundance and cheapness. (Cheers.) "Plenty," is our motto—"Plenty always and everywhere!" (Loud cheers.) And if there be drought, or scarcity, or famine, here or elsewhere, we, at all events, of all our fellow-countrymen, may fairly claim to stand guiltless of the cause of that famine and distress. (Hear.) We are told that in a country where the great bulk of the population are always upon the verge of famine, where that gaunt spectre now threatens to stalk through the land—that misery, starvation, and even death, may be the portion of millions of our fellow-countrymen in Ireland. Now, what is the remedy for this? We do not come to talk about the principle which is applicable to all times and seasons; but what, I ask, is the natural and obvious remedy, under existing circumstances, against the gaunt famine that threatens a country like Ireland? You would say, "Open wide the ports, and admit the bread of the whole world to feed the people." (Cheers.) That is the obvious and natural remedy—that is the remedy which an enlightened despot would at once fly to. Witness Russia, witness Turkey, witness Germany, Holland, and Belgium; these Governments have not waited, but when their people have been threatened with want they have at once thrown open their ports, and in some cases stopped exportation in order to supply their people with abundance of the first necessities of life. (Hear.) Why has not our Government taken a similar course? Why have they waited to learn Christianity from the Turk, or humanity from the Russian? (Cheers.) Is it because our Government is less merciful than that of the Mahometan Sultan? Is it that our boasted constitutional power is less humane than that of the despot of Russia? Or is it that our prime minister, who holds the responsible position of sultan in this country—(hear)—is it because he is afraid that if he takes the step—the obvious and natural and necessary step—he will not have the support of the country in throwing open the ports of this kingdom to foreign corn? If that be his doubt, we meet here to give him all the support which we can give him. (Cheers.) I hesitate not to say that whatever may be the attempts of the aristocracy to thwart the minister in taking such a course, there is popular power enough in the country to support him in that act of humanity. (Loud applause, and cheers.) We support him here in this magnificent meeting! (Cheers.) What we say, South Lancashire will say whenever he appeals to it. (Hear.) We speak the voice of the West Riding of Yorkshire whenever he chooses; and Middlesex will endorse what we say in this hall. (Renewed cheers.) You have animated the hearts and hopes of this empire; and a minister having the support of the vast multitude in this country—having their intelligence at his back, which he may have whenever he chooses to draw upon it—I say he is a criminal and a poltroon if he hesitates a whit. (Loud cheers.) He has the power. There is no man, whether he be the Grand Turk, or whether he be a Russian despot—there is no man in the world that has more power than Sir Robert Peel has in this country. His party cannot do without him. (Laughter.) Let anybody sit in the House of Commons as we do, opposite to Sir Robert Peel, and watch the proceedings of his party. He comes down to the House night after night. With the exception of his colleague, Sir James Graham, the whole of the side of the House upon which they sit may be called a dreary waste, as far as statesmanship is concerned. (Hear, hear, and cheers.) Sir James Graham, although I admit he has manifested great administrative talents, has not exactly arrived at that state of personal popularity in this country, that he can take Sir Robert Peel's place. (A laugh and cheers.) Sir Robert Peel is therefore absolute with his party; and with the power he possesses, he must be content to take the responsibility which attaches to power. (Cheers.) I need not tell you that that word "responsibility" has an ugly and a sinister sound in the ears of the prime minister; but let us be understood. By responsibility, we mean moral responsibility:—(hear, hear)—he is responsible to his country, he will be responsible to history, if he fails, upon this occasion, in taking that step which he is bound to take to save a large portion of the people of this country from famine. (Hear, and cheers.) Many people now say, "Admitting that Sir Robert Peel opens our ports, and foreign corn comes in, that will not settle the question;" and this is a point that I wish particularly to draw the attention of this meeting to, for I see a disposition upon the part of many of my friends to throw up their caps, and consider this question as settled. (Hear.) I do not exactly see my way to the settlement of this question yet. I wish I did. I do not think the opening of the ports would settle this question. We had the ports opened in '26; but they passed the sliding-scale in '28, with all its horrible iniquities. (Hear, hear.) It is not because Ireland wants feeding that we shall necessarily have a repeal of the Corn Laws. Ireland has been in a state of semi-famine for the last 30 years; and in 1822 you had subscriptions in England—every church was thrown open—you had 250,000L. raised in England, and sent to Ireland, to save the two provinces of Connaught and Munster from a state of actual famine; but nobody said a word about repealing the Corn Laws then; not the slightest syllable was said about relieving the people of Ireland by admitting foreign corn; and what I wish to impress upon you now is this, that it is not the opening of the ports alone we want, but we want to set our backs against them to prevent them from ever being shut again. (Cheers.) Do you not think we may find some arguments nearer home in favour of this principle? (Cries of Yes.) I believe many of you are brought here because you have an idea that things are not looking quite so promising as they have been in Lancashire. (Cries of Hear, hear.) You are not arrived exactly at that state they are in in Ireland, where they have commissioners sent over just now, learned doctors, to see how much the patient will bear, to see how much it can endure. They have got it upon the rack, and there are learned doctors round it, feeling the pulse, to see if the patient will live a little longer, or to see whether it should be taken off the rack. Then the Standard newspaper tells us, that even if the patient is taken off the rack, it shall be put on again as soon as ever it will bear it. (Hear.) Now you are not exactly arrived at that state yet; but what is the price of oatmeal? I believe that what used to be a guinea is now 38s.; and I believe, too, that flour has advanced 5s. per cent., that the dozen pounds of flour which used to cost 18s. 8d. is now 28s. 6d. And I believe? (Cries of Yes, yes.) Then you have bread still dearer, because flour makes more than its own weight in bread; and every man who is now spending half a crown in bread is just getting one-third less for it than he did this time twelvemonths. Every man will then have one-third less to spend upon the other things which he uses. We thus come to the old story again—if he has so much more to spend in what he eats, he will have less to spend in what he wears; and if there is more goes to the baker, and through him to the miller, there will be less to go to the draper, and to the wholesale dealer. You will then have less work, while you will have more to pay for your food. Then the masters will cry out at their short profits; then there will be no more strikes for higher wages. It is the old thing coming round again, and I believe many of you here have felt it, and that you are come here to see whether you are likely to get rid of the cause. It will not be got rid of, however, by throwing up your caps, because a lord has written a very ambiguous sort of a letter, or because certain honourable gentlemen make speeches, the meaning of which you cannot tell, and indeed they do not appear to comprehend it very clearly themselves. (Laughter.) You must not throw up your caps and fancy you are going to have the Corn Law abolished without thinking of it by any such adventitious aid as that. It will have to be done by your own right arm, if it is done at all. (Loud cheers.) We have a new class in this country that I think are more deeply interested in this question than they have been yet considered to be. I wonder if we have any people here that have got any interest in railways? (Loud laughter and cheers.) I should think, judging by that response, that almost every lady and gentleman here has a little sympathy in that direction. (Renewed laughter.) Now the railway people have got—a king! (A laugh.) Kings sometimes make speeches, though we never expect much from kings' speeches. Cobbett once wrote a grammar for the purpose of teaching statesmen how to write better kings' speeches; but I do not think that your railway king has studied that grammar. (Loud cheers and laughter.) You have a "king," and he has lately been railing at the League, at Sunderland. He is given to railing (laughter), and he calls the League a "selfish" body; he denounces us. I think railway kings and their subjects are more deeply interested just now in the success of the League than any other class of the community. (Hear.) Did you ever take a look at the trains starting from the Leeds or Sheffield station, or out by Ashton? You who have got shares in railways, just go and take stock of your business; see who your customers are: inquire from the secretary or one of the directors how much they receive for first-class passengers, how much for second-class, and how much for third-class, and then you will be able to understand how much you are indebted to the working classes for the prosperity of your lines. Learn where the cheap trains go, how much they carry, and how much they pay; and then just make a little calculation. Here is John Tomkins, his wife, and seven children; they earn together a guinea a week: his wife comes and says, "John, I'm paying 3s. 2d. more for flour than I did three months ago." "Then," says John, we must give up the trip to Alderley—we shall not be able to take that." (Cheers.) Go and tell your "king" this. They sometimes call him the railway Bonaparte. Recollect that a man may be a Napoleon among navigators, and only a navigator among statesmen! (Cheers and laughter.) I am not happy at nick-names, but I will give him a title. He shall be one of those pastebord potentates that shuffle and cut, and win tricks—call him "the King of Spades!" (Tremendous bursts of laughter.) I do not know how it is, but there is nobody who attacks the League but you may be almost certain, whatever fame or reputation he had before—you may take it for granted, I say, that that man is at the end of his tether, he is just at the brink of the precipice, and that all his public fame and character goes overboard. We were attacked by an ex-chancellor once, and what a figure he has been cutting in Punch ever since! (A laugh.) Then we have had ministers attacking us, prime ministers too, who said we should be mad if we persevered for Free Trade. What is become of them? And, mark my words, the railway "king" will turn out only a "pretender." Depend upon it people will soon avoid running their heads against that stone wall called the Anti-Corn-Law League. (Loud cheers.) I wonder if there is any man who has laid out his money upon railways that has not bought a county qualification. (Hear.) I cannot imagine a man showing less calculation or sound foresight than the man who lays out his 50L. or 100L. in buying a couple of shares in the railways, rather than upon a freehold qualification. It is the 40s. qualification that can make railways profitable, by giving us Free Trade. (Loud cheers.) I like these railways too, and I will tell you why. They are carrying common sense, that is, when the railway king does not travel upon them, into the agricultural districts. (Cheers and laughter.) The great proprietor and squire in the west and south of England have all been anxious to have railways. For many years they have wanted railways to their own houses, and they found out that, if they are to have them, they must come to Lancashire or Yorkshire, for there was nobody else that had either the money or the wit to make them. That makes them sympathise with the prosperity of Lancashire and Yorkshire; they come into contact with business men, and they understand men of business. They are beginning to feel that railways are the barometer of the state of trade, as you all will find it out by-and-bye. I like railways; they are drawing us more together; they are teaching the landowner to feel for the manufacturer, and placing the manufacturer upon better terms with the landowner. I wish them to go on; but they cannot prosper unless you have something to carry upon them. The more trade you have—the more Free Trade—the more profits will your railways bring. Nobody objects to railways now; but how was it twelve years ago with the landlords in this respect? Twelve years ago, the Marquis of Chandos then, but Duke of Buckingham now, presided at a public meeting at Saltil, near Windsor, at which the fellows of Eton College, and other great and distinguished men of the county assembled, to celebrate the first defeat of the Great Western Railway Bill. (Hear.) What do these gentlemen say now? Why even the pope himself is now in advance of these subjects, and they are only some ten years in advance of the pope. Is it not just as possible that they may be as much mistaken about their true interests in the matter of Free Trade as they were in the case of railroads? This is encouraging. Indeed we are only now about three or four years in advance of the monopolists with our arguments. About three or four years ago, we put out pamphlets stating that the population of this country was increasing at the rate of a thousand a day. I was passing by when I heard a man with a shovel in his hand railing it upon the wall. "That's a lie any how!" he said. (Laughter.) But that incredible fact at that time has been so well established, that now even Lord Stanley and Sir James Graham admit it is true, and are compelled to acknowledge that it is necessary to make provision for the large and increasing population. (Hear, hear.) This also is encouraging; it shows that the principle we contend for is good, and that we need only continue the efforts hitherto used to set ourselves free. (Hear, hear.) It begins to be seen now on all hands, that the present Corn Law cannot stand; but it seems to be very doubtful, at present, what we shall get instead of it. Are we to have another Corn Law? (Loud cries of No, no.) Are we to have a sliding scale or a fixed duty? (No, no.) Only think of the number of Corn Laws we have had during the last few years! The present has been in operation three years, and now we are talking of getting rid of it. (Hear, hear.) Why is it so? Because just now there is a probability of scarcity; we want food, and this law, which Sir John Tyrell tells us is to give us "plenty, and security for plenty," stands in the way of our obtaining it. (Applause.) It is a law at once unnatural, impolitic, and inexpedient, and meant only to suit the pockets of those who believe themselves interested in its continuance. (Hear, hear.) There will be attempts made to cheat us out of the demand we make, and there is every probability that those attempts will succeed, unless we as Free Traders stand fast to the principle we have espoused, by showing to our opponents that we are neither to be used nor abused by the acceptance of either a sliding scale or a fixed duty. (Applause.) I think we have made out a sufficient case, and by that we must stand, without any attempt at compromise. We do not ask to be benefited at the expense of any other portion of the community; I have all along repudiated that idea; but I think we have fully demonstrated that monopoly is the bane of agriculture; and Peel says ditto to it.—(Applause.) And we shall continue to labour and to urge this cause, whether the ports be immediately opened or not, until not the slightest ground is left to the monopolists, or until every rag and vestige of the protective system is done away with. (Loud applause.) We have told them in the House of Commons that the farmers are robbing one another, and that position was not controverted but must be acquiesced in by all who are in any way acquainted with the subject. But since the close of Parliament, I have had an opportunity of consulting with many of this class of men, and have obtained a variety of statistics and details on the subject, which go to show that the farmer, instead of being a gainer, is a most material loser by this so-called system of protection. (Hear, hear.) It has been proved to me, that the better off the farmer is, the more he suffers by protection. The large stock farmers, as they are called, are more seriously injured than any other part of the community. They are consumers of Indian corn, oats, beans, cheese, butter, beer, and of all other taxed articles, and they are made to pay artificial prices for all these articles for protection. (Hear, hear.) We have now had thirty years of protection, and during the whole of this time, the farmer has been the dupe of every blockhead who gave the cry of "protection!" But it is not enough that we demonstrate the iniquity and impolicy of these laws, and the injury they inflict upon all classes of the community. We may make this clear and unanswerable by the most direct and logical of processes. There shall not be found a man in the House of Commons, with any pretension to intellect, who shall dare to controvert it. Yet you cannot carry the abolition of this system unless you are active and energetic in putting yourselves in a position to have the power of carrying out your principles. Talking will not do it. I admit we can show our enemies are wrong; but still, you cannot make men do right unless you have the power to compel men to it. I believe that power is in your hands. We have done something already by resorting to the constitutional weapons of war which have been already referred to, the 40s. freeholders. We called upon the West Riding Free Traders this time twelve months, and we asked them to qualify 2000 voters, to rescue that country from the grasp of monopoly; they have nobly responded to that call. (Cheers.) They have put 2300 upon the register. (Loud cheers.) They have converted the majority that formerly existed in favour of monopoly of 1100, into a majority of 1600 for Free Trade. (Loud cheers.) Now I ask them not to rest satisfied there. I ask them to go on again, and by the same process, qualify 2000 more by the 31st of next January; for if they do that they will save themselves much trouble and expense at the next election. (Hear.) An election must come in twelve months, or a little more. A contest for the West Riding of Yorkshire will cost each party £10,000, and by the expenditure of £1000 between now and the 31st January, our friends may induce as many more to buy freeholds as will render a contest hopeless, and thus save themselves the expense. (Hear.) I ask them to put themselves in the same position as South Lancashire. We have a majority of 3000 in South Lancashire. (Loud cheers.) Mark the extraordinary change that we have witnessed. In 1841, at the dissolution of the liberal government, the Whig committee of that time took the registration books in hand, and looked at them with the view of contesting the county. They found if they had contested it, they would have been in a minority of 2000. (Hear.) Four years have elapsed; the League took the registrations in hand. South Lancashire was wholly abandoned by the so-called Whig party. The League took the registration in hand, and in four years the minority of 2000 has been converted into a majority of 3000. (Cheers.) You will have no contest in South Lancashire. (Renewed cheers.) Nobody will be such a fool upon the side of the monopolists as to incur the expense of a contest in South Lancashire. We have a majority in the Manchester polling-district alone large enough to cover the monopolist majority in all the districts where they have one. (Cheers.) We made an appeal to North Cheshire. We asked them to qualify, to put themselves into a majority; and they have done so. You will hear the particulars when the time comes. But I ask them now not to rest satisfied where they are. I am jealous of North Cheshire. I want to see the county (for a borough in which I have the honour to sit), so safe in three months' time, that Mr. Egerton will not think of coming to contest it. (Cheers.) This is easily done. North Lancashire—aye, we shall make an example of the monopolists in North Lancashire. (Cheers.) There is some pluck in North Cheshire; but they are a poor, beaten, coward, craven set in North Lancashire. They have no heads. Make light work of them in North Lancashire. (Loud cheers.) Why they have turned Lord Stanley and family to the right about, and set up their own little champion; but I think they will have to go and seek the Derby family to come and help them out of the scrape; for they seem sadly in want of a leader. (Laughter and applause.) Middlesex we have won; South Lancashire, the West Riding of Yorkshire, North Cheshire, South Staffordshire, North Lancashire. This is nothing but a basis. This is only the basis of our operations to begin with. Having done what we can down here, we must now appeal to the country at large to follow our example. (Hear, hear, and applause.) Wherever there is a man above the rank of an unskilled labourer, whether a shopkeeper, a man of the middle class, or of the skilled working-class, that has not got a county vote, or is not striving to accumulate enough to get one, let us point the finger of scorn at him; he is not fit to be a freeman. It is an avenue by which we may reach the recesses of power, and possess ourselves of any constitutional rights which we are entitled to possess. They cry shame upon us for inviting the people to qualify. Why, the revising barristers everywhere have not passed the qualifications that have been made, and have not only admitted them to be strictly legal and right, but they have gone out of their way, and said that they considered it honourable for men to purchase property with the view of acquiring the franchise. For myself and friends, I may say that we consider it our duty to enlist as many of the counties as possible in the cause of Free Trade; we have a list of 20, and we intend to visit every one of them. (Cheers.) We will have them organised on the plan that has been so successful in South Lancashire, under the superintendence of our excellent chairman. I mention this to account to our friends for the neglect of many visits we may have been expected to pay in various quarters. They must allow us to proceed with this registration business; for assuredly it is of the utmost importance. There is nothing that will so much alarm the monopolists as to be told that the League has got hold of the counties. What are their pocket boroughs in comparison with South Lancashire, Middlesex, and the West Riding of Yorkshire? With these constituencies to back them, the principles of Free Trade would be found more powerful than all the borough-mongers. Don't let any friend of the cause, however, entertain the vain hope that a letter from any noble lord will secure the full triumph of the Free Trade cause. This principle for which we have been so long contending will prove successful when the Free Traders are prepared to work out their own redemption, and not before. (Hear, hear.) We have everything to encourage us, however; and I for one believe that the day of our redemption draweth nigh. (Applause.) But we must not relax in our labours; on the contrary, we must be more zealous, more energetic, more laborious than we have ever yet been. When the enemy is wavering then is the time to press upon him. (Loud applause.) I call, then, upon all who have any sympathy in our cause, who have any promptings of humanity, or who feel any interest in the well-being of their fellow-men, all who have apprehensions of scarcity or starvation, to come forward with their efforts, to avert this horrible destiny, this dreadfully impending visitation. (The honourable gentleman resumed his seat amidst loud and prolonged applause.)

Mr. HENRY ASHWORTH, of Turton, near Bolton, then stepped forward, and was received with great applause. He said: It requires a bold man at the conclusion of a market-day's business to encounter a spectacle like this, and to undertake to communicate something which themselves do not know; but the task is still more difficult when we remember that the whole field of our agitation has just been gone over by our worthy friend the Member for Stockport. (Hear, hear.) However, in matters concerning the League, I find we have only to apply the same reasoning and the same course of thinking that we apply to our own businesses, and the affair will be well understood. Our chairman has told you that we have come together this evening, but he has not told you for what definite object. So far as I can tell you, I think I may as well put it in this shape: wheat has arrived at 60s. a quarter, and is going upwards; and it is now time to sound the alarm. (Hear, hear.) Those who have been accustomed to go through the arguments of the League will not have forgotten that when wheat has ranged from 40s. to 45s. or 50s. a quarter, we have been accustomed to enjoy a reasonable amount of prosperity (hear, hear); but when wheat has arrived at 60s. a quarter, and has got up occasionally to 65s. or 70s. or more, we have been steeped in adversity. (Hear, hear.) I don't want you to take this for granted simply upon my assertion. We shall take no harm if we pass simply before our recollection the events of the past 10 or 12 years. Looking at the years 1833 to 1839, we had good harvests and plenty, and a season of prosperity. From 1837 to 1842 we had five years when wheat was 60s. to 80s. a quarter, and ranged from 61s. for nearly the whole period. At that time we had unexampled adversity. From 1842 to the present time, wheat had declined in price from 65s. to 45s., and we had again partaken of prosperous days. (Hear, hear.) Taking these three periods as examples which we have not forgotten, we may fairly go on to consider that now, when we have passed 60s. again, we are on dangerous ground. (Hear, hear.) If 60s. a quarter had been arrived at, in consequence of scarcity—scarcity which was attributable to the Almighty—it would have been our business and our duty humbly to submit to it (hear, hear); but if 60s. a quarter and upwards is a price which it is in human power to prevent, then, I say, a responsibility rests somewhere. (Hear, hear, and applause.) We find that in times of scarcity in one country there is often superabundance in another; and at the present time we are aware that corn, to a very large extent, may be imported into this country at something like 40s. to 45s. a quarter; and if we can command the resources of other countries at those reasonable rates, the current price of the world, we have no business to pay 60s. a quarter or upwards for the benefit of any class. (Great applause.) Gentlemen, we come now to consider where the responsibility rests. It has been hinted, that by an order in council wheat could be introduced into this country free of duty. Now, we know that the duty this day is 17s.; therefore, if we had foreign corn free from duty, we have reasonable ground to suppose that we should not be paying 60s. or upwards. The difference, therefore, betwixt the artificial price we are called upon to pay and the general price of the world is just the mark of difference between prosperity and adversity to us. (Hear, hear.) Now, gentlemen, you come to consider not only the responsibility which lies upon the minister who has to do an act of justice when impending danger stares us in the face, but we have also to consider that we have a duty in this matter—that we ought to exercise not only our wealth and influence, but our intelligence to compel such measures. (Hear, hear, and great applause.) We have gone on for seven years existing upon Free Trade. Do not take it for granted that because the sliding scale will be removed for a moment that you then get quit of it. Beware lest political tricksters come together, and removing the sliding scale, fix upon you a fixed duty. (Hear, hear.) You have been working seven years to get quit of the sliding scale. It is not gone yet, but hereafter you may have to work seven years more to get rid of a fixed duty. (Hear, hear.) Therefore it is imperative upon you that you bestir yourselves strenuously to prevent those awful calamities which may fall upon our countrymen, if the price of corn is not speedily reduced and the impending danger removed. Mr. Cobden has wisely told you the way in which this is to be done,—by an appeal to the registry. I will now tell you what has been done already by argument, and by pleading the cause of justice. We have removed from the protectionists all those pleas which they rested upon when they first started into existence as a body. They talked of inundating the country with foreign corn. Nobody talks about that now. They spoke of breaking faith with the national creditor. Nobody cries out about that now. They spoke of many other burdens, more especially the burdens upon land, but they can't find them. (Laughter.) And where are those men who came forward with those arguments? What has become of the upholders of monopoly? Where are the advocates we once heard of, so noisy? (Hear, hear, and applause.) What has become of Dr. Sleight and his master—you know whom I mean? (Laughter.) Where is Dr. Sleight? Gone. Where are Mr. Game Day and Mr. Feargus O'Connor? (Hear, hear.) Well, then, gentlemen, if this has been done by argument, I trust that full and ample justice will be done, and that we shall not be content to take for the next seven years a fixed duty. (Hear, hear.) Who are the parties now whom we have to contend with? Mr. Cobden has summed them up into a very small compass, as far as regards the House of Commons. I believe they are very few, exceedingly few; for those who are themselves practical agriculturists now insist that Free Trade is the best thing they could have for the agriculturists themselves (hear, hear); and those proprietors who have their title-deeds at home are not afraid to encounter Free Trade (laughter); but there is a small and noisy party of men who go in the name of possessing land, but who have it in their possession mainly for a political object, or for keeping up a great head of game,—those are the noisy men you have to deal with. (Hear, hear.) Now, gentlemen, consider for a moment what are the powers and appliances you have at your disposal to deal with them. The order to which you belong little knows the responsibility attaching to it; you little know the moral force you have in your own power. (Hear, hear.) You have been trained to the exercise of it for a short time. I should be glad, if suffering were not involved, if you had another seven years' apprenticeship. You have now gone so far as to convince the thinking portion of the country, and if the young Free Traders of Manchester, Liverpool, and Leeds, had to work seven years longer, they would show to the world that Free Trade principles are good, not only here, but everywhere. (Hear, hear, and applause.) I know that, in anticipating another seven years of agitation in the diffusion of intelligence, I am anticipating that which I have no right to claim on the part of those who have done their duty in their day. I know there are around me those whose cheeks are furrowed with the exercise of the last seven years, but I fully believe they will endure another seven years' labour, if such were needful, in the same cause. (Applause.) And there are those who have made large sacrifices, pecuniary sacrifices, I mean, in carrying out this object. (Hear, hear.) You have not yet spent a quarter of a million in exposing those fallacies and untruths, you have not spent that sum in getting rid of the grievous injustice you have endured; and if you take another quarter of a million to get rid of it, it will be the cheapest purchase you ever made in your lives. (Hear, hear.) I will not detain you, but I will remind you of your responsibilities. We have not failed to remind the premier of his—let us not forget to remind you of yours. I cannot lay claim for you that you have been the parties to promote the speed of the race-horse, but I do claim for you, and the party to whom you belong, that you are the order which has given speed to the steam-engine, and from that—shall I say potentate, or power?—that great civiliser of mankind, comes all the wealth and importance that we see around; and shall that wealth and importance be snatched by the hands of a few? and will you, who have risen up from an order which has the civilising of mankind to the ends of the earth, mind that that power which you hold is not laid hold of by a power which has hitherto been thought stronger, but which is far feebler, than that which you possess. (Hear, hear.) I therefore implore you, as you would spare the people around you from impending famine, to bestir yourselves, and act forcibly as one man, and the sliding scale and fixed duty are for ever done with. (Great applause.)

The CHAIRMAN: I have now great pleasure in calling upon Mr. Bright.

JOHN BRIGHT, Esq., M.P., then came forward, amid loud and long-continued cheering, and said: Mr. Chairman,—On looking back over the seven years during which we have laboured in this great cause, I am led, irresistibly, to the conclusion, that there are many thousands of members and friends of the Anti-Corn-Law League, who have been from the first stimulated and sustained by a deep conviction of the sordid, the cruel, and the unnatural character of the enactment which they have striven to repeal. (Hear, hear.) Impressed with this feeling, they have struggled with higher motives than those low and party considerations which too often influence those engaged in political contests. I have felt from the first, and I feel now more than ever, that this cause is too great and too holy, too important for this country, and too momentous for the world, for us to allow anything but the highest motives to stimulate us in the labours we undertake. (Hear, hear, and cheers.) At this moment, all around us is strengthening the conviction of former years; all around us is telling us, in a voice louder than ever, that every word of reproach, that every harsh saying, which we have uttered against the Corn Law, has not by any means conveyed its true character as it is now exhibited before us. (Hear, hear, and cheers.) The present state of feeling throughout the country is one that we must all understand—one of distrust and alarm. And why? Is it because the price of provisions is rising, and that there is an apprehended scarcity before us? It has been said that the Corn Law was a law to secure plenty, and to secure it from our own soil. If that be true, then in this hour of apprehended scarcity, of distrust, and alarm, what is there to which we should so readily turn, in the hope of relief, as to this very Corn Law, which has been pronounced to be the height of legislative wisdom. (Hear, hear.) And yet no man looks to the Corn Law to save us from this evil. (Hear, hear, and No.) Every man now is filled with the opinion that this law, which has been palmed upon the people as a law to secure plenty, has in reality been passed for the express purpose of enacting scarcity. (Cheers.) And when our object for years past has been to repeal this law, we have been met by men in every grade of society, from the highest to the lowest, and by the monopolist organs of the press, with the assertion, that upon its continuance depended the prosperity of the country. (Hear, hear.) They have said especially, that without this law there could be no good home trade; and yet everybody now knows that there is nothing which endangers the continuance of a good home trade, so much as the occurrence of the present apprehended scarcity. (Hear, hear.) They said that it was necessary to have high prices of provisions to remunerate the farmer, and that high prices of provisions would give us all high prices for every thing that we had to sell (hear, hear); and yet, just in proportion as provisions rise, that state of things occurs under which the price of all the productions of the industry of the people must inevitably fall. (Hear, hear, and cheers.) They said that the high price of provisions would give high prices to the manufacturers, steady employment to the operatives in all the branches of industry, and high wages to them; and yet we find that the manufacturers already are looking to a diminution of the prosperity of the last 12 months. Workmen are not now so sanguine of a further rise in wages as they were three months ago. (Hear, hear.) There is a consciousness in the public mind that every statement which has been made by the monopolists is going to be falsified, and falsified to such an extent that the blindest men may see, and the deafest may hear, and the most obstinate may understand, what it is upon which depends the prosperity or the suffering of the great mass of population of our country. (Great cheering.) The Corn Law—this Corn Law especially—is a pet law. (Laughter.) It was passed at a time when there was great anxiety on the subject; it was passed avowedly to remedy the evils of the old law, to prevent an excessive rise of prices—to prevent gambling in corn; to put down the Anti-Corn-Law League. (Laughter.) This law is now working; you have it before you, as if it were some model machine (hear, hear), but you don't see the inventor pointing out the beautiful execution of his machine. (Laughter and cheers.) Is there a man living, of ordinary intelligence, who has observed the working of the protective system for the last 30 years who did not know when this law was passed that it was but a fair-weather law? (Hear, hear.) It was like many a vessel which may put out to sea when the sun shines, and there is a light wind, and there are no rocks, and no breakers a-head; but it cannot stand a gale; no, it even now totters and trembles when there is but the prospect of a gale. (Immense applause.) Prices now are reaching what the protectionists call a remunerating point. (Laughter.) Sir Robert Peel, in bringing forward this law, said that he wished to remove the superfluous protection, and to give, as far as legislation can give to the cultivators of the soil—(that is to the landlords, who are not cultivators)—(hear, hear)—a price ranging from 54s. to 58s. per quarter. Well, what is the average price now? Not more than 58s., but somewhere between the very points which he named as those which this law was intended to keep as the permanent price of corn. Well, then, Sir R. Peel would say (any man would say), that this law had exactly served its purpose (hear, hear), that the price of corn is that which the promoter and framer of this law promised to the farmers; and yet, people are very much afraid of scarcity. (Hear, hear.) We have had rain; up to the middle of August, rain for weeks; not ordinary rain, but torrents. Then we had three weeks of fine weather, and one of the Members for Oxfordshire said, at an agricultural meeting, that he rejoiced that, owing to the fine weather, prices had not risen to such a point as to make it extremely inconvenient for those who were anxious to maintain the Corn Laws. (Laughter.) But after three weeks' fine weather, it pleased Providence again to send us heavy showers. The result is, that a very large proportion of the wheat in various parts of the country, but especially in the north, is in an exceedingly bad condition. This inferior wheat is brought into the market; sold in far larger quantities than the good wheat, reduces the average price to 56s. or 57s., and keeps the duty up at 17s.; whilst good wheat is selling from 55s. to 65s., and some even as high as 75s. a quarter. (Hear, hear, and cheers.) But the sliding scale has effectually put a stop (or rather this Corn Law has put a stop) to the gambling in corn. Time was when all the hostility of the monopolist press was directed to those unfortunate, but praiseworthy, individuals, who, when there is a prospect of scarcity, are venturesome enough to bring us a supply from abroad. But under this law, the boldest men dare not import corn. That is the object of the law; and now, when it is fulfilling its end, and we have only about 500,000 quarters of wheat in the bonding warehouses, the newspapers are saying, "How strange it is that those men who aforetime have brought us corn; those men, who, in former years, have been the special safeguards of the country, have this year not come to our relief?" The law intended that they should not come to our relief; and it is now working precisely as was intended by its authors. It is to prevent a trade in corn (hear, hear); to make you and your fellow-men—the 27 millions—work, and work, and work, and scramble, and scramble, and starve it may be—aye, in order that out of the produce of your industry—of the scanty wages of the many, something may be taken by law, and handed over to the rich and to the great, by whom the law was made. (Hear, hear, and great cheering.) But, if prices are rising to the remunerating point, according to the protectionist doctrines everything else should be rising. But the city articles of the morning papers are remarkably unanimous as to the price of funds; they are down considerably. They are not less unanimous as to the price of railway stock (hear, hear, and laughter); and the feeling of every individual in this meeting, and the universal feeling throughout all the manufacturing districts of the kingdom, is, that from the circumstance that the price of provisions is so rapidly rising, there must, if it continues, very rapidly come a great and disastrous change in the state of trade. (Hear, hear.) The Standard newspaper, which alternates between an affectation of superior piety (laughter), and the most unblushing effrontery and audacity in its statements, the Standard has at last found out that in this realm of England, beneath the benignant sceptre of the Queen, under the guidance of such a statesman as has had no rival since the days of Chatham (hear, hear), that no human being, no one of her majesty's subjects, must perish of hunger. (Hear, hear.) We have said for seven years that Providence did not intend that man should perish of hunger. (Hear, hear.) We have pointed to all the material riches which are around us; and to the riches of the industry and the skill of the people, as a means of perpetual supply and abundance. The Standard has for seven years heaped all its slanders, and poured out all its venom, especially upon the men who have been accustomed to address you from this platform (hear, hear), and on no other ground than this that we asked that we might all possess that simple right, the right which was given to us from on high, that right which, with your help, shall not much longer be kept from us (cheerful and reiterated cheering, in which the concluding words were lost.) The Standard has summed up, without intermission, a law whose especial object was to bring about such a state of things that, though the rich might have enough, and the moderately rich might not starve, still the poorest of the poor must necessarily be driven into the earth. (Hear, hear.) Now, what are the impending dangers which everybody talks about? for almost every man that one meets has a peculiar sharpness about his look. (Laughter.) There is an extraordinary earnestness in looking at the newsmen; one subject is the topic of almost every conversation. Is it because the grain market is deficient, and the potato crop throughout the country, but especially in Ireland, is pronounced a failure? This is not a new visitation. I am not old enough to recollect how people looked when there was a failure of the potato crop in Ireland before; but I feel quite certain that so long as I live, I shall never forget the way in which people look and speak at the present time. (Hear, hear.) We have had visitations of scarcity before; from 1816 to 1819 we had very high prices—the average price of wheat being 80s. a quarter; and many here will remember, the state of the country, and especially of the northern districts at that time. We all remember one very celebrated, but ever to be deplored event, which took place near this spot in the year 1819. (Hear, hear.) Many will recollect that great numbers of their countrymen were sent to foreign lands; some suffered upon the scaffold—(hear, hear);—evils of the most fearful character threatened the country. Another period somewhat similar came from 1822 to 1823, when the average price of wheat was 64s. a quarter; and we can all recollect the state of the southern counties then. (Hear, hear.) Were they not lit up, night after night, with the blaze of the incendiary? (Hear, hear.) Were not many men tried before a special commission—transported, hanged? We have had a time still later, from 1838 to 1842, when the price of wheat averaged 60s. a quarter; at that time we all know what happened—we had a new corn law, for the old one was found no longer tenable, and we had something like an insurrection throughout this and the neighbouring country. (Hear, hear.) Are we never to learn anything? or, if we do, shall we for ever fail to teach our rulers? (Hear, hear.) We are now in 1845. I cannot go on and add three years to it, and tell you what has taken place, or what will take place in the coming three years; but, if the three periods of which I have spoken have taught us such a lesson, shall we not discover in the present, and in the symptoms of the present, that there are dangers, and great dangers ahead? (Hear, hear.) The future is before us, unknown to us; but we can gather much of what it will be from the lessons of the past. (Hear, hear.) But all facts and all arguments seem lost upon some men. We had no interest beyond the interests of our country in this question. Who is there I should like to know connected with the League, who finds himself a gainer by the agitation which has taken place? We did not come into existence as an organization to overthrow the Whig ministry then in power, or to install into office the men who are now in power. We did not ask that a monopoly should be done away with, which pressed upon us only, and that some peculiar privileges should be given to us. We did not ask that we should go to Parliament, although accident has sent some of us there. (Applause.) What we wanted from the first was, that this unnatural and iniquitous law should be denounced on all hands, and repealed by the power of the legislature, and that the people throughout this country, and ultimately throughout the world, should have freedom to work, and freedom to earn, and freedom to spend and to enjoy. (Hear, hear, and great cheering.) It is consolatory, however, to find that difficult as it has been to teach some men, at this hour there is a much greater teacher than we are at work; it has pleased Providence to surround us with difficulties of no ordinary character; and many who for seven years have been deaf to all argument, are now looking anxiously at each other, and wishing that this great question were once well settled. (Hear, hear, and cheers.) Just observe the condition in which we are placed. Sir James Graham, a little while before the end of the last session of Parliament, boasted that there were 450,000 quarters of grain in bond, because some years ago there happened to be a smaller quantity than that. Why, it is but a week's consumption; it is not anything to rely greatly upon. He actually twitted Lord John Russell with having unnecessary fears; and he said he thought the noble lord must be drawing his arguments and forming his conclusions from some few clouds or mists which he had seen on the Surrey hills. There may be clouds and mists now before Sir James Graham's eye (hear, hear); and he may learn a lesson which statesmen should always learn, that when a man of known character and ability, like Lord John Russell, stands forward to point out the dangers which are ahead, that it becomes a statesman, though in office, to hear with attention, and not to meet counsel and warning with ridicule such as this. We have no corn, then, in bond, and there is very little on the Continent for us to buy. (Hear, hear.) You have heard already that other countries have prohibited the exportation of corn from the high prices and scarcity existing in them. Now, if at the present moment the Corn Laws were abolished, every quarter of grain we should get from abroad could only be brought here at a very high price. If the ports are opened, there will be a scramble over Europe for grain to bring to England; for as we are the wealthiest nation, we should be first supplied in the world's market. But what are the consequences to the people abroad? Prices rise there unaturally, and high prices there produce precisely the same effect as they do here. (Hear, hear.) And when manufacturers and mechanics wish to send out their cloth and their yarn to the Continent of Europe, they will find the people there paying 2s. 6d. for their flour instead of 1s. 8d., and having just so much less with which to purchase the manufactures usually exported from this country. (Cheers.) Some two years ago a gentleman, a doctor, I believe—whether of divinity or law I know not—spoke of some millions of our population who "rejoiced in potatoes." Many unthinking men might fancy that was not a very lamentable condition; but now they find out their mistake. How comes it that such a large portion of the population of this kingdom, I will not say "rejoice," but exist mainly on potatoes? Time was, when our forefathers did not eat many potatoes. The time will come, I trust, by the exertions of this League, when our posterity shall only eat potatoes, and shall have as much bread as is necessary for them. (Cheers.) But under present circumstances, with five millions at least of the population in Ireland, and a very large number in England living upon potatoes—if potatoes fail, is there anything else to which they can go? Where is there a lower food? Is there anything between potatoes and hunger and starvation? (Hear.) It is an easy thing to talk of famine. I have often tried to picture to myself what famine is; but the human mind is not capable of drawing any form or any scene that will realise the horrors which are included in that term. The men who made the Corn Law are totally ignorant of what it means. The agricultural labourers know something of it in some counties—the worst famished counties in the kingdom; aye, and there are some hand-loom weavers in Lancashire who know what it is. I saw the other night, late at night, a light in a cottage window, and the loom busy at work, the shuttle flying rapidly. It ought to have a cheerful sound, and naturally it has a cheerful sound; but when it is at work near midnight, when there is care upon the brow of the workman, lest he should not be able to secure that which will maintain his wife and his children, then there is a forebode of that which is meant by the term "famine." (Hear.) Oh, if these men who made the Corn Law, if these men who step in between the Creator and his creatures, could for only one short twelvemonth—(I would inflict upon them no harder punishment for all their guilt)—if they for one single twelvemonth might sit at the loom and throw the shuttle (great cheering)—I will not ask that they should have the rest of the evils; I will not ask that they should be torn by the harrowing feelings which must exist when a beloved wife and helpless children are suffering the horrors which this Corn Law has inflicted upon millions. (Renewed cheering.) But famine in Ireland is found to be very serious. There, if it come, it will come to vast multitudes; for there is no great middle class, and no capitalist class, which can keep the people employed, and feed them, though it be scantily, during a period of scarcity. Famine becomes a serious thing to men at head quarters, not when one weaver starves quietly, but when multitudes are involved, for multitudes will never starve quietly. (Hear.) The cord is now stretched, and it may be stretched too far; it may break. It is this which causes anxiety to Government; it is this, if anything, which will cause them to open the ports first, and to repeal the Corn Law afterwards. The evil which now exists cannot be prevented, but it may be greatly mitigated. Suppose that we had had no Corn Law, how changed would have been our position! I saw a circular to-day from a Liverpool cotton broker, from which it appears, that in Liverpool we have at least eight or nine months' stock of cotton, an article that comes almost entirely from one country, and at the same time another and a very large crop is being gathered in the United States, and is now coming down to the ports for shipment to Great Britain. We have from one to two years' stock of tea in the country; a large supply of coffee, of indigo, and of spices of various kinds. How comes it that these things find their way to England, and that Englishmen find the market well supplied with them; and yet, that of this article of food, without which man cannot live, there is almost a perpetual scarcity? How do these other articles come here? Your merchants send for them, or foreign merchants send them here; your ships bring them; your sailors navigate the ships that bring them. All the means by which the treasures of the world are ransacked for your supply are just as much at your command to bring you grain from every country under heaven—for there is no country probably in which wheat will not grow—and it is just that article of all others which you might bring to this country from any other country, and you would be sure to find a market for it. (Cheers.) All this is very plain; I am almost ashamed to re-state these things at this meeting; I feel that instead of our being the teachers and professors, and you the students in this school of political economy, we are here all upon a level, and all fit to go forth as apostles and missionaries in this great cause; yet we must reiterate these things until the hour when the Corn Law shall be abolished; and then we must reiterate them, that the world may know the principles upon which the Legislature and the people of this country have at length acted. The scarcity which now threatens us has found in the minds of almost all men a very ready remedy. Of all things the Corn Law will soon be the most despised and hated. It stands in the position of a man who is universally suspected. (Laughter.) If anybody has lost anything, the chances are that it is in that man's pocket. (Laughter.) If any calamity befall the country all men turn at once to the Corn Law; even those who have been cherishing it as our greatest safeguard. The newspapers are now decrying it; a noble lord, you have heard, has written a letter against it, and he attributes its coming destruction to destiny. (Laughter.) Perhaps it was destiny that put on the Corn Law? No; it was noble lords and great landed proprietors, who happened to govern a hoodwinked people, who passed that law; but now we are no longer hoodwinked; we know quite as much of this law as any noble lord or great landed proprietor; and it is precisely because we know it and understand its working from beginning to end that the destiny of the Corn Law is fixed. (Loud cheers.) I take it that Sir Robert Peel will open the ports. (Hear, hear.) I cannot imagine that if there be any truth in the statements which we have heard from Ireland, he can long hesitate as to his course. A Cabinet Council, it is said, is called for Friday; but we must not trust to accidents of seasons, or to Cabinet Councils; there will be something more to be done, and something very serious; there is not the smallest doubt but some of those who would gladly see the ports open, think that that measure would be sufficient to still the coming storm; and then when it is just passed over, the door would shut again, as of old, and we should go on quietly as before. They much mistake the character of this agitation who suppose for a moment that any rag of the Corn Law can long continue to exist. (Great cheers.) We know quite well the position of the question now; and if we may judge of it by the course which every other great question has taken, we may be assured that the destiny of the Corn Law is fixed. But I have seen one or two other questions which, when they have approached their settlement, have been short of a complete and honest and just settlement, because men did not adhere to the principles which had animated them in their agitation. (Hear, hear.) I think it will not be so with the Anti-Corn-Law League. (Hear, hear.) It is their oppressions that have made this League; and so long as there shall be but a feather's weight pressing upon the industry of the people of this country—so long as one ounce of food shall be kept beyond the shores of Britain by legislative enactment—so long, I believe, there will be determination enough in this country, and in the counties which you have led, to rise up and protest against such an invasion of your rights. (Loud cheering.) Of conviction throughout the country there is enough to do anything with the Corn Law—except to keep any of it on. (Hear.) Every town is almost unanimous; many intelligent landlords are with us; nearly every intelligent and first-rate farmer is friendly to our views;—how then should it happen that there is a danger that any of the Corn Law should be left on? Because we trust to men that are at head-quarters. (Hear.) Some men think that Sir Robert Peel, at some time ago he assumed a partnership with Providence in giving us two or three years of good trade, may be safely relied upon in this hour of our necessities. Others think that what Lord J. Russell pointed out, if a fixed duty of 3s. 4s. or 5s. could be had, there could be no harm in taking that which so wise a man recommended. (Hear.) Now recollect that these wise men supported the Corn Law from 1815 downward; that they were instrumental in passing it and in defending it; recollect that they never found out it was a bad law till we told them so, in a voice that was not to be misunderstood. (Hear, and great applause.) Then you may conclude from this, that if we relax in our exertions—if this League were to settle down, and we were all to go back to our homes and counting-houses,—no more meetings, no more lectures, and especially no more county qualifications—the chances are a thousand to one, and far greater, that our children and our children's children would have to suffer under that great abandonment of duty of which we should be guilty. (Hear.) Well, then, I will not put a resolution to this meeting; but I will assume that it is the universal opinion of this meeting, and of all the members and friends of the Anti-Corn-Law League throughout Great Britain and Ireland, that the Corn Law, whether as a prohibitive law, or as a sliding-scale of certain amount, or as a scale of somewhat smaller dimensions, has been proved to be a law destructive of the true interests of the great mass of the people, and delusive even to those for whose especial benefit it was said to be passed. (Applause.) And further, that having had so long experience of this law, we are not disposed to have any more of its character, any of its knismen, even of the most distant relationship; but the whole family, from beginning to end, shall be for ever expatriated and driven from these islands. (Loud and continued cheering.) Sir R. Peel would greatly rejoice his greatest political opponents if he would propose a fixed duty. He has argued against it most conclusively; he has been charged with having run away with the Whig garments; and certainly that charge would be true to the very letter, if, after all he has said and all he has learned, he were to come down to the House of Commons, and ask the Whigs to help him to put on the Whig fixed duty. (Hear.) I do not believe that Sir Robert Peel is such a child in statesmanship as to do that. From all I have been able to see and read of him, I have come to the conclusion, that whatever his faults may be as a statesman, he does hope that future times shall speak of him as a man who did some good to the country over which he was called to rule. He has stated that he does look to the time when his name is to be read amongst those who are not wholly to be despised by posterity. Then, is there in the whole range of politics, of legislative action, any single question upon which he could base so great a name as on this? Is there any principle so worthy of the highest statesmanship, and the purest patriotism? I have some hope that Sir Robert Peel will see this; that he will not fall into the trap which his political adversaries have set for him; that he will not support that principle of a fixed duty which he has constantly for the last two years said was altogether unsound and untenable; but that, as his policy has been signalled by relaxations in the commercial code, he will now complete the work he has begun, by carrying out fully upon the statute-book a principle so essential to his country's safety. (Applause.) It rests with us to say whether he shall do so or not. (Hear.) We have no change of tactics to offer you. We have no sudden blow to propose by which we hope to abolish the Corn Law. Seven years' work, and the results of seven years' work, have shown how far we have acted wisely. There must be no faltering for the future; everything that is past stimulates us to go on in the same course. Some two years ago, I believe it was, that the collection of a large sum of money brought out the declaration that the League was a great fact. We knew it at the time (laughter); we have worked that it should become a great fact; it is a much greater fact now than it was then. (Cheers, and laughter.) And if the collection of that sum was sufficient to cause such a declaration, I have no doubt that if necessity be shown for it, we could collect a much larger sum now, and call forth, if need be, a still stronger declaration. (Great cheering.) But still I look more to the spontaneous and ardent action of the people. (Hear.) The money which they subscribed is an undeniable test of their zeal; but there is another that is not less so, and that is in continuous action in their several localities. (Hear.) We have not heard much from the monopolist press as to our county registration, for very good reasons. The Standard had a paragraph when the Middlesex registration was concluded, which amused me greatly. He said: "Yesterday the Middlesex registration closed at such a place (naming one of the districts). We may just say in passing, that this year's registration has not been signalled by any of those remarkable and interesting features by which several other preceding registrations had been distinguished." (Laughter.) One only remarkable thing was this, that the Free Traders had obtained a majority of between 1500 and 1600 upon the registration for Middlesex. (Hear, and applause.) Well, now, Colonel Wood, who sits for Middlesex, knows quite well—as well as I do—that his day for Middlesex is gone; and that, if he means to go to Parliament again, as a protectionist, he must look out for some place where Free Traders cannot disturb him. (Laughter.) If South Lancashire, the West Riding of Yorkshire, North Lancashire, North Cheshire, Middlesex, and South Staffordshire,—if these counties and divisions of counties are ready to pronounce in favour of Free Trade by the return of men who are members and friends of the Anti-Corn-Law League to Parliament at the next election—it is producing its effect now on the mind of Sir R. Peel. (Hear.) He is not the man to stop till the election comes; he knows that if the votes be on the register, the men will be in the House of Commons; and you may rely upon it that there has never been in the lifetime of the oldest man amongst us, nor for generations back, any lever so potent, so all-overturning of evils in legislation, as this scheme of the 40s. freeholds for the counties. (Applause.) Oh, I wish it were spread all over the kingdom; I wish Scotland had the 40s. freeholds; I have been there lately, and I come back with the warmest admiration for a people who have a love of freedom which I fear we cannot equal. They have no 40s. freeholds; if they had, I believe there is not a county in Scotland that would at the next election return a monopolist to Parliament. We have the weapon here; their hands are tied. Let us keep this weapon bright; let us use it bravely; and you may rely upon it that no trick of statesmanship, no combination of parties, no power of the sordid oligarchy by which the Corn Law was passed, can in any degree turn back that weapon, or prevent it from winning for the people of this country every right to which they are entitled. (Great cheering.) Not a week ago this hall was filled by a meeting almost as large as this—a meeting which, I cannot but think, had an object kindred to our own. (Hear, hear.) We would feel the boy; we would give every man the means of living; they would give to every man the means of cultivating that which is of more value than the body. On that occasion the distinguished chairman, in a speech which I heard with more interest than I can possibly express, alluded to the unfortunate poet, Chatterton, whom he spoke of as “the wondrous boy of Bristol.” That “wondrous boy,” when not more than 16 or 17 years of age, wrote a poem which he styled “A Prophecy,” and not inaptly styled it, for the prophecy is always a prophet. (Hear, hear.) He said—

“Commerce o’er Bondage shall prevail,
Free as the winds that fill her sail;
When she complains of vile restraint,
And power is deaf to her complaint,
Look up, ye Britons! cease to sigh,
For your redemption draweth nigh.”

(Much cheering.) He some eighty years ago foresaw a day when, through the spread of manufactures and commerce, there would be a new people created in this kingdom, and with a new people a new mind, and with a new mind a new power—a power which should cope with the elements of despotism, which he saw then gathering and strengthening themselves for the enslavement of his country. (Hear, hear.) Now, it comes to us to fulfil that which he foretold. This hall in which we are assembled is consecrated to freedom. Who is there in this kingdom who does not look at times to the Free Trade Hall of Manchester, either with fear that he may be deprived of something that he unjustly holds, or with hope that, from it shall go forth a voice which shall ring from side to side, and shall pronounce the doom of the very worst law that ever disgraced the statute book of this country? (Cheers.) We have worked for seven years, and we have been trusted. We may have made blunders, but we have wished to do honestly and wisely—(cheers)—I dare say we have far more confidence placed in us than we deserve (No, no.); but at any rate we strive to deserve all we have. (Cheers.) Rely upon it, if you will go on as you have gone for seven years past, every year increasing in strength, there are none of those who have championed your cause, and to whom you have entrusted the carrying out of your will, who will for a moment withdraw from this contest, until it shall be completely won. (Renewed cheers.) We war not with any right of any man; we war with a law which all men are beginning to doubt, and which most intelligent and good men hate. We want to substitute for that law the original charter, by which men have a right to live and to labour, and to enjoy the fruits of their earnings—“And God said, behold I have given you every herb bearing seed which is upon the face of all the earth, and every tree, in the which is the fruit of a tree yielding seed, to you it shall be for meat.” Was this Scripture written only for our first parents? Was it intended only for those who should inhabit that, to us, most distant land, or was it an universal promise and benediction? Was it not given forth by inspiration that mankind, till the end of time, till the world should be wrapt in flame, should trust in Him, who gave that promise? And if we thus believe—how dreadful the abandonment of duty, how awful the crime, not less than that of those who made the Corn Law, if we turn back from our place, if we fail in the work we have set ourselves, which is to abolish the law that restricts the bounty of Providence, and to establish this original and heaven-given law, which will give plenty to all the earth!—The honourable gentleman resumed his seat amidst most enthusiastic cheers.

Mr. John Brooks said, he rose for the purpose of proposing a vote of thanks to the gentlemen who had delighted the meeting by their eloquent addresses. Mr. Bright had remarked, most truly, that the sliding-scale of Sir Robert Peel was worse than the old law. Mr. Bright, Mr. Ashworth, and himself, were of the deputation sent up to oppose the sliding scale, and he (Mr. Brooks) told Lord Ripon, the president of the Board of Trade, that it was infinitely worse than the old law. Mr. Gladstone was present at the time, and said immediately, “How do you make that out, Mr. Brooks?” To that he (Mr. Brooks) replied, “I’ll make it out in a minute.” (Cheers, and great laughter.) He told him that the old scale had a jump in it, and admitted corn before it came to a starvation price; but that the present was a dragging scale, which made a full stop in the middle, and made the trade in corn so uncertain that speculators were afraid of entering into it, and thus the people would be left for two or three months, with bread at a famine price, before supplies would be sent in. This was what he told Mr. Gladstone, and the truth of his statement might be soon realised. In the old law there was a jump; but there was a wide difference between jumping and standing still. (Great laughter.) He was aware the ladies would expect him to say something about sugar (continued laughter), but upon that point he would be very brief. The duty upon sugar was different from that upon tea. Tea paid so much per pound, and was continued the same from year to year, but which agreed to sugar, the duty was fixed every year. Now when Sir Robert Peel came into office in 1841, and began his tripping with the tariff, he refused to grapple manfully with the sugar question. He knew the Whigs were knocked out of office by a sugar hoghead, and therefore he was afraid of meeting a similar fate. (Cheers and laughter.) Sir Robert altered the Corn Law because he knew he had the League to back him; in fact, he was standing upon the League line at the present time, and if he did his duty they would prove his last friends. (Cheers and laughter.) The movement in favour of the 40s. franchise was making its way nobly; and he was proud to say that he had been appointed president of the “Freehold Building Society,” and that the next at the Mechanics’ Institution on the first Wednesday evening of every month, where he would be happy to see any one who wanted to secure himself the franchise. His own men at Sunny-side had subscribed for 91 shares, and he trusted that thousands of working men would follow their example. (Cheers.) Mr. Brooks concluded by moving a vote of thanks to Messrs. Cobden, Bright, and Ashworth, for the address they had delivered.

Mr. Rawson seconded the motion, which was carried amidst the most enthusiastic cheering, and the meeting broke up a few minutes before 10 o’clock.

South Australian journals to the 17th of June state that the colony was going on prosperously. The country is ascertained to be rich in copper and iron, and indications of coal have been lately met with.

DINNER TO SIR W. MOLESWORTH.

On Wednesday evening a public dinner was given at the Bridge-house Hotel, London-bridge, to Sir William Molesworth, Bart., M.P., in celebration of his return as member of Parliament for the borough of Southwark. By the appointed hour, which was five o’clock, the dinner-room was crowded to excess. About half past four Sir William Molesworth entered the room, accompanied by Emanuel Cooper, Esq., who acted as chairman on the occasion, W. D. Christie, Esq., M.P., Cartwright Ellis, Esq., William Wilson, Esq., William Wansley, Esq., Dr. Eliston, — Dappa, Esq., John Vowsley, Esq., H. Sturmy, Esq., and other gentlemen, who, on taking their seats, ranged themselves on either side of the chair. The hon. baronet, on making his appearance, was received with repeated rounds of cheers, and seemed perfectly recovered from the effects of his late indisposition.

About 300 electors of the borough sat down to a very sumptuous entertainment, served up in a style which reflected great credit on the management of the house.

John Bright, Esq., M.P., entered the room about half-past seven o’clock, having just arrived by train from Manchester, and was received with rounds of applause.

On the removal of the cloth, the usual loyal toasts were given from the chair and duly responded to.

The CHAIRMAN then rose, and in a eulogistic speech gave the health of Sir William Molesworth, which was drunk with loud and repeated plaudits.

Sir WILLIAM MOLESWORTH responded in a long and eloquent speech. He congratulated the electors on the great progress those principles had made to represent which they had returned him to Parliament. He pointed to the many indications of the rapid advances society was making in knowledge and civilisation, and the practical application of science in England to the uses of daily life. He dwelt especially on the great utility of rapid communication, and the effects of railroads in promoting commerce and manufactures; and showed that they would constitute in every community a most powerful party, exercising great influence over public opinion, and using that influence in favour of Free Trade. (Loud cheers.) I look upon the extension of railways (said the hon. baronet) throughout this country and the continent of Europe—I consider the daily augmenting of steam navigation of the rivers, the seas, and the ocean, as the sure forerunners of universal Free Trade. It is the duty of this country, which, as I have always said, is the first in the world in practical affairs, to take the lead, and to make the first great steps towards Free Trade. We are pre-eminently the manufacturing people of Europe—we possess more capital, more skilful and laborious citizens than any other nation—we have all but inexhaustible means of producing cheaply and well every description of manufactured goods. All that we want is to exchange our goods for the productions of other countries. For this we possess every facility—we have every convenience: railroads by land, fleets of merchantmen on the sea, steamers traversing the ocean. What more do we require? I answer, permission to buy—abolition of protecting duties—Free Trade with the nations of the earth. (Great cheering.) You have sent me to Parliament to support Free Trade; I will do so to the utmost of my power—(hear)—in the firm hope and belief that at no distant period our efforts will be crowned with success. (Hear, hear.) Everything indicates a great change in public opinion on the subject of Free Trade; and that change is most striking amongst the members of the Conservative party in the House of Commons. (Hear.) A short time ago they were almost to a man opposed to Free Trade. During the last Parliament they constituted a great and powerful party, firmly cemented together—if not by principle, yet by interest concealed under the semblance of principle: they were sufficiently strong to obstruct or defeat every liberal measure, and to overthrow the existing government. At the last general election, with the tacit consent of their leader, they offered themselves to the agricultural constituencies as the peculiar friends of the farmer, and declared themselves opposed to Free Trade, and to any alteration of the Corn Laws. (Hear, hear.) Since that period, reason, experience, and Sir Robert Peel—(hear, hear, and laughter)—have worked a great and beneficial change in the opinions of a large portion of the Conservative party. The more prudent, intelligent, and reflecting men amongst them have supported the commercial policy of the prime minister by their votes and speeches in favour of that policy. They have renounced the doctrines of protection, and are gradually becoming Free Traders. The rest of that party, composed chiefly of men stupidly honest, devoted to their narrow prejudices, and ignorant of the signs of the times, together with some needy or disappointed adventurers, are now loud in their lamentations, and ridiculous by their complaints of being deceived, deserted, and forlorn. As a party opposed to Free Trade the Conservatives are disunited, broken to pieces, and politically defunct. (Cheers.) The question of Free Trade, and especially of Free Trade in food, is at the present moment of urgent importance. (Hear, hear.) It is now, I am sorry to say, but too certain that the harvest is deficient; that in many parts of England the crops have been injured by the weather, and are inferior both in quantity and in quality. In addition to this, the potato crops have in many places entirely failed. The consequence will be, that before long food will be scarce; and I am afraid that it will be difficult to obtain any considerable supply of food from abroad; for, in consequence of our Corn Laws, the countries best fitted to produce corn do not grow corn for our market, but only attempt to raise a quantity sufficient for their own ordinary consumption; and it appears that, unfortunately, at the present moment the crops are likewise deficient in those countries. Consequently their inhabitants, who have hardly corn enough for themselves, will have little to spare us except at a high price. (Hear, hear.) I am much afraid, therefore, that before the next harvest the price of food will considerably augment. (Hear, hear.) This will cause great distress amongst our labouring population, and may give a shock to credit, which would have a most disastrous effect at the present moment, when so much capital is engaged in railway speculations, some of them of a very questionable character. (Hear, hear.) I cannot contemplate the possibility of these events without great alarm. I hope that my anticipations may prove unfounded (hear); but if they are, as I am afraid they are, but too well founded, we shall soon have ample and painful experience of the evils and impolicy of our Corn Law. (Hear, hear.) I trust, however, that that experience will not be thrown away, that out of the evil some good may come, and that a vigorous effort will be made in the next session of Parliament to repeal the Corn Laws. (Hear, hear, hear.) So alarming, indeed, is the state of the crops, especially of the potato crops in Ireland, that, according to the Times of this morning, a cabinet council is to be immediately held for the purpose of either opening the ports for the free admission of corn, or of summoning Parliament to consider the propriety of so doing. I trust this report is well founded. It would be a wise and prudent act on the part of Government. And be assured, if the ports be once opened, we will never permit them to be closed again. (Great cheering.)

Mr. BRIGHT, M.P., who arrived by the train from Manchester towards the close of Sir W. Molesworth’s speech, was called upon to reply to the toast of “The total and immediate repeal of the Corn Laws.” The hon. gentleman was received with great acclamation, and made a long and eloquent speech, for which we regret that we cannot find space. He closed with a stirring exhortation to the Free Traders of Southwark to follow the example of the Leaguers of South Lancashire, and emancipate, by a large creation of new 40s. freeholders, the division of Surrey in which their vast population lived from the thralldom of the monopolists. The meeting (the only which took place last night at Manchester, was, in every respect, a splendid and spirit-stirring affair. At that meeting it was unanimously determined that there should be made one great—one noble and final move in favour of the cause, for the success of which they had so unflinchingly laboured. Some facts of the most important character were laid before that meeting, showing the great gain which had accrued to the League in many districts of the country, in the registrations. East Surrey was a fine field for the electors of Southwark to work upon. (Hear.) Every man before him might, if he chose, become an elector of East Surrey, and by such management the next election would place the representative of that portion of the county in hands something like those to which they had just committed the representation of their borough. (Cheers.) The register must be enlarged and purified. East Surrey must do as Southwark had done. (Hear, hear.) If the registration were properly attended to throughout the country, attended to as it had been in the north of England and in Middlesex, they would unite together a phalanx of the order of industry, in every way as noble as the order of title (cheers), before whose pressure every tyranny must give way, no matter how gigantic in its proportions, or how strong in its position. (Cheers.) They need not stop at Corn Laws, but might use the power thus constitutionally put into their hands until every other obnoxious law was removed from the statute book. Let them not neglect their opportunity. By following it up in the south, contemporaneously with their brethren in the north, they would soon be in a position to effect a revolution, thorough, glorious, and peaceful, a revolution which would entail no suffering upon those defeated, but which would, more or less, be advantageous to all. (Cheers.) He hoped, in concluding, that something would be done by them, not only to rescue their own county, but the neighbouring counties from the adverse influences to which they were now improperly subjected. The hon. gentleman resumed his seat amid great applause.

Business calling the chairman into the country, he retired at this stage of the proceedings, and William Wilson, Esq., was called to the chair in his stead.

The CHAIRMAN, in proposing the health of W. D. Christie, Esq., M.P., adverted briefly to the hon. gentleman’s exertions in behalf of education, and more especially to his endeavours to throw open the two national universities.

The toast was drunk amid cheers.

Mr. CHRISTIE returned thanks.

Several other toasts were proposed and responded to, after which the company separated.

INCENDIARY FIRE AT BARROW.—On Sunday morning last, shortly after 9 o’clock, a fire was discovered upon the farming premises of Mr. John Place, called Wolf’s Hall Farm, situate in the parish of Barrow. An alarm having been given, a barley stack was found to be in flames, and in spite of every effort to subdue the devouring element it was in a very short space of time totally destroyed. Very fortunately, a pea-stack which adjoined the stack of barley escaped without damage, the wind blowing from a favourable direction, and driving the flames contrariwise. We regret to add, there is little doubt that this fire was caused by some wicked and criminal incendiary. Two or three other fires of a similar character have recently occurred, and we cannot but apprehend that unless the utmost vigilance and decision are exerted, we may be called upon to repeat the same horrible and disastrous recitals that last year encumbered our columns.—Bury Herald.

ASHENDEN PETTY SESSIONS.—(Before T. T. Bernard, Esq., and the Revs. J. T. Baron and Thomas Martyn.)—Thomas Ridgway, of Waddesdon, was on Monday last convicted in the penalty of 5*l.*, and 10*s.* costs, and in default of payment was committed to Aylesbury gaol for three months, for having, on the 20th of March last, shot a hare on land in the occupation of Mr. Charles Simmons, of Waddesdon. George Neary, one of the Duke of Buckingham’s lookers-out, proved the charge.—Francis Longland, baker, of Preston Bissett, was charged by George Bridger, gamekeeper to the Duke of Buckingham, with having on the 18th inst., between the hours of 5 and 6 in the evening, shot at a pheasant in Gawcott wood. Defendant endeavoured by the evidence of some females to prove an alibi. In this he failed: the case was proved, and defendant ordered to pay a fine of 2*l.*, and costs 1*l.* 6*d.*, and in default of payment to be imprisoned for six weeks. The amount was paid.—Oxford Chronicle.

SALE OF THE PRINCE CONSORT’S LIVE STOCK.—The annual sale of Prince Albert’s live stock, fattened upon the Norfolk and Fensham farms, in the occupation of his Royal Highness, and Windsor Home Park, took place on Tuesday afternoon at Norfolk Farm. From the deservedly high character of the Prince’s stock, the whole of which (comprising Southdown ewes, short-horned heifers, Shetland and Highland oxen, fat hogs, &c.) were in beautiful condition, upwards of 150 of the neighbouring graziers and butchers, and several from London, attended the sale. The average prices at which the respective lots (of which there were upwards of 100) were knocked down, were as follows: 133 Southdown ewes, from 3*s.* to 37*s.* each; 16 superior ewes, 47*s.* per head; 31 splendid six-tooth wethers, 49*s.* per head; 36 excellent two-tooth wethers, 43*s.* per head; 63 superior two-tooth maiden ewes, 42*s.* per head; 100 prime wether sheep, 38*s.* per head; and four Southdown lambs realised 36*s.* each. Forty fat short-horned heifers brought from 9*l.* to 24*l.* per head; 11 small fat Shetland oxen were knocked down at from 10*l.* to 13*l.* per head; and the average of 10*l.* per head was obtained for 10 pairs of Highland oxen. The proceeds of the sale amounted to upwards of 1650*l.* At the Prince Consort’s annual sale, last year, the stock realised 1400*l.* odd.

HAMBURG, Oct. 22.—The telegraphic intelligence from Cuxhaven states that the steamer Transit has returned from sea, with the loss of a boat and other articles. 34 oxen were thrown overboard, in order to lighten the vessel.

THE BAZAAR.

Mrs. John Mayson has the pleasure to hand to the Anti-Corn Law Bazaar the sum of £71. 10s., being the produce of that part of the various articles contributed by the following ladies and gentlemen which were sold by her. The other articles sent to the Bazaar were estimated by the committee at the value of 27l. 15s. 3d., making together £98. 9s. 3d.

Mrs. Mayson, Oxford-place, about 6l. Miss M. Johnson, Park-place, Broughton, a handsome doll and other articles, value 6l. 10s. Mrs. Brooke, Bollington, about 5l. Miss Williams, Altrincham, a hand-ome shawl, value 3l. 10s. Mrs. Trenbath, Mrs. Joseph Johnson, Mrs. Clough, Miss Morris, Mrs. Berry, Misses Hounsfield, Mrs. Lendbeater, Mrs. Wm. Johnson, Miss Gray, Mrs. Krauss, Mrs. Barker, Miss Sumner. Messrs. J. and E. Waters, a very handsome present of sewing cotton, value 12l. Mr. Jabez Johnson, some specimens of his manufactured cotton goods, retail value about 7l. Mr. T. F. Johnson, Mr. Joseph Simpson, Mr. John Mellor, Mr. Hounsfield, Messrs. J. and E. Johnson, Mr. Burd, Mr. P. Drummond. Donations—Mrs. Higginbottom, 1l.; Mrs. Schofield, 1l.; Mrs. Worthington, 1l.; Mr. Bateman, 1l. 1s.; Mr. Heap, 1l.; Mrs. Furnhead, 5s.; Mr. Mellor, 2s. 6d.

Mrs. Mayson has also to acknowledge the kindness and liberality of Mr. Neild, who made two gentlemen's dressing coats, and Mr. Peacock, who made one ditto, without any charge; also of Mr. Wilde, cabinet maker, who made a handsome rosewood frame for an ottoman, and only charged half the value; also of Miss Parry and Miss Shawe, dress-makers.

P.S.—The above list of money and articles, amounting in value to 95l. 9s. 3d., was sent by Mrs. Mayson to the Bazaar held in London in May. In addition to this Mrs. M. begs to hand to the committee 2l. 5s. 6d., a small amount which she has since received.

LETTERS ON THE CORN LAWS, No. XLVIII.

TO THE RIGHT HON. SIR ROBERT PEELE, BART., M.P., FIRST LORD OF THE TREASURY, &c.

SIR,—The time of trial is at hand. Will your law work through the coming winter? Will it secure food for the population for the next ten months? Dare you face the prospect before us, relying on its operation? Are your nerves strung for a responsibility greater than has ever before devolved upon a statesman, inasmuch as you will stand at the bar of public opinion embittered by public suffering? The period is a critical one, most critical, both for yourself and for the country.

Thousands of voices proclaim that the "destiny" of the Corn Laws is fixed. In many cases, the champions of their enactment have become the prophets of their destruction. Far and wide has spread the confident anticipation of their repeal. Your path is prepared. All eyes look for your advance. Whatever injury your party or Parliamentary influence can suffer, by the actual proposition, is already inflicted by the common assumption of its certainty. No mischief to yourself, as a politician and statesman, remains to be averted by delay. No further strength is to be gained by delay. The anticipation grounds itself upon your own character and policy, as well as upon the obvious justice and necessity of the case. All things wait for you. It little signifies that Parliament is not sitting. The world only wants assurance that you are determined.

Why cling with any foolish paternal fondness to your law? It embodies no great principle. It lays no foundation for a statesman's fame. It will not tell for a stone upon your cairn, nor furnish a sentence of inscription for the pedestal of your statue. You shaped it not for the expression of previous years of inquiry and thought. It was the expedient of the moment; the extempore avoidance of a temporary difficulty. Let it pass away, together with the circumstances of its enactment. It has helped over a transition in our commercial policy. It helps no longer. Its continuance is only a foreboding of difficulty and disaster.

To the farmer, your law has neither given "protection" nor satisfaction. His only attachment to it has risen from the dread, now vanishing from his thoughts, of vast and undefined injury in the application of Free Trade principles. Agricultural societies are become occasions for preaching reliance on improvement rather than on protection. Intentionally or not, you have shown to all interested in the land, that Parliament can neither regulate prices nor secure remuneration. They neither thank nor trust you, but cultivate reliance upon themselves. They look to skill, and capital, and energy. You have been the occasion of this good—of bringing them to this desirable state of mind. Its wholesome influence requires security against change. You can only bestow that by fully establishing the policy of Free Trade in corn.

The manufacturers have not been ruined by your law, nor the multitudes pressed down to the borders of starvation. But they have escaped, simply because the bounty of Providence rendered it inoperative. The time has not come—though now the symptoms of its approach are gathering—for it to bring down on your head their hoarded maledic-tions. Yet this has only been an escape from the more glaring mischiefs of restriction. Trade, though flourishing, has been limited; and the people know it, both masters and men. They keep a keen watch on events. They note the progress of the bearable towards the intolerable. Let your law begin to act strongly on the prices of food—and in present circumstances it must act strongly, if at all—and the reaction will be terrible. If you can "never forget Paisley," still less will they. Your law seems to them, and it is, an "infernal machine" across their path. In every added penny to the loaf's cost, they will behold the lighted fusee that will produce its explosion.

Inferior bread, and a scanty supply of that, is all that protected agriculture has prepared for us. Foreign corn, at enormous prices, must be procured to mix off with it, and fit it for consumption. Yet the badness of the product keeps up to a high rate the importation duty. The common reserve fails us; and taking the potato crop at the best that can be expected, it is a dreary resource to fall back upon. Europe is in no condition to help us. Some of our own little stock of foreign corn has already been re-shipped for Belgium. Apprehension runs before pressure; but the pressure will follow with too sure a step for the apprehension to subside. We have need of all resources, in the old world and the new, which Free Trade can open to us. You can as yet take time by the forelock. How long will the opportunity last?

The land of England, in its present state of cultivation, cannot feed the people of England. That is demonstrated. The effect of restrictive laws is not to improve cultivation, so that it can feed the people of England. That is also demonstrated. The spirit of agricultural improvement has only sprung into being amid the throes and convulsions of expiring monopoly. Its nurture to maturity will only be found in competition. The juncture demands your change of policy. Home produce must always have its advantages in the home market; and settling into the regular supply of whatever proportion can profitably be raised, the cultivators of our own soil will have a secure trade, and a fair remuneration.

The day of temporary expedients is past. A fixed duty would be the most unfixed of all things. Your own blows have demolished that obstacle, smashed it to atoms. Indian corn may serve to fatten cattle, or may be a resource in the failure of potatoes; but to admit that, and exclude wheat, would be too glaring an attempt at reducing a nation for the gratification of a class to a lower species of food. There is corn in the world, and our multitudes can earn it. You have only to strike off this great link in the chain that fetters industry. By your own statement in the last debate on Mr. C. Villiers's annual motion, you hold the principles of Free Trade to be sound and wise, and only require to be guided by circumstances in their application. Since last June, circumstances have changed. The series of abundant harvests is broken. Alarm has succeeded to hope. Disappointments have combined that we are only accustomed to encounter singly. The shadow of a coming period of distress darkens the land. You emphatically claimed, then, the right to continue the application of your principles, of abating protective duties. Stand to your claim. Abate the system by the destruction of the corn duty. The need of a nation is your warrant. The course of events has only left it for you to speak the word, and demands that you speak it promptly. The expectation is strong and general; the gratitude will be proportionate to the expectation. Rise to the emergency, and win the blessings of an anxious nation.

A NORWICH WEAVER BOY.

PRICE OF BREAD.—Another advance of a halfpenny on the 4lb. loaf took place yesterday in different parts of the metropolis; the "top" price, therefore, of "cheap" bread is now 8½d., and of the best wheat 9½d., and in some places 10d. the 4lb. loaf.

THE CASE OF THOMAS LAKIN.—We are happy to announce that poor Thomas Lakin, whose case has caused so much interest, with the humane portion of the public, was discharged from Leicester gaol on the 11th instant, the poor-rate of which he was the victim, amounting to 5s. 4d., having been paid.—Chronicle.

EARL DUCIE, owing to the failure of the potato crop, has most generously returned two thirds of the rent of the allotments on his estates, and thus he has gladdened the hearts of more than one hundred and fifty cottagers by his great and well-timed liberality.

surrection, these may, and must be, subdued by the strong arm of constitutional authority. But Government becomes weak, and the powers with which it is invested by the constitution are paralysed, when what Lord Bacon calls "the rebellion of the belly," prompts the discontent, and impels the sufferer to outrage. Sir James Graham, in his "Corn and Currency,"—a production of his better days, which he would now fain have forgotten by the public, and has employed every effort to suppress—has given a very impressive warning of what are the natural results of a deficiency of food upon the suffering masses. At the Cabinet Council which is about to be held, to consider what measures are best fitted to meet the exigency with which Sir Robert Peel feels he is imperatively called upon to deal, a few extracts from the Home Secretary's book would not be out of place. The question will probably arise, whether the opening of the ports to foreign grain, and the release of the foreign grain in bond, would not endanger, if it did not absolutely destroy, the hope of returning to restrictive duties; and whether, therefore, it would not be better to trust to the chapter of accidents for mitigating the calamity which is suspended over Ireland, even though famine, with its progeny of horrors, should devastate that country? Even if there be in the Cabinet a spirit bold and bad enough to brave the alternative—a circumstance we can scarcely regard as within the limits of possibility—Sir James Graham's book will tell him the fearful dangers which he dares.

"The receivers of rent (for whom the Corn Law would preserve solely exists) are a very small body. Backed by public opinion they are almost omnipotent—in violation of public opinion they cannot long sustain an exclusive advantage. The contest is fearful: for on what ground will it be decided? On the very topic which inflames to madness. That hunger, which breaks through walls, will be arrayed against them. Reason will be heard no longer. The barriers of society will be broken down; and estates, distinctions, honours, swept away in one resistless torrent."

Sir Robert Peel's sliding scale of 1842 has broken down under the first trial to which it has been subjected. When its boasted efficacy was, according to its advocates, about to be demonstrated, its utter failure is shown. Like the Frenchman's horse, which was to live without food, and died just as he had got into the way of it, Sir Robert Peel's carefully adjusted system of fluctuating duties has reduced the nation to the perils of sanity, just at the time when its plenty-creating qualities were about to be called into action.

(From the Morning Advertiser.)

The League's occupation is gone. Their work is over—their labours are at an end. The monster monopoly has received its finishing stroke. The days of the Corn Laws are numbered. Before the Easter recess they will have ceased to exist.

Though the brief interval of eight days is all that has elapsed since the publication of Lord Ashley's letter, we have had since then another proof of the Ministerial determination to abandon the sliding scale.

Mr. B. Escomb, the Member for Winchester, had a meeting with his constituents at Limington, on Wednesday last, and on that occasion the honourable gentleman gave the plainest possible intimation that the Premier had made up his mind to the substitution of a moderate fixed duty in the room of the sliding-scale. We give an outline of Mr. Escomb's speech in another column. No one can read it, and doubt that the Corn Laws are, at the least in the hon. gentleman's view, doomed to early destruction. The wish with him is not father to the thought. All his predilections run in a different course. If he were to have his own way, he would uphold the sliding scale. His interests, or at least his supposed interests as a landlord, are identified with the continuance of the corn monopoly. The testimony, therefore, of such a man as Mr. Escomb, when it makes against his imagined interests, is entitled to every weight. It is true that he speaks of the abolition of the Corn Laws as if not injurious to the interests of the agriculturists; but this is new language for him to adopt, and is, doubtless, adopted on the principle of making a virtue of necessity. Were it possible to perpetuate the corn monopoly, Mr. Escomb would be the last man to say anything that would imply his sanction to its extinction.

The hon. gentleman prefaces his speech in terms which must have prepared his audience for what was coming. "The agricultural societies," said Mr. Escomb, "had in some places, and in some other parts of the country, a little fallen into disrepute with farmers; and why was it? Because they had fettered the expression of public opinion on public questions, by absurd restrictions; whereas he was sure that here every man might express what each believed to be true, and that all would be best pleased by plainness and freedom of speech."

This is hitting the Protectionists and their societies somewhat hard. We wonder how their Gazettes of Richmond and Buckingham will relish this rap on their knuckles. Coming from a quondam friend, a Conservative member, they must smart all the more sensibly under it. "And, then too my son," from the League this night have been borne, but from a Tory and an agriculturist, it must be felt by the noble monopolists to be a cut of the unkindest nature.

But there is more in store for the ultra-Protectionists. After alluding to Lord Ashley's letter to his constituents, in which he says that the Corn Laws must be given up, Mr. Escomb remarks, "Gentlemen, the truth is—and it had better be spoken plainly—it is the conduct of the special representatives of what they call agricultural opinions which has precipitated the fall of this Corn Law."

This declaration was, we are told, received with tremendous cheering—a fact which indicates in a manner not to be mistaken, the views which the more enlightened agricultural communities now entertain of the conduct of the ultra-monopolists.

We welcome the adhesion of the Member for Winchester into the ranks of the Corn Law repeaters. He will prove a great accession. Should the League meetings be renewed in Gosport, we shall not be afraid of seeing Mr. Escomb playing a prominent part on the boards of that establishment.

(From the Speculator.)

There is every prospect of dearth in Ireland at least; the accounts of the wheat harvest do not improve, but the potato crop appears to be a failure throughout potato-eating countries; and Ireland is threatened with a thing that is new in history and in distant countries, but scarcely in our land and time—a famine. Whole fields of the root have rotted in the ground, and many a family sees its sole provision for the year destroyed. Government are making inquiries; of course, if the worst fears prove true, Government must do more than inquire, and then the momentous question occurs—what will they do?

The Corn Laws! Ay, all men's thoughts turn that way. It is assumed that if the Irish are starving the Minister must abandon the restrictions on the importation of food; and other tokens are observed of an approaching change. Lord Ashley, threatened by his agricultural constituents of Dorchester with opposition at the next election, has been provoked to a bold declaration that the Corn Laws cannot last; their "destiny is fixed." The Times sneers at Lord Ashley for his tardy discovery; the Morning Post is scandalised at his desertion of agricultural meetings, where, according to the Post, his declaration might more manfully have been made. It is to be inferred, less that Lord Ashley was afraid to meet the friends to whom he gives such frank counsel, than that he has no high opinion of such meetings as an arena for the preaching of political doctrines. At all events, he has done no more than give public voice to what everybody has thought and said for some time.

At no period could the statesman find greater ease in effecting a destined change. It is taken for granted that the landed gentry would not refuse a relaxation of the law if asked in the name of starving Ireland; it could not be denied to England when granted to the sister country; if granted for a time, the law could hardly be renewed. Never, perhaps, would a Minister encounter less opposition to the measure. Among agriculturists, especially among farmers, opinion already wavers; and great part of what is opposition before the change—a remnant of prejudice kept up by timidity—would turn to admiring concurrence as soon as the change should have been achieved and found to be harmless even to those who dreaded it. Never would it do so much obvious good with so little injury; the benefit to be anticipated from a free supply of food is most attractive in a time of scarcity; while any temporary injury to agricultural property and agricultural employments would be prevented by these seeming enterprises which give unusual value to the land and employment to the labour of the country.

And if a change be made—what change? Jumping to obvious conclusions that there will be a change, political gossips have already determined what it is to be, and we are told that Sir Robert Peel will propose "a moderate fixed duty." We trust that he will make no proposition so idle and so little creditable—a notion abandoned even by all the Whigs of any mark; for even Lord John Russell has 'bated his favourite scheme until he has brought it down to three shillings or something lower. To outdo Lord John in that Dutch auction, Sir Robert must laggle for sixpences, and offer two shillings or eighteenpence. But in sooth we need scarcely speculate on the reasons against the probability of his making any such proposal, since he himself has said all that can be said against it. Almost better propose no measure at all. Such a one would settle nothing; and when the Corn Laws are next changed, it is to be hoped that the question will be settled for evermore. There is but one way to attain that state of repose—by total repeal. The measure would indeed startle many; but it would frighten them and injure them less than at any other time; and in great emergencies boldness becomes the truest discretion.

We take it, then, that the doom of the corn monopoly is sealed. We so express ourselves because we so believe. Our readers well know that, on this subject, we have been the very opposite of sanguine in our estimate of probabilities. Where others had visions of certain and splendid triumph, we foresaw little but disappointment. Measuring the power of the machinery in operation with that of the interests against which it was brought to bear—looking at the compact phalanx of landlords in the Houses of Legislature, and at the subservient character of constituencies, as usually exhibited in electoral contests—knowing that, on the one hand, everything was held to be at stake, and that, on the other, correct views were far from universal, and, even when correct, were not always practically influential—we never could win over our judgment to a full acquiescence in the anticipations of the Free Traders—and, as we thought, so we spoke, often rather than not to the chagrin of our best friends. The whole case comes before us now under a novel, and, to all parties, an unexpected, aspect. We believe, from the evidence before us, that the Corn Laws must be repealed, and that speedily; and we rejoice as heartily as can any one in being able to give unhesitating utterance to our belief. Be the triumph whose it may, we, at all events, shall fully participate in the joy of it.

Entertaining, then, as we do, a pretty confident persuasion that the victory of Free Trade principles is at hand, we claim permission to speak of it, for once, as a well-defined certainty, and, upon that supposed certainty, to base two or three observations, such as we think the occasion calls for. If our hypothesis should be found too flattering a one, no harm will have been done, and we shall have delivered our souls.

We see, then, in the anticipated event, a very marked illustration of the essential weakness of any combination which gathers around what is itself a falsehood and an injustice. Heaven confounds the purposes which mock the strength of man. "The stars, in their courses, fight against Sisera." Who could have predicted, at the last general election, that the monopolists were putting out their whole energy and wealth to exalt into power the very men destined to humble them? What mortal sagacity could have foreseen that the means of defence resorted to by Peel, would have been such as to lay open his own citadel to irresistible assault? Where, amongst us, is the man who calculated upon the tariff of 1845? We were all looking towards some future deficient wheat harvest—not one of us caught a glimpse of the coming danger in potatoes. The things which we expected have not been; the things that are, and from which deliverance is to be hoped for, are those which we did not expect. The injustice which, five years ago, was rampant and audacious, where is it now? What unsexed spirit has breathed upon it, that it turns pale, and is in the agonies of death? The God of the seasons has rebuked it, and all its boasted strength shrivels up like a scroll. Its own creature—how often has it previously happened!—will probably be the minister of its death. The retribution is complete. Frightened monopoly will turn suicide, and hang itself with the very rope it twisted for a scourge to the backs of others.

Whilst, however, we attribute much to that agency of events over which man has had no sort of control, which he never predicted, and could not have brought about, we have no temptation to commit the injustice of withholding honour where we think it due. We have never concealed our opinions of the League; we have never seen reason to alter them. We always regarded it as a great teacher—bold, indefatigable, and apt. We never looked upon it as a political power, likely to succeed in capturing, by its own might, the strong holds of monopoly. The machinery which it brought to bear upon the fortresses which it sought to level with the dust, always struck us as inadequate; and events have fully borne out our opinion. Probably, with their enlarged experience, they would not go over precisely the same ground, if called to run their course again. But it must not be forgotten that if, but for events, they would assuredly have failed; events, but for them, would never have succeeded. "The teachings of famine are, indeed, all powerful; but then the League put the words of wisdom into famine's mouth." There have been dearths in Ireland before now, but they did not enforce the abolition of the Corn Laws. The League has done the work of preparation. To their labours mainly we owe the altered views of the agricultural tenants, the enlightened state of public opinion, and the glorious result that now, when danger is at hand, all men spontaneously turn to the right remedy. The general presentiment to which we have already alluded, and which is more difficult to resist than the most violent of passions, owes its being to them. They have so familiarised the national mind with Free Trade principles, that it seems a war against common sense and household necessities to refuse to act upon them when in peril of starvation. To them, therefore, instrumentally, we are indebted for our prospects. "Honour to whom honour is due." With our whole hearts we congratulate them. We willingly forget what appeared to us to be their mistakes; we recognise only the invaluable benefits they have conferred on their countrymen.

THE HON. GRANTLEY BERKELEY AND THE GAME LAWS.

This honourable gentleman, not content with the severe judgment which he obtained of the magistrates on a former conviction, on two labourers named Barry and Purchase (two respectable, honest, and industrious young men, and the latter the chief support of his widowed mother), has this week preferred the same charge against them in another shape, viz., "of unlawfully using a dog," (called by him a lurcher, but declared, on oath, by one of his own "credible witnesses," to be a common sheep-dog) "for the purpose of killing and taking game." Accordingly, on Monday, the hon. gentleman made his appearance in court, in his shooting attire. Again did the hon. M.P. shake hands with the hon. Captain Harris on entering the hall, and again did he take his seat between the hon. Captain Harris and the right hon. Sir G. Rose, the former on his right hand, and the latter on his left. Before the hon. gentleman's case was called, Sir G. Rose left the hall, and Captain Harris not having a commission, retired from the bench, and ultimately left the hall also. The hearing of the case was thus left entirely to Captain Hopkins, who, though one of the "great unpaid," we are bound in justice to acknowledge is an honourable man, and in all cases of jurisprudence proves himself a gentleman in the true sense of the word. The hon. plaintiff sat during the time in the principal seat of the bench. Mr. Berkeley's keepers, his two "credible witnesses," then gave their evidence, which in some material points disagreed with their former testimony, but which in substance was the following:—That on the 27th of August last they were lying in the hedge watching Purchase and the rest of the mowers who were mowing barley in a field in the occupation of Mr. Ploverman, the property of Lord Stuart, from two o'clock till four in the afternoon, when about that time they saw a hare start from the barley, and the shepherd's dog, which had got from his master's yard, which was separated from the field only by a road, ran after it, and that he heard Purchase halloo at the dog, but that the hare being the fether of the two escaped. A cross-examination by Mr. Guy, who attended professionally for defendant, somewhat shook their testimony. Mr. Guy then asked if he should proceed with the defence; but the worthy magistrate on the bench, after candidly and impartially considering the subject, said he did not think it worth while, as it was his opinion that this case did not at all come within the meaning of the act, for it ought to be proved that they were actually and in fact hunting with the dog, whereas by the evidence produced they were all lawfully employed in mowing their master's corn, and while they were doing so the shepherd's dog accidentally started a hare. Mr. Berkeley then said he considered it did come within the meaning of the Act, but was of course compelled to bow to the magistrate's decision, and the case was dismissed amidst the enthusiastic acclamations of applause from a dense crowd who filled the hall. When Mr. Berkeley left the hall the whole street presented a scene of excitement, and he was assailed with the hisses and hootings of a number of poor men.—Hants Independent.

We have received an intimation from the editor of the Weekly Dispatch, that he has received from J. Collett, Esq., M.P. for Athlone, the sum of 5*l.* for Barry and Purchase, the defendants in the now somewhat celebrated Game Law charges preferred by the Hon. G. F. Berkeley. Mr. Lane, our agent at Christchurch, has undertaken to transmit the money to the men, and at his request it will be paid over to him for that purpose.—Ibid.

POACHING.—At the Woodbridge Division of the Suffolk Michaelmas Sessions, the chairman, R. N. Shawe, Esq., in his charge to the jury observed, he was very happy to say the calendar presented no one point upon which he could make an observation—nothing but this, perhaps—that there were only nine persons committed to gaol this quarter, on summary conviction, and seven persons charged with felony, four of whom had been discharged from want of sufficient evidence, and the remaining five would be tried that day. He would also add to this an extraordinary circumstance—a circumstance that, long as he had sat on the bench, he did not remember happening—namely, that there was not one poacher in the gaol for the Woodbridge Division, in this, the month of October. He had nothing further to say.—J. Moseley, Esq.: I fear the absence of poachers arises from the scarcity of game.—Mr. Shawe: I don't know why it is. I only state a fact.

THE GAME LAWS.—At the Tring Agricultural Association meeting on Tuesday, Mr. Houghton, the vice-president of the society, thus expresses himself: "I stand here as one of the largest occupiers of land in the kingdom. It is not only unfair but absolutely dishonest for a landlord to take rent for a farm, and then to stock it with game. (Cheers.) I have stated this before a committee of the House of Commons, and will avow it on all occasions. It is dishonest of landlords to stock farms with vermin. Plenty of game might do for the landlords, but it would not do for him. If the aristocracy needed 'battues,' let them keep their game and shoot at it through the key-hole." We understand that Mr. Houghton farms nearly 4000 acres of land.

AGRICULTURE.

SIGNS OF THE TIMES.

WHAT PART SHOULD THE FARMERS TAKE?

No one can mistake the signs which bespeak the doom of monopoly. For some time past the moderate and more rational monopolist members, who support the Government, have been throwing out hints that the time is at hand when farmers must not rely on protection; and it is the natural course of things, that such predictions are realised more speedily than those who make them, in words, suggest. When a monopolist politician hesitates he is lost to monopoly.* No man of average capacity can reason upon such a question and remain a protectionist. The only genuine protectionists are those who won't and those who can't reason. Recent events have shown that the non-reasoners by choice form, in fact, the most numerous section of the supporters of the Pro-Corn-Law Ministry. But the party objects which blinded them to the evils of protection having been attained, the rottenness of the system has of late become obvious to them.

Not long since we had Mr. Sotheron in Wiltshire, and Col. Rolleston in Nottinghamshire, plainly telling their agricultural constituents that protection could not much longer be maintained, and that they must rely on their own skill and energy to meet the world's competition. To those who believed there was any substance in the protectionist agitation of 1843-44, the calmness with which these hints were received by the farmers must have been surprising. Not so to the initiated. They knew well enough, that if all that the "protection societies" said about the fall of prices that would ensue upon Free Trade had been true, the landlords had the short means in their own hands of indemnifying their tenants. The tenants' anxiety, therefore, consisted only in certain doubts not very complimentary to their landlords. The farmers said that rather than give the tenants security of possession, and complete possession of their farms so as to enable them to withstand all competition, the landlord would ruin their present tenants and then trust to the competition for land to get others. But although this was said it was not much apprehended, because—apart from all feelings of honour and honesty on the part of the landowners—such a course would be most detrimental to their own interest. Nothing proves this more clearly than the course taken at the agricultural meetings of the present season, where the landowners have, in most instances, shown a disposition to meet their tenants half-way, and that under circumstances which indicate that they will ultimately go the whole length of the tenants' very reasonable requirements. The tenants have objected to game preserves, and the landlords are generally disposed to give up hares and rabbits. The farmers ask for leases, and the landowners offer allowances for "unexhausted improvements." And the squires generally anticipate objections to timber by offering to cut down the "ash trees." If the fear of Free Trade has done so much, it is certain actual Free Trade will do all the rest. That the landlords can take advantage of the tenantry during the transition from restriction to freedom is out of the question.

These considerations will account for the equanimity with which the "agricultural mind" received the preliminary intimations that monopoly is doomed. Then there was the more explicit reference of Captain Rous to the increasing population, and the possible deficiency of food. Since that time the ravages of the "potato disease" have become more general and more serious, and moderate men of all parties have made up their minds that a temporary Free Trade, at all events, is the only remedy for the national emergency. Then there have followed rumours of dissensions in the Cabinet on the question; and, finally, we have the letter of Lord Ashley, and the unmistakeable speech of Mr. Bickham Escott. Even the Morning Post deems that "the cry that one now hears on every side, that the Corn Laws are doomed, is additional evidence of the mortifying fact, that the country gentlemen who were returned in such numbers to Parliament at the last election, have shown themselves unequal to their position." That may be so; and it may be perfectly just that the monopolists who promoted these gentlemen should say to them, in the words of the Post, "if they are going to allow the Corn Laws to be overthrown, because of the convictions of their own minds that they ought to be overthrown, then let us hear their reasons, and by what process of thought or of evidence they have been persuaded that the course to which they pledged themselves in 1811 ought to be abandoned." It is, we say, fair and just that each monopolist county member should be thus put to the question; that those who promised the performance of things impossible should be required to show why they made such promises is but common justice. But all that is beside the main question.

Farmers have a graver question to consider, viz. what course they should now pursue? A few practical suggestions will satisfy them that their only wise course is to demand a prompt and complete settlement of the question: that is, an immediate and unconditional Free Trade in grain.

Prices of all kinds of agricultural produce are now high; stock and meat are high, because for two years the trading and manufacturing classes have been in a state of great prosperity; a prosperity which commenced with such abundance at home as for a period nullified the Corn Laws. Prices of grain are high, because the wheat harvest has been late, and the crops defective, whilst potatoes have proved almost a failure. Let us see what the authorities in the corn trade say of the actual state of the grain market. The Mark Lane Express of last Monday says that "Nothing has, however, transpired to allow us to hope that the reports of the defective nature of the wheat crop have been in the slightest degree exaggerated; on the contrary, every day furnishes fresh evidence that the yield per acre, as well as the weight and quality, are to the full as inferior as was at any time anticipated would be the case."

And the writer adds that "bread stuffs" will probably be higher later in the year. And although "at none of the leading consuming towns is good wheat obtainable much under 70s. per qr.," the weekly average price is but 58s. 3d. per qr.; while the six weeks' average which regulates the duty is only 55s. 3d. As the Express remarks, "The very inferior condition in which the new wheat continues to come to hand is abundantly proved by these returns." And he further says:

"That the duty must sooner or later fall to a very low point is now deemed certain, and with this prospect there is little probability of any part of the bonded stocks being for some time entered for home consumption."

Such is the prospect of the home trade; let us turn now to the reports of the foreign trade in grain:

"The prospect of Great Britain being likely to require a supply of wheat, and the fact that the harvest has terminated so unfavourably in Holland and Belgium as to induce the respective Governments of those countries to admit grain free, have, as may easily be conceived, caused prices in the Baltic to rise materially; indeed, at many of the ports from which, if our wants should prove urgent, we must draw our supplies, quotations are actually higher than the prices of similar qualities at Mark Lane."

"The latest accounts from Dantzic are of the 18th Oct., and inform us that, though little or nothing had during the preceding fortnight been bought for shipment to either England or Holland, about 1500 basts had changed hands on speculation at very high terms. Really fine samples, the growth of 1844, had brought 50s. to 57s.; moderately good parcels of high-mixed, 53s.; and inferior sorts, from 47s. to 50s. per quarter free on board. When to these rates we add freight, insurance, and other charges, it will be seen that, high as bonded wheat now is, fresh imports cannot be profitably made, unless the duty falls to a very low point. The supplies of wheat into Dantzic from the interior had been small; the quality of the new wheat is no longer so well spoken of as was the case immediately after harvest. The few lots received had, however, met a ready sale, at terms quite equivalent to those at which old wheat had been sold."

We also learn that "from the Mediterranean the reports are quite as lively as those from the Baltic, and wheat has risen as rapidly in that quarter as in this country." We find, also, that "at the principal Dutch and Belgian markets the value of wheat has been supported, notwithstanding the remission of the duties." Now, then, the Corn Laws come into stringent operation, and it is certain that the actual and apprehended deficiency in our own crops will drive the prices so high as to reduce the duty to "a very low point." Possibly some 10s. a quarter may be added to the year's prices by the Corn Laws. So far all looks well for the grower. But will it be so in the long run? Even at this moment the high prices of oats, beans, and peas very greatly increase the expense of the farmer's horse keep, and diminish the profits he might fairly expect from the high price of stock. Let the high range of prices continue only for a short time, and a decline in the commercial prosperity will soon be visible; and with a longer continuance of scarcity the whole series of evils from which the community has so recently escaped will be repeated. The masses of the population, compelled to pay exorbitant prices for food, will have little power to buy aught but food, and manufacturers will suffer in consequence; and then will vanish the high price of stock, and all that steady and increasing demand for agricultural produce which has lately been going on.

Then mark the effect of these high, these artificially high prices upon the landlords. Already we see at many of the agricultural meetings landlord congratulations "that the cloud under which husbandry has been is passing away;" which means that high rents will be paid out of small produce. The competition for land by persons with insufficient capital—one of the great evils of the existing system—will again increase, to the injury of the whole body of tenantry when the next good harvest comes, bringing with it moderate prices. Much of that progress now made towards security of tenure will be arrested, and when low prices again come, as come assuredly they will, the farmers will find themselves in a state of distress, and at the mercy of the landlords.

Let any farmer trace the recent rise in the price of corn, and he will find it to have arisen mainly from scarcity, which, had the trade in corn been free, would still have advanced prices considerably. The farmer would have obtained a full equivalent for the deficiency of his crop in an increased price, for it would be quite impossible for any importation of past or present years to have prevented a considerable rise in price. But then the rise of price would have stopped short of that exorbitant amount to which it is now going, and the evil effects on the farmers' customers would have been avoided. The immediate repeal of the Corn Laws would simply check prices, and limit the rise to some extent; it would merely prevent that aggravation of scarcity which it is the office of the Corn Law to create; and, at a time when the wildest "Tamboff" monopolist could not frighten the farmer by fables of foreign produce, would place the business of husbandry once for all upon a safe and steady basis. The impulse given to the foreign trade of the country by the abandonment of restriction would quickly tell upon the farmer; and the landlord, knowing exorbitant prices and artificial scarcity would not hereafter form part of the elements in valuing landed property, would at once determine to make the most of his property by granting to the tenant a secure tenure and complete possession of his farm.

The present state of the corn trade leaves all the arguments hitherto urged against the Corn Laws in full force, and offers this additional one, that the most timid alarmist cannot now fear the transition from restriction to Free Trade.

ARTIFICIAL SCARCITY.

The monopolists often pretend that because their scheme does not nominally prohibit the importation of corn in years of scarcity, that in fact it admits foreign grain when corn is wanted. This is altogether untrue. See what the Mark Lane Express city article says on the present prospect of supply from America:

"As there is every probability that access to foreign grain and flour will be given upon a very moderate import, and a free entry to colonial flour, &c., it is a matter of anxious inquiry, what are our supplies likely to be, and from whence will they come? It is too late in the year (even were an order in council issued this day) to anticipate that much more flour can be received from Canada than that now in all probability on ship-board consigned to this country. At the latest dates from Montreal and Quebec there were available for export, say from 200,000 to 250,000 barrels, all of which no question has been taken on speculation. It is mere guess work to hazard an opinion what the shipments may be from the United States. That they are likely to be so large as is expected in many quarters is out of the question. The Southern parts of the Union have suffered so much from drought, that the crops of wheat and Indian corn have been most materially injured. But should prices rate much higher here, many sacrifices may be made by the people of the United States, so as to realize the profits that would accrue from abstaining much from the use of flour. To an-icipate a supply of a million of barrels, as some of our agricultural contemporaries have done, is quite out of the question, except indeed the stocks on hand in the interior should prove much more plentiful than there is any conception of at the present moment. From the Continent of Europe the supplies will not be to any great amount. Therefore it is considered to be a most unfortunate circumstance that the real extent of the failure in the potato crop was not more accurately inquired into earlier, so that supplies of flour might have been sent down the St. Lawrence from Upper Canada and the State of Maine before the winter sets in and the navigation becomes closed."

Now the Corn Laws alone have placed the country in the "unfortunate" position of having to seek a foreign supply of food when too late. Had the trade in grain been free, there would have been such a store of corn in this country as would have effectually alleviated all fear of famine, though not enough to have prevented some, perhaps a considerable rise of price.

At this moment, the most rabid monopolist scarcely dares to whisper a sentence in favour of his monopoly.

INDIVIDUAL, NOT LEGISLATIVE PROTECTION.

Let the landowners of the country abandon all delusive reliance on legislative "protection," and fairly do all that is within their own power to afford individual protection, and agriculture will take its proper place amongst the steady and regular businesses of the country. This is the lesson inculcated more or less distinctly by all the practical farmers and land agents who speak their minds openly at farmers' clubs.

Thus, at the Tring Agricultural Society, in Buckingham, Mr. Wm. Bennett, a farmer and land-valuer—and who, by-the-by, put himself forward, or was put forward, to oppose Free Trade when Mr. Cobden met the farmers of Herts—remarked:

"It was said by some writers, that that man was the best friend of his country who made two blades of grass grow where but one had grown before. Such a man was a benefactor to his country, not merely to his neighbourhood in employing the labourer; but in increasing the quantity of food, and lowering the price to the consumer. If good cultivation was to be the order of the day, a proper security must be given to the tenant for his outlay of capital, and to induce him to apply to the soil the skill he ought to possess. In the occupancy of a farm, if the least doubt existed as to who would reap the profits, it was most unreasonable to expect the application of either toil, skill, or capital. (CHEERS.) There was nothing to be got by blinking these questions, either on one side or the other. The landlord would not be justified in giving a lease to a bad farmer; he ought to be satisfied that the tenant had the means, ability, and will to cultivate the soil properly. If the landlord would rather not grant a lease and give up the possession of his land, then was he bound to insert an improvement clause in his agreement to let from year to year. It was but fair that, in all such agreements, the tenant should have secured to him compensation for the benefits of all the unexhausted improvements he might leave in the soil. Without such a certainty, it was most unreasonable to expect any large outlay, or any important improvements. The landlord might please himself about giving leases; but if he refused, he was bound to say to his tenant, 'Improve your land as fast as you can, and I will take care that you have all the benefit of your toil and outlay.'"

We have before shown, and shall again have occasion to show, that an agreement for "unexhausted improvements" can never form any efficient substitute for a lease. Such an agreement may prevent a landlord from stripping the farmer bare, but it will not place the farmer in such a state of certainty and security as will enable him safely to cultivate his farm properly. Farmers will do well to keep this in mind, for landowners and land-agents are everywhere setting these farmer-traps.

Mr. Bennett justly thought that these questions were fit to be discussed at agricultural meetings, and said:

"Lord Charles Russell had said, at Leighton Buzzard, that these questions should be settled out of doors; but for his (Mr. Bennett's) part, he could not see that the discussion would be put in any worse position by bringing public opinion to bear upon it. The farmers were not always in a position to settle matters with their landlords out of doors. The farmers had spirit enough, if properly protected in their occupancy, to farm the land well and to make England the garden of the world. (CHEERS.)"

Mr. Thos. Butcher thus referred to the acts of Mr. Gordon, the president of the association, as evidence of his real interest in agriculture.

"Every gentleman must be taken to be what he professes himself. The time would surely come when he would be brought to the test. On the first occasion of their anniversary, Mr. Gordon had expressed his regret that some of his tenants were not there. A great deal of good sense had been spoken by the tenantry; nothing was heard, now of legislative protection, but a great deal of individual protection by lease. How had Mr. Gordon acted? He had had a farm to let, and had made a public announcement of letting it on a lease of 21 years. At their last meeting he had recommended the use of guano; and one of the tenantry had said that guano would not cut down the hedge-row timber. In his advertisement, Mr. Gordon not only offered his farm for 21 years certain, but said, 'you may cut down the hedge-row timber.' Great good arose from the exchange of sentiments at these meetings. Some of the tenants had said that it was unfair for landlords to stock their farm with game. 'Do what you like with the game,' said Mr. Gordon in his announcement. Thus had their president removed at once three of the grievances of which the tenantry complained; he had offered leases, given liberty to destroy hedge-row timber, and allowed the tenantry to destroy what game they pleased. He had thus given them protection, and had left them to exercise their skill under the best and most desirable circumstances. He had gone still higher, and had told the applicants that he would ask no questions as to their religious or political sentiments."

That it should be necessary to announce all, or any, of these things in the advertisement of a farm to let, bespeaks the wretched system on which landed property in England is managed. And yet this system of mismanagement is "protected" and perpetuated by a special law.

It seems Mr. Gordon offered his farm by tender, on which point the following conversation occurred.

"Mr. William Bennett said he had been delighted with the description given of their president by Mr. Butcher. There were many points in Mr. Gordon's announcement worthy of admiration, and there was one which he hoped would never be generally imitated. He referred to the unfair system of letting farms by tender. Such a course was worse than that of common auction, for in the latter case a man knows who his opponents are, but in the tender system a man may be bidding against himself. The advertising the farms by tender looked as if there were no honest agents in the country. He always would oppose the horrible system of letting farms by tender.

"Mr. Butcher had, after giving the subject his consideration, come to the conclusion that the system of letting by tender was a good one. It was acting up to the commercial spirit of putting a farm fairly in the market. Mr. Gordon's experiment had ended well. He had had sixteen tenders, and the farm was now occupied by one every way qualified to do it justice. He had no doubt but that in seven years time New Ground farm would produce more than it ever had yet. There was no restraint, no compulsion; all was free, under the tender system."

Now, on this plan of offering farms to be let by tender much difference of opinion, and, we suspect, some misapprehension, exists. Upon principle, there is no more reason why a landowner should not offer his farm to be let by tender than to be sold by auction; and practically, most offers of farms form a concealed system of tender, for an outside rent is asked, more in fact than the farm is worth, and the highest bidder is usually taken. When a farm is fairly vacant, we cannot help thinking the plan of open tender upon declared terms is preferable to the sort of secret tender which goes on in the steward's office. It would be unjust to apply it to the generality of yearly tenants, under existing circumstances, but let leases be general, and few farmers would object to a letting by auction.

But the speech of the night was that of Mr. Houghton, whose manly adhesion to Free Trade our readers will bear in mind. Mr. Houghton said:

"He stood there as one of the largest occupiers in the kingdom: he held land in Ireland and in Scotland, and he would as soon think of attempting to fly as of taking a farm without a lease. This is the plain common-sense of the question. He had grown good crops where nothing green had ever grown before; could he have done this without a lease? It was true some of the best farmers held under insecure tenures; their landlords had the best of intentions and were most anxious for the welfare of their tenants and their tenants' families, but life was very uncertain, and who could tell what would become of the property after the death of either landlord or tenant? It was nonsense to expect any one to expend capital on another man's land. He had seen, on some farms, with very small inclosures, timber as thick as it could stand. He would ask which had the best of the land, the landlord who sold the timber, or the tenant whose corn was injured by the soil being exhausted by the growth of this timber? As to the game, it was not only unfair, but absolutely dishonest, for a landlord to take rent for a farm and then to stock it with game. (LOUD CHEERS.) He had stated this before a committee of the House of Commons, and was ready to avow it on all occasions. It was most dishonest for landlords to stock farms with vermin."

After referring to the capabilities of the district, and the room there was for improvement in farming it, he said:

"In this country are sometimes to be seen four horses to a plough, two pulling one way, and two the other. Sometimes six horses were seen to a plough, most of them, of course, a good way from the plough. If they wanted draught, they must put the horses close to the plough. In this country, too, they had one to drive the horses and another to hold the plough; but the horses were seldom much attended to, as the boy had quite enough to do in talking to the man; they might do away with one man and two horses; while the two were talking, the horses would do but little. In Scotland, they did the work better, at a less cost. We had the advantage of Scotland in having the best land, the best climate, and the best markets; but the Scotch farmer ploughed with his two horses and one man, and had an instrument much more easily managed than some of the cumbersome ploughs to be seen in this country. Farmers must go on with the spirit of improvement; unless they moved on with the times they could not expect to succeed. Plenty of game and hedge-row timber might do for the landlords, but would not do for him. Ploughing with four horses might have done for his father, but would not do for him. If the aristocracy really needed battles, let them keep their game in a room, and shoot at it through the keyhole. With some remarks on draining, the expense of which ought to be borne by landlords, Mr. Houghton concluded."

THE ZOLLVERFIN AND WORSTED GOODS.—We have no further accounts from Germany, and some merchants are in consequence disposed to hope that the threatened enhancement of the import duties on figured worsted goods may have been postponed; whilst others confidently expect that the decisions already announced will shortly appear in official form, and that the new duties will take place from the 1st of January next.—Leeds Mercury.

THE CORN CROPS OF EUROPE.

We extract from the Gazette d'Augsburg the following article on the crops of 1845 in Europe:

"According to the custom we have adopted, we shall divide our accounts of the results of the last crop into two parts—one referring to the east, and the other to the west of Europe. For several years past the east threatens us with sterility; it first of all began in Russia, spread over Poland and Prussia, and appeared even this year likely to diffuse itself in the east of Germany. Experience has generally proved that in the boreal latitude the rainy years are more sterile than the dry ones. The fact has again been confirmed during the last years. It was humidity that diminished the crops a few years ago in Russia, and which produced the like effect in Poland, Galicia, and Upper Silesia in the course of last year. In Germany, the humidity has not produced any unfavourable consequences, but in certain countries; there are others, on the contrary, which have suffered from want of rain. The results of the crops are, in the meantime, far from being satisfactory; and from the calculations which have been made, will not suffice the public consumption.

"It is far from our intention to represent the situation of things in more dreary colours than belongs to it; but we do not wish, and we ought not, to exaggerate the advantages of it, desirous as we are of attaining our present object, which is to furnish an exact appreciation of actual circumstances. We shall separately name the different countries, and indicate the supplies they stand in need of or can dispose of.

"Russia will have sufficient corn for the whole empire, without purchasing any foreign corn. Its Governments are in a position to assist mutually each other; but it is very doubtful whether they can send much corn abroad.

"The crops of Poland are not sufficient for its general consumption; and unless it has been previously supplied, will suffer from a scarcity, or be obliged to receive corn from abroad. But whom can one have recourse to when one's neighbours have only had themselves but middling crops, and have not wherewith to supply the deficiency? Money also is scarce in Poland, and important sums cannot be sent abroad to purchase corn.

"The kingdom of Prussia has greatly suffered last year and this from inundations, which have ravaged precisely its most fertile countries; and want, which is generally felt there, is on the point of transforming itself into actual famine.

"The news from Pomerania agree in stating that the results of the last crops are very mediocre.

"In the Grand Duchy of Posen only a middling crop has been obtained, and anterior provisions can alone prevent a scarcity. The author does not remember having heard such numerous and general complaints, unless it be in the years 1841 and 1842. God grant that the unfortunate events of that epoch be not again reproduced! There are in this province whole countries where the usual corn sellers will be obliged themselves to make purchases the next spring. The situation of Galicia is still worse. The price of rye rose 60 per cent. immediately after the crops: it is still on the rise.

"In Hungary, which is usually so productive, the Government has been obliged to lay in large stores of corn to prevent a famine. The hope entertained of having good crops has been still more cruelly disappointed than in Silesia.

"In Austria, Moravia, and Bohemia, the results of this year's crops are below those of the average ones, and must scarcely suffice for the general consumption.

"If we consider the west of Germany, we find, first of all, that the crops in Saxony have not precisely failed, although they are very far from being abundant. The same may be said of the provinces of Brandenburg and of Magdeburg.

"Bavaria, like other countries, has suffered greatly this year from hail-storms and water-spouts; the results of the crops have in consequence been diminished, as likewise by the state of the atmosphere, which has shown itself but little favourable to the cultivation of corn.

"Wurtemberg, the country of Baden, Westphalia, and the Rhenish provinces, have been better treated; but the disease which has ravaged the potato crop will be severely felt. Nevertheless the potato crop has been generally good throughout Western Germany; it will supply many deficiencies in the crops of other places, although they are not so much grown as in other parts of Germany.

"Belgium and Holland have had but bad crops; and the news from France sufficiently proves that this year has not been a productive one.

"Spain occupies but an inferior rank among corn growing countries: still reports from this country do not mention that the crops have been deficient.

"England, where the states of the European Continent generally find a market for their surplus corn, appears today to be reassured on the wants of its internal consumption, or at least the alarming news which arrived from that country has been succeeded by much more favourable intelligence. Those who count upon corn supplies from the Baltic and provinces of the North Sea, will be greatly deceived; the prices of these productions will first of all be very high, and in the second place the quantities that can be supplied very small. A great quantity of wheat has this year been struck by blight, and this disease, which has spread throughout Germany, Poland, and Hungary, has deteriorated the quality of the corn as well as diminished the quantity. Further, it cannot now be accurately known whether at a later period England will not be reduced to supply itself from abroad, for it is well known that it is only in case of an abundant crop that enough corn can be grown for the country. In the contrary case she will look to supplies from America, or from the countries bordering on the Black Sea.

"In Scandinavia, that is to say, Denmark, Norway, and Sweden, the crops have not been satisfactory. In a few weeks, then, it may be said that for many years past there has not been so unfavourable a year as the present one; and if it be added that last year only furnished but indifferent crops in comparison with the preceding ones, this circumstance ought to give rise to measures being taken to prevent the danger which threatens us."

The corn-dealers of Liverpool are actually exporting the corn in bond to Russia! This fact speaks volumes.

THE USE OF DIFFICULTIES.—If any man possessed every qualification for success, it is probable he would remain perfectly stationary. The consciousness of his powers would tempt him to omit opportunity after opportunity to the end of his days. Those who do succeed summarily owe their success to some disadvantage, under which they labour; and it is the struggle against a difficulty that brings faculties into play.—Thomas Walker.

REVIEW.

COLLEGIATE AND COMMERCIAL EDUCATION.—Code Universitaire de France. Paris: Hachette. London: Dulau.

So many correspondents have requested us to discuss this important subject, that we can no longer delay complying with their wishes; and as the greater part of their letters ask for practical rather than theoretical information, we shall give an account of the system established in France, founded on official documents and our own personal examination of the principal collegiate establishments. The University of France, as established by Napoleon, was intended to embrace every branch of public instruction, not merely colleges, but secondary and primary schools, Lyceums, and even scientific and literary societies. The duties of the University Senate were limited to supervision and registration, all the functions of instruction being left to the branches, and the power of granting degrees, diplomas, and certificates of proficiency being entrusted to the colleges. The degrees are conferred in letters, arts, and the faculties of law and medicine, a separate and special organisation being fixed for the faculty of divinity; diplomas and certificates are given for special courses of instruction necessary to certain professions, such as that of an apothecary, a druggist, a herbalist, &c.; and no one is allowed to conduct any of the specified trades without having a certificate from the college of his district. The number of trades thus brought within the supervision of the colleges is greater than might be supposed; it includes chemists, grocers, druggists, and others which in England are perfectly free.

Napoleon imprinted on his system a military form which has not since disappeared; the pupils were led to regard admittance to the special military courses as the best reward for literary or scientific proficiency, and hence a disproportionate share of attention was paid to drawing, practical mathematics, and the military branches of engineering. The study of the moral sciences was neglected, and the professorships of political economy and modern history were abolished. The first great improvement on this system arose from the establishment of courses of instruction for the sea-service: in these, prominence was given to the natural sciences, geology, zoology, botany, &c., until by the exertions of Cuvier the title of naturalist became recognised as equivalent to a learned profession.

The progress of the French system led to the establishment of distinct courses of instruction suited to the different professions and occupations for which students are designed. But the great difficulty, which has not yet been perfectly surmounted, was to determine how much general knowledge should be imperative on all, independent of the special instruction necessary for a profession. On the one hand, there was the danger of contracting the mind by special technicalities; on the other, that of loading the memory with matters absolutely useless in public life. When it was proposed to establish special industrial and commercial courses for merchants, manufacturers, agriculturists, &c., it came to be a question how far a classical education was necessary to these pursuits, and whether the time devoted to Greek and Latin might not be much better spent in the acquisition of modern languages and such branches of sciences as would be of use in business. A second question arose out of this discussion, namely, how much of any course should be obligatory and prescribed by the college, and how much should be voluntary and chosen by the student, or rather by his parents or guardians.

A great step was made when it was found that one efficient collegiate staff sufficed for many different courses of instruction, each course being in effect a separate special school. Thus the professor of zoology taught the medical student, the agriculturist, the naturalist, the furrier, and the importer of animal matter; but when they quitted his classroom, each might go to a different department from the rest—the medical student to anatomy, the agriculturist to geology, the mercantile student to geography and statistics. It is now the duty of principals of colleges so to arrange the hours of instruction as to allow of several such courses or schools being simultaneously conducted in each college where this system has been introduced. Should collegiate institutions be established in any of our great northern towns, it would be essential to give them this elasticity in their special courses of instruction, so as in effect to have a special school for every variety of business, and yet to have all united in one general college.

The usual obligatory course includes grammar, logic, and rhetoric, with practice in composition, French history, the elements of mathematics and physics, and the principles of ethics. In France, classe is used in a very wide sense, so as to include political economy, jurisprudence, and the elements of international law.

It is in the applied and mixed sciences that the distinctions of special instruction are most marked. Let us suppose a professor of chemistry, who lectures six hours every day. His time might be thus divided:

First hour—General and elementary class.

Second hour—Agricultural class.

Third hour—Manufacturing class.

Fourth hour—Naturalists' class.

Fifth hour—Junior medical class.

Sixth hour—Senior medical class.

Again, take the professor of mathematics:

First hour—Junior general class.

Second hour—Senior general class.

Third hour—Agricultural surveying,

Fourth hour—Engineering.

Fifth hour—Mathematical elements of geometry and astronomy.

Sixth hour—Abstract and higher mathematics.

We might easily extend these examples, but those quoted are sufficient to show that a Polytechnic college—that is, one having a large variety of professional courses of instruction—may be maintained with a limited staff of professors, and at a comparatively small expense. Practical difficulties have frequently arisen in homologating these courses, so as to prevent any set of students from being thrown out of their attendance on one course when the same hour was fixed for their attendance on another. This has been particularly the case when a medical school was connected with the college, and the usual practice has been to require a certificate of attendance on a prescribed general course of education preparatory to admission to the medical classes. Of late the tendency has been to render the medical schools separate establishments. We regard a medical school as a most important adjunct to a Polytechnic college; anatomy is useful to the artist and designer; physiology ought to form part of the general education of those who may have occasion to visit foreign countries; and the same remark is applicable to zoology and botany; the various applications of chemistry to the industrial arts are too notorious to need mention. On the other hand, medical men ought to have larger opportunities than a special school would afford for the study of general literature and the physical sciences. Thus, not only would there be a greater economy, but also a larger amount of advantage to all parties by making a medical school an essential part of a Polytechnic college.

It has been proposed to have itinerant professors for groups of colleges, to lecture on such subjects as might be completed in short courses, so that three or four colleges combining can enlarge their sphere of instruction at a moderate cost. This plan has not yet been tried, because in France such professorships are frequently held by persons engaged in other pursuits, such as young lawyers or physicians, to whom a small salary is an object at the commencement of professional life. In the north of England, where there are many local literary institutions, easily reached by railroads, it is evident that considerable assistance to defraying the salaries of professors might be obtained by agreeing with the different committees for annual courses of lectures.

To manufacturing towns a system of evening instruction for the education of adults is peculiarly desirable, and provision for such a system might easily be made in conjunction with the Polytechnic College. Courses of merely popular lectures, combining amusement with instruction, might also be superadded at the discretion of the managers; but attendance on these should not be compulsory to regular students.

It is obvious that many courses in such a college might with advantage enter into the routine of female education; it has been proposed to try the experiment in some of the French institutions, but as yet, we believe ladies are only admitted to the popular courses of lectures. It would, however, be easy to make arrangements for their attendance on the educational courses, which would prevent any unpleasant results. This, however, is a matter of detail which may be fairly remitted to future consideration. The system of instruction consists of lectures and examinations; text-books are named for each course; these are illustrated and developed by the lecturer, while the proficiency of students is tested by periodical examinations, at which the principal is obliged to be present. The French system is not quite so elastic as could be desired, or as it is likely to become. The military organisation of its commencement, and the revival of many of the old scholastic forms after the Restoration, are great impediments to the establishment of a sufficient variety of industrial courses. But, in the organisation of a new system, this evil could easily be avoided. The principal point on which attention should be fixed, is, that commerce and manufactures having risen to the dignity and importance of professions, should be furnished with their own special courses of professional instruction.

These courses should be capable of subdivision; engineering should be taught in its applications to mining, surveying, and constructing, according to the special destination of the student. In this the French are very defective; they have rather too much of abstract, and too little of applied science; a similar error has caused the comparative failure of the London University College.

The question of distinctive dress has been raised by one of our correspondents, and we must confess that we should wish to see the cap and gown worn within the precincts of the college. Dress is an element of discipline; it is an outward form, but it gives the student a feeling of fellowship with his compeers. And as there would be no residence within the walls of the college, it is desirable that the sentiments of brotherhood should be cultivated by all other possible means. Mr. Lyell has very ably shown the advantage which the state of New York has derived from a system of education similar to that which we have described, and in doing so, he has justly directed attention to a point that has not yet received all the notice it merits—the structure of educational buildings. Splendid architecture leads to a waste of money and space; convenient lecture rooms opening into a common hall, a reserved wing for medical students, and a theatre for general meetings and public lectures, comprise all that is necessary. It would indeed be desirable to have the principal resident, but in most cases it is probable that he could obtain a house in the neighbourhood. It is too common an error to sink capital in cut stone, bricks and mortar.

The great problem which remains to be solved in our systems of education is, that youth should perceive a direct connection between their studies and the business of their future lives. This can only be effected by giving such a special direction to their studies as will bring them to bear on business; the industrial and practical courses will lead students of their own accord to search for the abstract principles; it is found that boys never spell well until they have learned to write, because they then first feel the practical want of orthography.

The number of subjects for which chairs should be founded, and of professors that ought to be appointed, must vary according to the exigencies and means of different localities. In America, the Board of Direction has the power of engaging lecturers distinct from the professors, and thus bringing the students acquainted with many subjects not included in the collegiate course. England affords much wider scope for the exercise of such a discretion, and from the number of its literary and scientific institutes, need hardly fear the difficulties of expense.

There can be little doubt that such institutions would be encouraged by the government, and that means would be taken to ensure the recognition of degrees and titles granted for proficiency. How far the government should possess a visitatorial power, is a question that should not be discussed under existing circumstances. We have briefly noticed the points to which our attention has been solicited, and shall be ready to give any further elucidations that may be deemed desirable.

Tytler's Elements of General History. Edited by the Rev. B. Turner, M.A. London: Scott.

We could wish that the able editor of this work had given us an original history of his own instead of re-casting Tytler's meagre outlines. The elements were originally framed as a kind of text-book for those who attended the professor's lectures, and were thus chiefly confined to the heads of subjects which he subsequently developed by oral instruction; and where such a system of instruction is pursued—as it ought to be everywhere—this manual, even in its unimproved state, would render valuable assistance. The additions, however, which have been made by Mr. Turner, render it more nearly an outline of history, fit to be used as a class-book, than a mere text-book as an aid to lectures. He has expanded what was too brief; and, in the early Roman history, has added much valuable information from the works of Niebuhr and Arnold. He has supplied many important omissions, particularly an account of the state of the East under the successors of Alexander, and has continued the history from where Tytler broke off to the present day. We prefer the additions to the original. Mr. Turner has bestowed more thought and care on his work than professional avocations allowed Tytler to afford. We could wish that he had taken nothing from the professor but his plan, which is excellent; but we are bound to state that we could not easily point out a work containing so much historical information in the same space as the present volume.

Life of Lorenzo de Medici. By W. Roscoe, Esq. London: Bogue.

This is a convenient reprint of an admirable work, and one which we are glad to see produced at a time when the cultivation of literature and art is beginning to be intimately associated with the pursuits of commerce. The editor has taken creditable pains to improve the arrangement of the matter, which in some parts was very defective; and he has rendered acceptable service to many of his readers by translating the different quotations, which the original author rather too lavishly paraded. It is, however, to be wished that he had used the pruning-hook a little more freely in a work designed to have an extensive circulation. Roscoe wrote for the few; many of his dissertations were designed only for professional scholars, and to such alone can they be interesting. The controversies with Sismouldi and others do not involve any great facts or great principles; they turn on points of minute criticism, to which men of business can neither spare time nor attention.

WEST-RIDING REGISTRATION.

(From the Bradford Observer.)

The revision of this first county register of the kingdom concluded on the 7th inst., and we are now able to give the final and correct result, as contained in the following table:

The total Liberal gain is 2142, which in detail may be thus stated:

Gain on new claims 2120

Total gain 2142

The entire of this gain is attributable to the Free Trade qualification movement of last November, December, and January. We state this on no party assumption. We know that upwards of 2500 qualifications were made in consequence of that movement; and we also know that on the average of the years 1842, 3, and 4, the Tory party gained 68 votes per annum; and there is no reason to suppose, that in the nearly-balanced condition of the two parties, the result would have been different this year but for the League effort. To the Free Traders, then, the Liberal party are indebted for the satisfactory position in which they now stand. Nor is that party more indebted to the Free Traders for rescuing it from its low position on the register than it is for the generous spirit in which their aid has been given—a spirit which has overlooked the coldness and half-hostility with which the Free Trade question has been treated by a section of the Liberal party—high in station and influence, though commanding not a tithe of the votes which are polled at an election. Conscious of the truth of their principles, the Leaguers have co-operated zealously with this section, yielding to it its accustomed precedence in the administration of all the registration apparatus; and not doubting that ere another election takes place their wise and manly interference to the coldness of which we have spoken, will secure confidence and cordiality, where for a time it seemed disturbed; and will so unite and cement together all classes of Liberals, that as with one voice they will shout the then rallying cry—Free Trade!

The position of the Liberal and Tory parties, is not, however, correctly indicated by the gain on the present year's revision. At the election of 1841, the majorities of the Tory candidates, over the Liberal ones respectively, stood as under:

Mr. Wortley over Lord Milton .. 1085

Do. over Lord Morpeth .. 1134

Mr. Denison over Lord Milton .. 700

Do. over Lord Morpeth .. 749

The Liberal party have gained on the whole series of registrations, since 1841 and up to 1841, 263, which added to this year's gain, gives a total of 2405. Now, assuming that the electors who voted in 1841 would vote again just as they did then, and that all the 2405 Liberals would vote for Lord Morpeth and Milton, the relative position of the candidates would be as follows:

Lord Milton's majority over Mr. Wortley .. 1920

Lord Milton's majority over Mr. Denison .. 1705

Lord Morpeth's majority over Mr. Wortley .. 1271

Lord Morpeth's majority over Mr. Denison .. 1656

A battle fought on the present register, the Liberal electors being united, would be a successful one for them; but a mean majority of 1488, on a register containing 34,105 electors, is an unsafe one. It has no margin for secession or minor points, for disunion about Maynooth; the holding back of some 5 per cent. of the Liberals, or the transfer of half that from one side to the other, turns the majority into a minority. It has been said that the Tories cannot increase their strength. We do not so think. We are convinced that they both can and will—Tory merchants and manufacturers can enfranchise sons and nephews as easily as Liberal merchants and manufacturers; nor is there any hindrance to Tory shopkeepers and others purchasing joint qualifications, as the Free Traders have done. We may rest assured, now that such an authoritative opinion has been given on the validity of such qualifications, the Tories will not wait the issue of their appeal to the Court of Common Pleas ere they commence operations. The Riding is increasing more rapidly than ever in numbers and wealth; and looking to the comparative number of electors in 1835, 1841, and 1844 respectively, we find little ground for supposing that the Tories have done all they can do. The total number of registered electors in each of those years, respectively, was 18,063, 30,998, and 34,001. The constituency has nearly doubled in nine years; and what is of more moment to the Liberal party, Lord Morpeth was in a majority of 2897 on a register containing but 18,063 names, and in a minority of 1134 on a register containing 30,998. Allowing most liberally for change of colour on the Corn Law question at the election of 1841, it is abundantly evident that the excess of Tory qualifications placed on the register since 1835, is near 3000! Can we doubt that a party who can do this, yet possesses means—ample means—to break down in one year, a mean majority of 1488? It would be sheer folly to entertain the idea for a moment. What then? The Free Traders must be up and doing. They are the majority in the manufacturing districts—an increasing majority—and they must keep the lead, now so well won. We think little of what more can be done in the agricultural districts by the Tories. The £50 rental, and the limitation which agricultural occupations places on the growth of the population, will prevent any great increase of the constituencies there. In the manufacturing districts the population expands by the twofold process of natural increase, and of immigration; and the mass is rapidly becoming Free Trade in its views. We would then again rouse the Free Traders to action. Three months and a fraction only remain, during which those who are unenfranchised may purchase qualifications. The state of trade is prosperous; the next year may witness a seriously bad harvest, and cheap means which are now sufficient. Let no Free Trader, who by thrift and industry can accumulate the funds, be without a qualification on which he may claim to register on the revision of 1844; and in the great contest which in all probability will take place on that year's register, be a weaponless combatant!

POSTSCRIPT.

LONDON, Saturday Morning, November 1, 1845.

We write at a moment of anxious interest. The Cabinet has met to consult on the measures necessary to be adopted in the present crisis, and its deliberations are not yet concluded. The reports received from the commissioners appointed by the Government to investigate the state of the Irish potato-crop are understood to be more gloomy and alarming than had been at first anticipated, so that there is an urgent necessity to take immediate measures of precaution to avoid the dangers of famine. Under these circumstances we have little doubt that the ports will be thrown open, and the restrictions on the importation of food suspended for a season. The obvious policy, or rather the stern urgency, of such a measure must silence gainsayers. We lament that the insane policy of restriction should have brought the nation to such a crisis.

But this crisis forcibly shows the necessity of at once and for ever abolishing the odious monopoly of food; not only are the English producers unable to provide for the provision of the people, but their monopoly has lessened our chances of supply from foreign nations. The ports may be opened, but it does not at all follow that an adequate supply of corn will come in; prices will rise on the Continent, so as nearly, if not wholly, to counterbalance the suspension of the sliding-scale. At best we can only look to alleviation, not to complete relief.

Throughout the country there is a universal conviction that the dangers before us and around us are the necessary result of the Corn Laws; at the very moment that they have come into operation their ruinous tendencies have become apparent. They are so manifest that no one attempts to deny, and few even to palliate them. It is the duty of the people to give voice to their convictions; the moment for action is come. All who have hitherto laboured for Free Trade must redouble their efforts; those who have hitherto hesitated and hung back must give their prompt aid in the struggle. We have laboured long to show that this is no party question, and we are rejoiced to find that it is every day viewed more and more on its own merits, apart from the consideration of mere political differences. The nation is ripe for the great measure of justice; the circumstances of the time proclaim the dangers of delay; the prospects of the future second the warning. One vigorous and united effort alone is wanting, that the abolition of the Corn Laws should be total, unconditional, and immediate.

PEEL'S PILLS.—Famine already stares Ireland in the face; and Peel's "sliding-scale" prescription for her preservation, according to the Gazette, is a duty of 17s. per quarter, or more than 30 per cent., on the admission of foreign corn! The Doctor, we suspect, will be fain to change the medicine ere long.—Gateshead Observer.

IMMENSE COAL TRADE WITH FRANCE.—No less than 32 cargoes of coals from this country arrived at the single port of Rouen on Saturday last, viz., 17 from Newcastle, 9 from Sunderland, 1 from Stockton, 1 from Swansea, 2 from Newport, and 2 from Blyth. These cargoes would probably consist of not less than 5000 tons of coal. So much for the repeal of the coal-duty.—Gateshead Observer.

SUPPLY OF FLOUR IN THE UNITED STATES.—Large orders have been received from Liverpool for flour, by the steam-ship Great Britain, and shipments to a great extent will at once be made, principally on foreign account. An advance of one dollar per barrel has already been demanded, at which large sales have been made. 9000 barrels of flour were exported from this port to Liverpool in September, and double that quantity will probably go forward direct this month. Already there has, from previous accounts, been a rise in breadstuffs here, and upwards of 300,000 barrels have been exported. Nor have the shipments been confined to flour. Last week 4000 bushels of rye were purchased at the high price of 71c., to be exported to Holland. Letters have also been received from the Continent, ordering potatoes to be shipped from here. There is every prospect that corn as well as flour will feel the effect of the news.—New York Herald, Oct. 15.

THE COLOSSEUM.—Among the many exhibitions of London, there is none which surpasses the View of London, exhibited at the Colosseum, either in artistic merit or suggestive influence. The great metropolis is displayed before us with such strength of illusion, that we seem to recognise individual acquaintances, while the silence pervading the mighty mass fills the soul with a feeling of contemplative wonder, delightful to be experienced, but impossible to be described. The night view of the city is even more imposing; the twinkling of the stars, the sober radiance of the moon, the flickering of the lights reflected on the river, which here alone vindicates its claim to the title of "the silent highway," and the lights seen in the houses, give to the prospect such a stamp and impress of reality, that it is with an effort we recognise the triumph of Art. The Gallery of Sculptures the Swiss Cottage and scenery, but above all, the Stalactite Cave, are wondrous productions, that seem to belong more to a world of Oriental fancy than to the sober facts of European life. We are glad to hear that the exhibition has been successful in attracting visitors; all strangers who come to London should go there, because there alone can they adequately comprehend the extent and management of the metropolis; and Londoners will find that the Colosseum affords them a better knowledge of their city than they could otherwise obtain by the labour of a life.

Intelligence has been received by the General Steam Navigation Company of the loss of one of the Hull and Ham-burgh steamers, called the Margaret. She left Ham-burgh for Hull on the 19th of October, and was discovered on Sunday morning last to have been wrecked on the coast of Heligoland, 16 of the passengers, and three of the crew having perished with her. Within a few miles of the spot where the Margaret was lost, viz., off Norderney, a ship foundered about the same time, and every soul belonging to her was drowned. Another vessel, belonging to St. Petersburg, named the Melba, was lost on the previous day on the same sands, and the captain and one of his crew perished. In addition to these deplorable disasters, the Hamburgh Mail announces the loss of no fewer than nine other vessels on the Dutch coast during the storm.

Following the examples of the London and Brighton Company, the Manchester and Birmingham Company have reduced their first and second-class fares, the latter from 6s. 6d. to 4s. 3d., and the former from 7s. 6d. to 5s. 6d.; and a first class passenger now travels between Birmingham and Liverpool for 15s.

On Wednesday last, the floor of a Methodist chapel at East Wulfrden fell, while a meeting was being held to consider a plan for erecting a new chapel, the building being in a dilapidated state. Two persons were killed, and several more or less injured.

THE LEAGUE.

No. 111.—VOL. III.]

SATURDAY, NOVEMBER 8, 1845.

[3d.]

NOTICE TO THE PUBLIC.

LEAGUE FUND.

All Subscribers of £1 and upwards to the LEAGUE FUND will be entitled to, and receive, a copy weekly of this publication for twelve months from the date of the receipt of their subscription.

Subscribers of half-a-crown, and under £1, will have forwarded to them a copy of THE LEAGUE, containing an acknowledgment of their subscription; and it is requested that all subscribers will be kind enough to send their names and addresses to the offices of THE LEAGUE, Newall's-buildings, Manchester, or 67, Fleet-street, London.

N.B. As there is considerable risk in the transmission of gold and silver by post, parties wishing to forward small contributions to THE LEAGUE FUND are particularly requested to make their remittances by post-office orders.

The Council of the League would also suggest to their friends in the country the importance of transmitting their copies of THE LEAGUE newspaper, after perusal, to such parties (more especially farmers) as may be either hostile or indifferent to the question of Free Trade.

By order of the Council,
JOSEPH HICKIN, Secretary.

We beg to inform our subscribers that bound volumes of the LEAGUE newspaper, containing the whole of the first year's Numbers, may be had on application at the offices, either in London or Manchester.

OBSERVE!

Samples of good Wheat were sold in Mark Lane on Friday at 74s. per quarter.

The duty on Foreign Wheat is 15s. per qr.

The national expenditure for bread is NOW at the rate of 20 millions a-year, or FOUR HUNDRED THOUSAND pounds weekly MORE than during the whole of last winter and spring.

THE COUNTIES!

QUALIFY! QUALIFY! QUALIFY!

If we were obliged, for the next three months, to confine ourselves to one single topic to the exclusion of all other matter, we should, without an instant's hesitation, choose this, as incomparably the most vital, essential, and pressing. The sense or non-sense of agricultural meetings might be safely left uncriticised—monopolist journals might say their say without let or hindrance, and the world be little the worse—all questions of what Peel will or will not do might wait the solution of time—and rumours of Orders in Council and the like might pass as so much tittle-tattle. Our work is done, and well done, if we can but add a dozen or two to our catalogue of FREE TRADE COUNTIES. From now to the 31st of January next, this is the first thing to be thought of—the one thing needful—QUALIFY, QUALIFY, QUALIFY FOR THE COUNTIES!

In urging our friends everywhere to possess themselves forthwith of the county franchise, we stand on much stronger ground than we did, when, about this time last year, we first began to press this matter on their attention. We are stronger by the results of a year's experience. Then, the thing was novel; and, like most other novelties, was doubted and distrusted even by many who thought it excellent in the abstract. Friends were a little sceptical of its practicability—half-friends carped and picked objections—enemies derided. There were outstanding legal queries likewise, waiting for judicial decision. All this is at an end now. The questions of practicability and legality are completely laid to rest. Revising barristers have everywhere ruled that the bonâ fide purchase of freehold property which yields to the purchaser—whether buying singly, or jointly with others—a clear annual income of forty shillings, entitles to a vote for the county; and in some cases, the judges of the registration courts have expressed an opinion that such purchases, made for the sake of the franchise which accompanies them, are not only legally unimpeachable, but morally commendable and praiseworthy. A year ago when we were showing our friends "how to win counties," the extreme simplicity and facility of the means seemed to many out of all proportion to the magnitude of the end, and our confident expectations were held to be somewhat over-sanguine. Now, we can point to counties actually won. South Lancashire, Middlesex, the West Riding of Yorkshire, North Cheshire, South Staffordshire, North Lancashire are our own already, by registered majorities more or less considerable. A year ago the country was prosperous, with a fair hope of continued prosperity, and our question seemed less immediately pressing than at any previous period since the commencement of our labours. Monopoly was virtually inoperative in consequence of a succession of abundant harvests, and there was no very conspicuous need of special exertions. Now, we are coming to feel it once more. The creature has warmed up into new life, and is ready to sting again. British scarcity and Irish famine are beginning once more to show the empire what the Corn Law really is. Then, a general election seemed too remote an event to call for so much eager and toilsome preparation. Now, a general election stands in the foreground of our nearest political futurity. Parliament is a year older, and the probabilities are great that circumstances may arise to anticipate the period of its legal decease. It is as good as certain that the registry of 1846 will be that on which the next general election will be taken. Every man who is too late now will be too late then. Whoever lets the 31st of January pass over without taking out his title to citizenship, condemns himself to be a helpless and impotent spectator of a struggle fraught with the largest and weightiest consequences to the present and future generations, to Great Britain and the world.

We entreat Free Traders to spare themselves this bitter mortification. Think not that any power on earth will ever carry the Free Trade question but the power of votes—either votes actual, or votes potential—the legal power of votes given at the hustings, or the moral power of votes registered and ready to be given when asked for "Public opinion" will not do it if the public opinion cannot vote. It is qualified and registered opinion that now rules this country. There was a time, before the Reform Act, when unqualified opinion was really a power in the state; it is now little better than a nullity. The very fact that opinion is contented to remain unqualified and unregistered robs it of all moral weight and influence. The opinion which cannot take the trouble to legitimate itself in the registration courts, which slights a constitutional franchise so easily and cheaply attainable as that of the 40s. freehold, proclaims itself destitute of all the characteristics that make opinion respectable. It wants depth and strength, earnestness and heartiness. There is no volition along with it; and opinion without volition is as contemptible in the eyes of the politician as in those of the moralist. Once for all, this country is ruled by votes; and if any man will not take the pains to get a vote on the terms offered by the law and constitution of the land, he may as well make up his mind at once to have "nothing to do with the laws but to obey them."

Equally vain is all confidence in Sir Robert Peel. Sir Robert Peel will never give Free Trade to an unregistered people. Sir Robert Peel will never come out as a Free Trade Minister on any other inducement than that of compulsion—the direct and actual compulsion of the polling booths, or the indirect and prospective compulsion of the registration courts. It is better to leave Sir Robert Peel out of the question altogether. "Put not your trust in princes," says the highest authority; and the warning is as good against putting trust in prime ministers. Confidence in Sir Robert Peel were as silly as it is degrading. The nation that is contented to see its destinies waver in the tremulous balance of a Peel policy deserves its chains. Sir Robert Peel neither will nor can help us any further than we choose to help ourselves—at least, the want of will is so clear, that it were superfluous to speculate on the can. Sir Robert Peel is the minister of registered opinion. That he cares for; that he respects; that he fears; that he will obey. Registered opinion made him; registered opinion could unmake him; and with registered opinion he will take care to eschew all serious quarrel. On registered opinion he stands, and by registered opinion he will be solicitous not to fall. "How to win counties," and "How to win Peel," are perfect political synonymes.

As we shall again and again return to this subject, we will satisfy ourselves for the present with having expressed our strong sense of its importance and urgency. From now to the end of January, every man's first care should be to possess himself of a county vote—his second, to stir up his neighbours to do likewise. It will be Free Traders' own fault if the next registration do not double or treble the number of our Free Trade counties. Some counties may be as close as some boroughs, and present almost insuperable obstacles to a movement of this kind—though we really do not know, looking at the hitherto neglected condition of the registries, and at the present state and tendencies of opinion among the farmers, that any county in England need be given up as hopeless; but every commercial and manufacturing county—every county with a large town population—may be ours, if we will. Never were the institutions of a country more favourable to earnest, resolute, pains-taking effort. The constitution of Great Britain offers us citizenship and sovereignty very cheap. The 40l. or 50l. necessary to purchase 40s. worth of annual interest in the soil, is a sum within reach of all classes above the poorest. This 40s. freehold franchise is far more easily got and kept—especially by industrious and prosperous working men—than the 10l. household franchise, clogged and complicated as this is with the conditions as to rate-paying and residence. One great, united, concentrated effort, another batch of Free Trade counties, and the work is done—the giant nuisance is, once for all, abated.

SIR ROBERT PEELE RESPONSIBLE FOR HIS OWN CORN LAW.

Nothing is to be done, it seems, after all. Monopolist alarms, and national hopes and expectations turn out to be alike baseless. We have all been mistaken together. The public presentiment which so confidently inferred ministerial purposes from ministerial duties and national necessities, has proved delusive. Cabinet Councils held almost daily, through the greater part of a week, appear to have meant nothing more than that a feeble-minded poltroon of a premier tried hard to tame refractory subordinates into justice, humanity, and prudence. Evidently there has been a sharp struggle in the Cabinet—and, as evidently, nothing has come of it. Ministerial divisions are patched up again, and the nation pays. The landlord faction has triumphed, and the people may starve. The ports are not open—Parliament is not summoned—Sir Robert

Peel does not resign. Of the "three courses" which, as the premier is so fond of saying, were "open to him," he has chosen neither. After a faint and irresolute effort to fling off a responsibility which, in the present circumstances of the country, must be a living torture, the statesman has again collapsed into the party politician. We have now nothing before us but sliding-scale and starvation. According to present appearances, Sir Robert Peel has finally made up his mind that British and European scarcity, and Irish famine, shall have three months given them to do their worst, while he looks on, and watches the curious machinery of averages and rests.

A more daring and cruel piece of infatuation than this, to which Sir Robert Peel is now apparently about to commit himself, was never perpetrated by an English Minister. Never was such a courting of calamity—such an invitation to misery. The mad wickedness of it is perfectly astounding. With half the Governments of Europe publicly proclaiming scarcity, and ransacking the markets of the world to find food for their people; with a serious deficiency in our own corn-harvest menacing the prosperity of our trade and the comforts of our labouring population; and with the provision grounds of one-third of the United Kingdom devastated by "an enemy whose history and habits are but imperfectly known," but of whose power and malignity quite enough is known to set us preparing for the very worst;—in this state of things, the man intrusted with the government of the empire determines still to carry on the war against bread. With his own commissioners anxiously and dubiously calculating, by the best lights which science can afford, in which month of next year the starvation of four millions of the people is likely to begin, Sir Robert Peel maintains, in all its "integrity," his hostility against food. He must still be taking securities against too much corn. He still indulges the savage and impious fanaticism which abominates abundance, and rejects Providential bounty as a curse. "No corn wanted here" is still placarded all round our coasts. If any came by chance, away it may go again. All the world may eat it for the cost of its growth and carriage, and welcome; English hunger must pay the fine of sixteen shillings per quarter. In the great European struggle for the means of existence, we must only be spectators—perhaps by-and-by we may come in at the fag end. Holland and Belgium, Russia, Germany, and Turkey must have the run of the world's markets first. The last potato may rot in the ground; but the sliding-scale must take its time—a shilling a week, with rests when convenient.

Parliamentary impeachments of public delinquents are gone out of date; else we should say, that no British Minister, for this hundred years past, has more richly merited than Sir Robert Peel to be made penally responsible—individually and personally responsible—responsible after the fashion of old legal and constitutional precedents—for the consequences of a cruel and criminal policy. The deficiencies of our present public and Parliamentary code will, he may rest assured, find their compensation in the indignant moral sentiment of a suffering people. For this barbarous and impious policy of starvation, and for all that may come of it, the national judgment will hold Sir Robert Peel answerable. "Sir Robert Peel has done it all," will be the nation's comments on its own calamities. There will be no wriggling out of it. The Corn Law of 1842 is Sir Robert Peel's law—framed quite at his leisure, "cautiously and deliberately," after the fullest consideration, with the best means of knowledge and the amplest powers—and cautiously and deliberately maintained, after three years' reiterated warnings of its latent mischiefs. He cannot hide himself among his colleagues. He is the Ministry; he is the Government; he rules like an autocrat both the cabinet and the legislature. If he will make it his business "to regulate" that which the human mind has not faculties for regulating, we must come upon him for all the consequences of bad regulation. If he will stand between producer and consumer, dictate to buyer and seller, and fix the terms and conditions of a purely mercantile transaction, he is answerable for all the results of so mischievous and iniquitous an interference. There is no mistake—there can be no mistake—there shall be no mistake. Sir Robert Peel has charged himself with the function of food-purveyor to the empire; and if the empire runs short of food, at his door lie all consequences.

NUMBER SEVENTEEN, OLD BOND-STREET.

"The creature's at its dirty work again."

Until within the last few days, we had been a long time without intelligence from Number 17, Old Bond-street. In fact, not having walked that way lately, we rather imagined the concern was shut up. For many months past, the grease-and-lard faction has kept very quiet. Noble lords, and honourable gentlemen of "area-sneaking" fame, have seemed to retain a wholesome recollection of certain memorable castigations, and have prudently kept out of the way of the Free Trade police. Lately, too, there has been no particular need of their reminding the world of their existence. Things have gone well for the hucksterers in famine; and an unwonted prosperity has obviated the necessity of any very damaging self-exposures. Corn has been "looking up," and a reasonable prospect of British scarcity and Irish famine has brightened their future with golden visions of "remunerating prices." The 56s. are come at last, and the "interest" may drop the old mendicancy whine.

The repose of Number 17 has, however, within this past week or two, been rather roughly shaken. Three or four Cabinet Councils in as many days cannot be agreeable to tradesmen whose business profits are mixed up with politics. They are, naturally enough, startled by indications of decision or indecision among their patrons. Our cornmongers are afraid Sir Robert Peel may be of opinion that starvation and remunerating prices may possibly be carried too far. They scent competition, and are accordingly again in arms for the good of the shop. From Wednesday morning's papers, the world learned that Number 17 had met the preceding day, in general committee, and unanimously voted as follows:

"That the secretary be directed to call the attention of the different local Agricultural Protection Associations to a resolution adopted by the Central Society on the 27th of February, 1844, to the effect, 'That it be recommended to the different societies to form for each county, or division of county, a general society, to the committee of which may be added the chairman or the vice-chairman of the different local societies, as ex officio members,' with the view of condensing their influence, promoting an unity of action, and of more extensively diffusing information on the real condition of agriculture, and on the consequences to be apprehended from the attacks of its enemies."

"That the present advance in the price of wheat and other grain arises, to a considerable extent, from an unfounded apprehension of inadequate supply, together with the increasing demand for certain agricultural products from several of those Continental states which have heretofore been exporters to this country."

"That the price of grain being (proportionally with the means of the people) lower in this country than in the above Continental states, proves that the protection afforded to the producers of grain in this country is beneficial to the community at large."

"That it is the opinion of this society that the supply of wheat and other grain in this country is not such as to justify alarm, notwithstanding the efforts so industriously made to impress the public mind with a conviction to the contrary; and that the supply will be found sufficient, since the average prices at the present time barely exceed those contemplated as desirable by the framers of the Corn Law of 1842."

"It therefore becomes incumbent upon this society to impress upon the Legislature and the community at large that, since the principle of the present Corn Law, which this society is, by its fundamental rule, bound to support, has been found beneficial to the country, the society will exert itself to maintain that protection inviolate."

"That circulars be addressed to the secretaries of the local Protection Societies, requesting them immediately to call their committees together, and to forward, with as little delay as possible, to the secretary of this society, returns of the amount of this year's crops within their respective districts; viz., whether they exceed, or are below, an average, and to what extent; and in what proportion the potato crops have failed throughout their districts."

"And that they be requested to call the attention of all peers and Members of Parliament representing their interests, or resident within their respective districts, to the necessity of supporting inviolate protection to British agriculture not less than that at present existing."

The facts and logic of this precious document we are not solicitous to criticise. The absurdity of first affirming as true an hypothesis which is afterwards ordered to be investigated by a machinery of committees and returns—voting the "apprehension of inadequate supply," to be "unfounded," and then begging to be informed of the year's crops, "whether they exceed, or are below, an average, and to what extent"—is of a sort which only one body of men in Great Britain could be guilty of. But look at the moralities and humanities of these gentlemen of Number 17, Old Bond-street. Was there ever a more shameless exhibition of sordid, greedy, and cold-blooded selfishness? At a time when, by their own admission, it is dubious whether the crops of Great Britain "exceed, or are below, an average, and to what extent"—when the worst horrors of famine, with pestilence in its train, are impending over Ireland—these men have their heads full of the 56s. They can think of nothing but "average prices." Those who would feed the hungry are their "enemies." Measures against famine are "attacks" on them. They must and will be "protected" from bread. Not a syllable of lamentation or regret at the prospect of the terrific calamity that menaces four millions of their fellow men and fellow subjects. Not a whisper of Ireland. Ireland may eat sea-weed, if you will but please to "support inviolate protection to British agriculture not less than that at present existing." They have got their famine at last, after long waiting—it is a legitimate famine, "barely exceeding that contemplated as desirable by the framers of the Corn Law of 1842"—and they mean to make their penny by it.

The ancient Spartans taught their children lessons of sobriety, by ocular demonstration, on the persons of their slaves, of the brutal and loathsome phenomena of drunkenness. On the same principle—that virtue grows out of the recoil of disgust from vice—might we send our ingenious British youth to Number 17, Old Bond-street, to learn justice and humanity in the school of landlordism.

AGGRAVATIONS OF THE SLIDING-SCALE.

If Lord Glenelg's Corn Law chastised the people with whips, that of Sir Rehoboam Peel is likely to chastise them with scorpions. His sliding-scale is just coming into operation, and four cabinet councils held in the short space of eight days abundantly prove that he is not quite easy while witnessing the operations of his handiwork. His rests, ingeniously and confessedly designed to check speculation, have had the desired effect; they have prevented the merchants from importing corn to feed the people. His scale of duties has driven abroad a portion of the grain imported to eke out our scanty supplies, and what high duties have driven away will require very high prices to bring back. A semi-official announcement of the premier's intention to do nothing at the present exigency appeals to the low state of the averages as a proof that there is no pressure of distress; but the low prices arise from the immense amount of inferior wheat which is thrown upon the market: the difference between the cost of the prime and the inferior qualities amounts to about 20s. per quarter; and as the present crop is below the average in quality, the duty as levied at present is equivalent to a tax of 40 per cent. on the wheat of the late harvest; and at the same time this duty prevents the importation of any good corn to mix with the bad. We are thus forced to pay a most iniquitous tax, and at the same time to rest content with inferior and imperfect sustenance.

An allusion was made to this phase of the Corn Laws by Earl Fitzwilliam five years ago, but it is only now that the cruelty of its operation is sensibly felt. The bread-tax is the only Customs-duty levied upon the price of the article raised at home, and not upon the ad valorem of the foreign article; when, therefore, we have a harvest of bad quality, its low price becomes the measure of the duty to be imposed on the import of the best wheat, and thus we have at the same time low averages and dear bread. The quality of the corn brought to market forms no element of the calculation by which the operation of the sliding-scale is regulated. Though there is no general scarcity, there is an excessive scarcity of wheat of good quality, and hence the absolute cost of food is raised far beyond the point which the averages would seem to indicate; and Sir Rehoboam Peel has this year levied a tax upon our provisions double as heavy in reality as it is in appearance.

The very high prices obtained for prime wheat compared with those paid for wheat of middling and inferior quality, show that the supply of the former is very limited. Were importation regulated by the adequateness of the corn to afford sustenance, the duties would not be half their present amount; but the sliding-scale has double precautions for ensuring scarcity, by providing that good wheat must be excluded until hunger drives us to pay high prices for the bad: we must not purchase flour until we have paid the price of flour for the bran. This cruel aggravation of the evils of the Corn Laws is now in active operation before our eyes; it increases present suffering, and removes the prospects of relief to a greater distance. The new markets added by Sir Rehoboam Peel to those which returned the averages under the act of 1828, are precisely the places where the inferior qualities of corn preponderate in the sales: it would almost seem as if one great object of his boasted change was to ensure the protection of bran, for he has so contrived that its cost should be an important element in regulating the price of flour. It was not enough to tax our food; we must now pay a heavy tax in addition for that which we cannot use as food. The great bran interest has come in for a very disproportionate share of the profits accorded to the great corn interest. The food of the labourer must not only be dear, but by the juggle of the sliding-scale it must be bad into the bargain. The price of prime foreign wheat is regulated by that of bad English wheat—an iniquitous absurdity which has no parallel in the commercial history of the world.

TESTIMONIES OF HISTORY AGAINST THE CORN LAWS.

In no part of our legislation have the lessons of experience been so ostentatiously neglected as in the acts for regulating the export and import of provisions. From the first interference with the natural laws of commerce, which as Burke justly observed are "the laws of God," to the last tinkering of the sliding-scale, every promise of good made by the menders of the institutions of Providence has proved delusive, and every apprehension of evil from interference has been more than realised. Legislators have proceeded as if the recognition of principles was but a preliminary to their violation; in the preamble to the Corn-statute of 1534, it is stated that "Forasmuch as dearth, scarcity, cheapness, and plenty of victual, happeneth, riseth and chanceth of so many and divers reasons, that it is very hard and difficult to put any prices to such things," and then the enacting part quietly contradicts the preamble, by ordaining that prices should be fixed by the Lords of the Council, and made known by proclamation. This is probably the earliest specimen of Free Trade doctrines in the abstract in our records; it was the precedent for a speech, declaring that men ought to buy in the cheapest, and sell in the dearest market, and putting the sliding-scale as a corollary to this proposition. The early legislation aimed at two inconsistent objects, which are thus stated in Elizabeth's statute of 1571, "That the regulations should not be hurtful to the country by means of dearth, or too great a hinderance to tillage by reason of too much cheapness;" and we find that the laws to prevent "too much cheapness" were always altered when any unexpected event caused their pressure to be felt.

We have, however, important evidence to prove that this dreaded cheapness led to results of great practical advantage to agriculturists. There was a succession of good harvests in England from 1617 to 1621, and though the low price of provisions at first affected rents, the cheapness soon produced the compensating effect of raising the standard of diet among the working-classes; they are described in pamphlets of the day as "traversing the markets to find out the finest wheats, for none else would serve their use, though before they were glad of the coarser rye-bread." This was a most valuable because a most natural stimulus to production; the finest wheat is of course that which demands the largest amount of artificial cultivation; it is the produce which gives most employment to the labourer, and yields most profit to the farmer. But in order to raise the finest wheat, the agricultural speculator must have command over the supplies of inferior grain; he must have a large stock of cattle to furnish artificial stimulants to his soil, and he must have abundant food for them and for his labourers. But the legislators of that day looked to the general average of prices, not to the price obtained for the superior; and in 1670, a heavy duty was imposed on the importation of foreign corn. In the following year, Roger-Coke thus described the result:—"The ends designed by the Acts against the importation of Irish cattle, of raising the rents of the lands of England, are so far from being attained, that the contrary has ensued." And he elsewhere declares that a great deal of land had been thrown out of cultivation.

This portion of our history has been rather neglected; but it abundantly proves that the raising of the standard of diet among the people is the necessary result of cheapness of provisions, and that this elevation of the standard is the best possible incentive to agricultural improvement. It must further be remarked that the finest and best wheat, being an eminently artificial production, depends less on the accidents of weather than the inferior grains; it is because the inferiority of our climate compels us largely to employ the resources of art that we have suffered less by this calamitous season than other countries more favoured by the sun.

The system of granting bounties on the export of corn was established immediately after the Revolution; the act of 1670 had secured to the English corn-growers the sole supply of the home-market, but as this did not keep down prices in years of abundance, bounties were introduced to prevent the overstocking of the market. The law was framed on calculations of continued good harvests, but seasons of dearth followed, and the bounties were suspended, changed, and altered, with every variation of season. It is only necessary to remark that years of cheapness were always years of prosperity. In the ten years ending Jan. 1751, the average price of wheat was under 30 shillings per quarter, and Malthus has remarked that as food fell wages rose, and Hallam describes the reign of George II. as the most prosperous period that England had ever experienced. In 1773 a new corn act was passed in which the restrictions on import were greatly relaxed; the preamble states that it had been found frequently necessary to suspend the former laws when supplies were short and crops scanty, and that in consequence of the evils produced by such fluctuations, it was necessary that a permanent law on the corn trade should afford encouragement to the farmer, be the means of increasing the growth of that necessary commodity, and of affording a cheaper and more constant supply to the poor. By law, foreign corn was admitted at a duty of sixpence per quarter, when the price of middling wheat rose to 48 shillings; bounties were withheld, and exportation prohibited when the price was at or above 44 shillings. During the 18 years that this law remained in force, prices fluctuated less than at any similar period in our history. Imports, however, gradually increased, and the bounties formerly derived from exports ceased to be paid to the corn-growers. The cry of dependence on foreigners was raised; and in 1791 the landlords compelled Mr. Pitt very reluctantly to consent to a law imposing a duty of 24 shillings when wheat was under 50 shillings per quarter. This attempt to prohibit import was followed by a far greater amount of importation than had taken place under the comparatively free system of 1773. In 1795 not only were the ports thrown open, but large bounties were offered for the import of wheat; and neutral vessels laden with corn were seized on the high seas, and the masters compelled to sell their cargoes to the agents of the Government.

Thus was exhibited that test of Corn Law restrictions which is about to be repeated before our eyes. These restrictions are found untenable at the moment of severe pressure, while their previous operation is felt to have seriously aggravated the evils of such a contingency. The prohibitory duty of 1791 could not be maintained in the face of the famine of 1795; but the opening of the ports coming unexpectedly, no preparations had been made to supply the market, and it was necessary to tempt foreigners by enormous bounties to give us some portion of their stock. The very same scenes were re-enacted in 1799 and 1800, but the three following years of good harvests brought plenty and cheapness, whereupon a new clamour was raised for more stringent protection.

Comparing the operations of the law of 1773 and 1791, it will be found that under the comparatively free system, there was but little fluctuation of price, that bad harvests were almost insensibly counteracted by the silent effects of regular trade, and that imports kept the market steady, though never of so large an amount as to interfere with the fair profits of the home-grower. On the contrary, under the law of 1791, prices rose in 18 months from 50s. to 130s. per quarter; every period of scarcity ran rapidly onward to famine; imports were then not merely permitted, but were purchased at enormous sacrifices; and in no one instance did the advance of wages keep pace with the price of food.

In spite of all this evidence, the legislators of 1804 adopted a more stringent Corn Law than that of 1791; but we were forced to import 400,000 quarters of wheat from France in 1809, and in 1810 our imports of grain exceeded two millions of quarters. Prices ranged very high during the whole period of the war; but just at its close there came three good harvests in succession, and low prices once more became the pretext for a more stringent Corn Law, by which the ports were to be closed until wheat reached the price of 80s. per quarter. The object of this law was palpably and even confessedly to keep up high prices and high rents by artificial scarcity. But the real difficulty of such legislation escaped the notice of its authors. In seasons of abundance, Nature would virtually repeal the law by rendering the importation of corn unnecessary, and then the farmers who had engaged to pay high rents on the faith of high prices must be ruined; in seasons of scarcity foreign corn must be had at all hazards. This law had a very slight ordeal of scarcity; but from 1820 to 1822 it had to endure the test of abundance, and therefore the cry of agricultural distress was raised, and the Corn Law of 1822 was substituted for it. In 1826, however, it was necessary to pass a temporary act for the admission of foreign grain; in the May of the following year, all the bonded corn was released by Parliament, and in the September of the same year (1827) the ports were opened for grain until 40 days after the next meeting of Parliament.

It was evident that this law would not work; it had been compelled to give way to the force of circumstances in three successive years, and a change was on all hands confessed to be necessary. A plan devised by Canning was defeated by the Duke of Wellington, but a temporary act was passed, by which 572,000 quarters of grain were admitted at an average duty of more than 20s. per quarter.

In 1828, Mr. Charles Grant proposed and carried a new sliding-scale, which gave just as little satisfaction as any of the former measures; it neither prevented fluctuation in prices nor agricultural distress, while it had a marked tendency to encourage the production of inferior grain in preference to the finer kinds of wheat. The quantities of inferior quality sold at low prices kept down the averages, and thus prevented the importation of sound foreign wheat, except at the most extravagant prices. The injurious operation of this sliding-scale has been so often exposed, that we need not here dwell upon the subject. It was vainly assailed by Lord John Russell in 1841, and was thrown overboard by Sir Robert Peel in 1842, who gave us in its stead a triplicity of regulations—that is to say, a foreign sliding-sale, a colonial sliding-scale, and a fixed duty on corn and flour from Canada.

The melancholy history of legislative interference through which we have gone shows that Corn Laws, instead of regulating supply, have been found disturbing forces when brought actively into operation. It has always been found necessary to change or suspend those laws just at the moment that they began to work. While good, or tolerably good harvests allowed us to live under the laws of Providence, artificial restrictions were a dead letter; but so soon as the seasons caused these restrictions to be felt, they were set aside and counteracted by the most costly and clumsy expedients. Since 1688, there has been a change in the law about every five years; and more frequently if we take into account such measures as permitting corn to be ground in bond, &c. There has been no fixity or permanence in the corn trade, and no security in agriculture. There has been a tendency to lower the general standard of diet, and to throw the poor more and more on the use of the potato; and we are now testing the law of 1842 as rigidly as that of 1822 was tested, by the ordeal of admitted scarcity, and not improbable famine.

We cannot mend the laws of Providence. Sir Robert Peel, with such evidence of failure as the potato-crop in Ireland affords him, must be thoroughly convinced that it is dangerous for a Minister to take upon himself the attributes of Omniscience. He had a long list of failures before him. The history of the Corn Laws is indeed nothing more than a dreary record of failures. He is once more called upon to legislate; and history has been written in vain if it has not taught the peril of legislating on the supply of food to a people in the direction of limitations. We are brought to a position in which these limitations are found to include undesigned severities of the most fearful character. We have met a dread contingency after having cast away and frustrated the Providential arrangements for mitigating its consequences. If, after such a warning, we again set up men to legislate against the ordinances of the Creator, we shall be regarded as a people whom experience could not instruct, whom dangers could not warn, and whom even suffering failed to rouse to a sense of their condition.

FAMILIAR LECTURES ON THE ELEMENTS OF POLITICAL ECONOMY.

BY THE EDITOR.

No. IX.

CHEAP PRODUCTION.

We have shown that some accumulation of capital is necessary to provide for almost every kind of production, and that large capitals are required to effect economy of production, or, in other words, to prevent any waste of time or labour. Now it is a common doctrine among the sentimentalists, and one which the writers of the Morning Post have set forth very frequently, that every saving in the cost of production is effected at the cost of the producers. This statement involves the fallacy that producers and consumers are different classes of society, when, in point of fact, every producer is himself a consumer, and that a great proportion of the consumers in this country must be ranked as producers. It is said that a high price of corn must be maintained for the sake of the agricultural labourers who are employed in its production; but when we come to compare their gain in wages as producers with their loss from the enhanced price they pay for provisions as consumers, we shall find that the balance of loss grievously preponderates.

The legislature has virtually prohibited cheapness of production in food, for to the consumer the merchant who imports food is as much a producer as the farmer who raises it at home: the prohibition, therefore, of production, in the form of importation, is an increase to the cost of production on our own soil. Were this a sound system of management, the agricultural labourers ought to be more comfortable and better fed than any portion of the labouring community. But is this the case? On the contrary, it is undeniable that the standard of food has been deteriorated in the agricultural districts, that the high price of corn has driven the labourer to look to potatoes as a substitute for bread, and that he has thus been pressed down to an average of support beyond which there lies nothing but famine, despair, and death. The labourer would not have had recourse to potatoes if he could have afforded to purchase bread; the raising of the cost of the production has, therefore, excluded him from the consumption of that which he has himself produced: he is as effectually excluded from the eating of bread as the silk-weaver from the wearing of satin.

Let us now take the case of operatives employed in a branch of manufacture where the cost of production has been greatly diminished. In the cotton trade cheapness of production has been making steady progress for more than half a century, and yet the operatives employed have been as steadily increasing in wages and advancing in comforts. The operatives are, to a large extent, consumers of their own produce; and as consumers they find more advantage from having cotton dresses cheap than they would as producers from their becoming dear.

We have before said that there are many people in the world who think that wages are discretionary, and that the price of labour may be regulated by something independent of demand and supply. In fact the cry for "protection to labour," and the variety of a "protection to native industry," not unfrequently meet our ears at the present hour. At the risk of being charged with repetition, we must be permitted again to show, that what is called "protection to labour" would lead by a certain and direct process to the ruin of the operative. A capitalist, or master-manufacturer, must either pay wages out of his capital or his profits; if he is forced to pay it out of his capital, his ability to give employment must rapidly diminish, until it is finally exhausted, and then his factory must close, for no other capitalist will embark in a business which yields no return. Wages, then, must be legitimately derived from profits, and profits can only be obtained from sales. The extent of sale will depend on the ability of consumers to buy, and on the ability of the seller to meet other sellers in the market, and dispose of his goods at as low a price as his competitors. Even if all foreign competition was excluded, a small rise in the price of an article would greatly limit its consumption, or, in other words, diminish the sales, which sales are to give the profits, which profits are to give the wages. An instance of this occurred during the war when a stamp-duty was imposed upon hats; though it was small in amount, we have been assured by persons engaged in the trade that it diminished the consumption of hats more than one-half; and that even persons of fortune made it a subject of boast that they could wear "a shocking bad hat" for months without being tempted to purchase a new one. The number of hatters thrown out of employment was consequently very great, and we are assured that in one town two-thirds of the journeymen hatters enlisted for soldiers within a single year. Now, precisely the same result would follow if, by any combination of workmen, an addition was made to the cost of production, and, consequently, to the selling price of printed calicoes, muslins, gingham, &c.; patched and mended gowns would multiply; new dresses would be diminished in the same proportion; and even if the trades-unions succeeded in maintaining the rate of wages, they would greatly diminish the amount of employment, for in their worst madness they never dreamed of anything so preposterous as asking for an act of Parliament to compel manufacturers to engage or keep more workmen than they could profitably employ.

But the evil would be incalculably aggravated if foreign competitors appeared in the market able to undersell the English manufacturer; and to this danger there is generally a wilful and obstinate blindness equally astonishing and deplorable. It has been hinted that the master-manufacturer could be "protected." But is there any conceivable system of protection which would give them superiority in foreign markets? Will a Brazilian pay a higher price for the same article to an Englishman than to a Frenchman, a German, or an American? Here the rise of price would put an end to sales, profits, and wages, in a single blow.

In fact, the amount of profits will determine the number of masters that can be tempted to enter into any given business, and, consequently, it will determine the amount for the specific labour which that business requires in the labour-market; and thus the whole question comes to the plain common-sense principle, "when two masters are looking for a man wages will be high, and when two men are looking for a master wages will be low."

But we must advance a step further, and inquire by what means cheapness of production is effected. We agree with the sentimentalists that the result is obtained by substituting tools and machinery for mere manual labour. But these implements do not work of themselves; they derive their applications from the agency and superintendence of men, and these men require an amount of training and instruction which would not be necessary where mere manual labour was required. A demand is thus raised for skilled labour; "the counter-control to the absorbing power of capital is the equally absorbing power of skill—for that also is capital. Knowledge is power, because knowledge is property."

All industrial employments are undertaken not for the sake of setting the producers to work, but to furnish articles to consumers; in other words, there is no abstract value in labour until it is invested in the results of labour. The only question, then, to be determined is, whether these results are more valuable when they combine abundance with cheapness, or when they combine scarcity with dearness. We have already shown the solution which experience supplies, and we have only to inquire whether the sentimentalists have made out any case for the limitation of the principle; and here again we must be indebted to Mr. Knight.

"Those who have taken a superficial view of the question of machinery say, that only whenever there is a greater demand than the existing means can supply; every new discovery in mechanics is a benefit to society, because it gives the means of satisfying the existing wants; but that, on the contrary, whenever the things produced are sufficient for the consumers, the discovery is a calamity, because it does not add to the enjoyments of the consumers; it only gives them a better market, which better market is bought at the price of the existence of the producers."

"All such reasoning is false in principle, and unsupported by experience. There is no such thing, nor, if machines went on improving for five hundred years at the rate they have done for the last century, could there be any such thing, as a limit to the wants of the consumers. The great mass of facts which we have brought together in this book must have shown that the cheaper an article of necessity becomes, the more of it is used; that when the most pressing wants are supplied, and supplied amply by cheapness, the consumer has money to lay out upon new wants; that when these new wants are supplied cheaply, he goes on again and again to other new wants; that there are no limits, in fact, to his wants as long as he has any capital to satisfy them. Bear in mind this, that the first great object of every invention and every improvement is to confer a benefit upon the consumers,—to make the commodity cheap and plentiful. The working-man stands in a double character—he is both a producer and a consumer. But we will be bold to say that the question of cheapness of production is a much more important question to be decided in his favour as a consumer, than the question of dearness of production to be decided in his favour as a producer. The truth is, every man tries to get as much as he can for his own labour, and to pay as little as he can for the labour of others. If a mechanic, succeeding in stopping the machine used in his own trade, by any strange deviation from the natural course of things were to get higher wages for a time, he himself would be the most injured by the extension of the principle. When he found his loaf cost him two shillings instead of one—when he was obliged to go to the river with his bucket for his supply of water—when his coals cost a guinea a bushel instead of eighteenpence—when he was told by the hosier, that his worsted stockings were advanced from a shilling a pair to five shillings—when, in fact, the price of every article that he uses should be doubled, trebled, and, in nine cases out of ten, put beyond the possibility of attainment—what, we ask, would be the use to him of his advance in wages? Let us never forget that it is not for the employment of labourers, but for the benefit of consumers, that labour is employed at all. The steam-engines are not working in the coal-pits of Northumberland, and the ships sailing from the Tyne to the Thames, to give employment to colliers and to sailors, but to make coals cheap in London. If the people of London could have the coals without the steam-engines and the ships, it would be better for them and better for the rest of the world. If they could get coals for nothing, they would have more produce to exchange for money to spend upon other things; and the comforts, therefore, of every one of us would be increased."

"This increase of comfort, some may say, is a question that more affects the rich than it affects the great mass. This again is a mistake. The whole tendency of the improvements of the last four hundred years has not only been to lift the meanest, in regard to a great many comforts, far above the condition of the rich four hundred years ago, but absolutely to place them, in many things, upon a level with the rich of their own day. They are surrounded, as we have constantly shown throughout this book, with an infinite number of comforts and conveniences which had no existence two or three centuries ago; and those comforts and conveniences are not used only by a few, but are within the reach of almost all men. Every day is adding something to our comforts. Our houses are better built—our clothes are cheaper—we have a number of domestic utensils, whose use even was unknown to our ancestors—we can travel cheaply from place to place, and not only travel at less expense, but travel ten times quicker than the richest man could travel two hundred years ago. The bulk of society is not only advancing steadily to the same level in point of many comforts with the rich, but is gaining that knowledge which was formerly their exclusive possession. Let all of us who are producers keep fast hold of that last and best power."

"We have endeavoured to show throughout this book that the one great result of machinery, and of every improvement in art, is to lessen the cost of production—to increase the benefit to the consumer. But it is a most fortunate arrangement of the social state, as we have also shown, that cheap production gives increased employment. The same class of false reasoners who consider that the wants of society are limited, cry out, it is better to have a population of men than of steam-engines. That might be true if the steam-engines did put out the men; but inasmuch as they increase the productions by which men are maintained, they increase the men. What has increased the population of England nearly tenfold during the last five hundred years, but the improvement of the arts of life, which has enabled more men to live within the land? There is no truth so clear, that as the productions of industry multiply, the means of acquiring those productions multiply also. The productions which are created by one producer furnish the means of purchasing the productions created by another producer; and in consequence of this double production, the necessities of both the one and the other are better supplied. The multiplication of produce multiplies the consumers of produce. There are probably, upon the average, no more hats made in the year than there are heads to wear them; but as there are sixteen millions of heads of the British subjects of Queen Victoria, and there were only five millions of the British subjects of Queen Anne, it is self-evident that the hat-makers have three times as much work as they had a century and a quarter ago. What has given the hat-makers three times as much work? The trebling of the population. And what has trebled the population? The trebling of produce—the trebling of the means of maintaining that population."

We have seen that cheapness of production benefits producers in their capacity of consumers; that it benefits them by extending the demand for their productions so as greatly to exceed the loss sustained by reduction of price; and that it benefits them by opening to them a market for skill and intelligence as well as for manual labour. Now the acknowledged purpose of every monopoly is to raise the cost of production, and to deprive producers of all the advantages we have enumerated.

Why, then, it may be asked, do many classes of producers clamour for protection and monopoly? The reason is plain; they look only to the profits to be obtained from the sale of the stock on hand, and do not take into consideration the re-production of that stock, and the chances of its future consumption. Should the restrictions on the import of foreign corn be maintained during the coming year, in presence of the scarcity which there is now too much reason to apprehend, the holders of corn will this year get very high prices for their stocks, but the agriculturists as a body will be exposed to a certain and almost a ruinous re-action in succeeding years, from the increased cost of their own consumption, from the increased cost of the re-production of the next harvest, and from the diversion of their capital to corn-cultivation from other forms of tillage. When the price of corn rises, the farmer not only pays an enhanced price for the food of his family, but also for the food of his cattle; and we would not hesitate to say that in many instances the loss on this kind of stock more than counterbalanced the gain on the price of corn.

Cheapness of production from import would lead to cheapness of production by home-growth. The fertilising effects resulting from the keeping of cattle have not yet been fully tried in England on account of the artificial increase in the cost of provender; maize or Indian corn, for instance, which could not profitably be grown at home, could be advantageously imported, and in its results it would become a valuable agent in the production of wheat. The Times some weeks ago, in a very able article showed how much more than is generally supposed the production of corn depends on the consumption of corn; we could easily give further illustrations of this important truth, but we wish to confine ourselves to the point which we undertook to demonstrate, that economy of production inflicts no injury on producers.

IMPROVEMENT.—It is impossible for an additional blade of corn to spring from the earth, for a new product to be created by industry, or a new act to be discovered by philosophy, without a consequent benefit, resulting through the whole chain of civilised connection.—Sir C. Morgan.

A HINT TO EDUCATION OBSTRUCTORS.—It is vain now to say that questions of religion and politics are above the understanding of the poorer classes: so they may be, but they are not above their misunderstanding, and they will talk and talk about them, so that they had best be taught to think and talk rightly.—Dr. Arnold.

VIENNA, OCT. 25.—According to statistical accounts, the population of the Austrian empire has increased at the rate of 21 per cent. during the last 25 years, being at present more than 38 millions of souls. Two millions belonging to the regiment in garrison here were executed this morning for the murder of a Jew, whom they had previously robbed.

THE POTATO DISEASE IN IRELAND.

On Monday afternoon, at three o'clock, a mixed deputation from the Dublin corporation and committee, appointed at the public meeting held on Friday last, waited upon the Lord Lieutenant by appointment. The deputation consisted of the Lord Mayor, the Duke of Leinster, Lord Cloncurry, Mr. O'Connell, Mr. H. Grattan, and several others. The Lord Mayor read a series of resolutions which had been previously submitted to the Lord Lieutenant. His Excellency read his reply from a written paper, as follows:

"My Lord Mayor and Gentlemen,—It can scarcely be necessary for me to assure you that the state of the potato-crop has for some time occupied, and still occupies, the most anxious attention of the Government.

"Scientific men have been sent over from England to co-operate with those of this country in endeavouring to investigate the nature of the disease, and, if possible, to devise means to arrest its progress. They have not yet terminated their inquiries; but two reports have already been received from them, which have been communicated to the public.

"The Government is also furnished with constant reports from the stipendiary magistrates, and inspectors of constabulary, who are charged to watch the state of the potato disease, and the progress of the harvest. These vary from day to day, and are often contradictory; it will therefore be impossible to form an accurate opinion of the whole extent of the evil till the digging of the potatoes shall be further advanced. To decide, under such circumstances, upon the most proper measures to be adopted would be premature, particularly as there is reason to hope that, though the evil exists to a very great extent in some localities, in others it has but partially manifested itself.

"There is no immediate pressure on the market. I will, however, lose no time in submitting your suggestions to the consideration of the Cabinet. The greater part of them can only be enforced by legislative enactment, and all require to be maturely weighed before they can be adopted. It must be clear to you that in a case of such great national importance no decision can be taken without a previous reference to the responsible advisers of the Crown."

When the deputation was about to withdraw, Mr. O'Connell, addressing his Excellency, said that with reference to one of the resolutions passed by the committee—that which referred to the stoppage of distillation—he was afraid that there was a serious difficulty to be got over before its adoption, namely, the injury it would be to the trader who had advanced his capital in the purchase of corn, spirits, &c.

The Lord-Lieutenant briefly replied, that the observation of the gentleman who had spoken was one deserving of much consideration, and one which had not been overlooked by the Government when they had the matter under discussion. The deputation then withdrew.

The Dublin Evening Post of Tuesday publishes a supplement, containing a vast body of information on the potato disease, from various parts of Ireland. Commenting on the accounts, that well-informed journal says:

The accounts present the same characteristics as heretofore. They are contradictory, almost conflicting, but we are bound to say that they are, upon the whole, more favourable than we were led from previous communications to expect. The weather doubtless has contributed to this encouraging tone. Indeed, that has been all which the most sanguine could expect, or the most religious could pray for. If the crop can now be saved, doubtless the fineness of the season for the last ten or twelve days must prove the best of doctors. But we must remember that we are not yet over the bridge. We have an anxious month before us, and three weeks at least must elapse before we shall have the satisfaction of congratulating the public on the salvation of two-thirds of the crop. We should observe also, that the corn-markets at present are stationary, and rather down—evidently under the impression of a defective potato-crop. Old oats, that which furnishes the best meal for human food, are now 17s. a barrel—a circumstance, we rather think, totally unprecedented in the presence of the new harvest, that harvest being, we are assured on all hands, one of the most abundant ever gathered in Ireland. New oats are about 14s. a barrel. In short, the only article of consumption that remains at a comparatively low figure is the potato.

A WARNING TO SIR R. PEEL!

The Dublin Evening Post of Tuesday, a paper of great influence, and one which has hitherto held back from the Repeal movement, has the following striking passage in an able article on the threatened potato famine:

"It does seem to us a shocking and disgraceful fact, and quite sufficient to create the disaffection which every one deprecates, that there is at this moment, when the people are clamouring for bread, a protective duty against the importation of wheat. John Bull may agitate, but will not act until he is pinched with hunger, and Patrick may enjoy the liberty of bawling, but the means which might possibly relieve the latter, who is beginning already to feel the approach of want, are denied, because, forsooth, an Act of Parliament is necessary to open the Ports. But the Ports might be opened, notwithstanding—the Queen's signature to an Order in Council would effect the object if it would be inconvenient to assemble Parliament before Christmas. This we know—and as non-repealers we are anxious to declare it—that a DOMESTIC LEGISLATURE, IF CALLED TOGETHER, WOULD SETTLE THE QUESTION IN THREE DAYS—and it would be assembled, if, indeed, the unanimous voice of the country were allowed to prevail. For Heaven's sake, let not an argument gathered from our present peril be added to those already in circulation in favour of repeal. If this hint be neglected, we are satisfied that many who are now wavering will embrace the principle of a resident Parliament. And who can blame them? We, certainly, shall not be amongst the number."

LANDS IN TEXAS.—The following items respecting the public lands of Texas are derived from a public document from the Land Office, laid before the Convention of the Republic:

Superficies of Texas 254,281,166 acres.
Total amount subject to location and unsurveyed 181,991,403 "

According to this, six states, each of the size of Virginia, may be formed out of Texas.—American Paper.

OPENING OF THE PORTS.

The Directors of the Manchester Chamber of Commerce forwarded, on the 22d ult., a memorial, of which the following is a copy, to Sir Robert Peel, as First Lord of the Treasury. We subjoin also the right hon. baronet's reply:

TO THE RIGHT HON. SIR ROBERT PEEL, BART., M.P., FIRST LORD OF HER MAJESTY'S TREASURY, &c. &c.
The Memorial of the Directors of the Chamber of Commerce and Manufactures, at Manchester, Sheweth,—That long experience has taught your memorialists that the prosperity of the cotton trade mainly depends upon the price of food; that an abundant and cheap supply of the first necessities of life has never failed to be coincident with increased employment and a higher rate of wages, whilst dearness and scarcity of provisions have as invariably been attended with a diminished demand for labour and a reduction of the earnings of the working-class.

That the cost of wheat flour and oatmeal has risen fully 50 per cent. within a few months, and the price of potatoes is kept down only by the eagerness with which the growers force them upon the market, on account of their inferior quality, and from a fear that they will decay; which increases the danger of future deficiency; whilst the reported failure of the crop in many parts of Ireland adds a fearful gloom over the prospects of that portion of the empire, in whose fate this country is indissolubly involved. From these facts your memorialists fear that a period of scarcity and privation is impending, which may endanger the well-being of this district, and subject the surrounding population to a repetition of those sufferings from which they have so recently emerged.

That, under these circumstances, your memorialists beg leave respectfully to urge upon your attention the necessity of devising some means of securing a sufficient supply of food for the people. In the opinion of your memorialists, often expressed to the Government and the Legislature, that object would have been best secured by removing, at a former period, all restrictions upon the trade in corn, believing that the enterprise and capital of our merchants, which have accumulated in our warehouses a stock of cotton equal to eight months' consumption, would have made a similar provision against a casual deficiency of food, had corn, like cotton, been left to the unimpeded operations of commerce. But so long as a law is maintained to prevent the regular exchange of our manufactures for foreign grain—virtually deterring other nations from providing for our wants, and prohibiting our capitalists from storing up a supply for future emergencies—so long as such a law is enforced, the Government invests itself with the responsibility of securing a sufficient supply of food at all times for the people.

Your memorialists call your attention to the difficulties which present themselves at the present moment, arising from the scarcity of food in Holland and Belgium, in parts of Germany, and even in portions of Russia. Those countries, which in former periods of scarcity ministered to our wants, are now competing for the scanty stocks in more distant markets. But their Governments have wisely and humanely offered facilities for the importation of food, which are denied in this country; their merchants are forestalling us in the grain markets everywhere, not excepting our own shores.

That, under these circumstances, your memorialists are of opinion that it becomes the duty of Government to open the ports for the free admission of food of all kinds. The success even of this decisive remedy depends mainly upon the promptitude with which it is applied, and therefore your memorialists urge the imperative necessity of adopting it without delay, by means of an order in Council; and they feel assured that such an act, dictated alike by prudence, justice, and humanity, would have the sanction of Parliament and the enthusiastic approval of the nation.

THOS. BAZLEY, President.

Whitehall, October 27th, 1845.

Sir,—I have the honour to acknowledge the receipt of the memorial of the Directors of the Chamber of Commerce and Manufactures, at Manchester, which bears date the 22d of October.—I am, Sir, your obedient servant,

Thos. Bazley, Esq. ROBERT PEEL.

(From the Norwich Mercury.)

This city has not been backward in taking steps in support of an order in Council for the relief of bonded corn. This week the following memorial has been signed by nearly 500 of the most respectable inhabitants of this city.

TO THE RIGHT HON. SIR R. PEEL.
The Memorial of the undersigned Inhabitants of the city of Norwich, Sheweth,—That your memorialists partake in the general alarm excited by the failure of the potato crops, and the deficiency in the wheat crops which have occurred simultaneously in Great Britain and Ireland, and in many of the nations of the Continent of Europe.

That the scarcity and consequent privation to the poor throughout her Majesty's dominions, to be apprehended from these causes, will be felt with peculiar severity in the city of Norwich.

That the operatives of this city have just emerged from a lengthened period of distress, unexampled in the memory of any living citizen, if not unparalleled in the history of civilised countries—a distress which, though borne with patient fortitude, has in many instances induced a condition of slow starvation—a distress which the Poor Law, and the utmost efforts of private charity, have been found alike utterly inefficient to relieve—a distress, in the recollection of which, your memorialists cannot look backward without affliction; nor forward, under present circumstances, without absolute dismay.

That the rate of wages now earned by these operatives—a rate not likely to be soon raised, and not certain to be long continued—is but barely sufficient to sustain life; the impending advance in the price of food must therefore plunge them during the coming winter into aggravated want. Necessity, it is said, has no law; the present emergency, as it appears to your memorialists, calls imperatively for the temporary suspension of that law which limits the supply of food.

For the sake of warding off as far as possible the anticipated sufferings of the poor citizens of Norwich, as well as the distress which is threatened to their fellow-subjects in Ireland, and in other parts of the empire, your memorialists entreat her Majesty's Government to suspend, for such time as they may deem expedient, all DUTIES ON IMPORTED ARTICLES OF FOOD.

(From the Dundee Advertiser.)

A meeting of the Town Council was held on Friday at noon. Present—Provost Brown; Baines Moyes and Hean;

Dean of Guild Thoms; Messrs. P. H. Thoms, Thomas Cuthbert, Charles Smith, Alexander Easson, James Webster, W. G. Baxter, Alexander Low, Edward Urquhart, William Harris, J. B. Rattray, Alexander Moncur, and John Couper. The Provost was in the chair.

Mr. W. Thoms took the customary oaths and his seat as Dean of Guild.

Provost Brown, before the commencement of the regular business, adverted to the alarming failure of the potato crop. He had made particular inquiry into the subject—at the principal dealers in Dundee as well as at competent individuals in the surrounding districts, and all were of opinion that fully half the crop had been destroyed by disease. Under such circumstances, it was impossible to know the consequences, if a supply of food were not obtained from abroad. He had therefore prepared a resolution on the subject, to be inserted in the council records, and a memorial to the Lords of her Majesty's Treasury, praying them to issue an order for the admission of provisions from other countries, free of duty. The Provost then read the resolution and memorial. The following is a copy of the memorial:

TO THE RIGHT HONOURABLE THE LORDS COMMISSIONERS OF HER MAJESTY'S TREASURY.

The Memorial and Petition of the Provost, Magistrates, and Town Council, of the Royal Burgh of Dundee, Humbly sheweth,—That your memorialists consider it their duty to represent to your lordships that a great calamity has befallen this part of the United Kingdom, by the failure of the present year's crop of potatoes, which constitute a very large proportion of the food of the lower classes.

Your memorialists have made extensive inquiries in this place and neighbourhood, and the result of these inquiries is a conviction that more than one half of the crop of potatoes is already affected by the disease, and that it is still spreading in such a manner as to cause apprehensions that almost the whole crop will be lost. They are informed by persons of experience that there will not be one-fourth of the usual quantity left at the end of December, and that it is doubtful if any can be preserved for seed till next spring.

Under these circumstances, your memorialists would humbly suggest to your Lordships that it becomes absolutely necessary, in order to prevent great distress, if not famine, among the lower classes, that an Order of Council should be immediately issued, permitting the importation of corn, and all sorts of vegetable food, free of duty. It is said that there have been abundant crops in the United States, and in the British colonies of North America. Were it immediately known that corn might be imported into this country free of duty, a supply would be obtained from these countries before next spring, and thus a great deal of distress and misery prevented.

May it therefore please your Lordships to take this memorial into consideration, and grant the relief suggested therein; and your petitioners will ever pray, &c.

Dean of Guild Thoms said, that the Council were much indebted to the Provost for bringing the subject under their notice, and for the trouble he had taken in collecting information. In a case affecting the food of the people, they should sink all minor differences. He would therefore heartily second the adoption of the resolution and memorial, and propose a vote of thanks to the Provost for the trouble he had taken in the matter.

Without a remark from any other member, these propositions were unanimously agreed to.

(From the Ayr Advertiser.)

The counties, hand in hand with the corporations in Scotland, must advise the precaution; and, to its very great credit, foremost amongst the latter has appeared the county of Lanark. The following advertisement appears in Tuesday's Glasgow Courier, which we insert as an example to other shires, and in the hope that Ayrshire may be amongst the first to follow:—

COUNTY OF LANARK.

Excerpt from the minutes of a meeting of the commissioners of the county of Lanark, held at Hamilton on the 24th day of October, 1845.

The Right Honourable Lord Belhaven in the chair.

The meeting took under their consideration the alarming disease in the potato crop, which prevails universally in this county, and which appears also to prevail throughout the rest of the United Kingdom, and over a great part of Europe and America. They came to the following resolutions, viz.:—That a general meeting of the county should be called to consider the propriety,

1. Of petitioning her Majesty to throw open the ports for the admission of all kinds of grain, pulse, flour, and other articles of food of a vegetable nature, duty free, and to suspend the use of grain in the distilleries.

2. For the purpose of recommending a disuse of oats, beans, and peas, as far as possible, in the maintenance of horses, and using due economy in the consumption of these articles.

3. For recommending to farmers to lay aside as much of their sound potatoes as will sufficiently serve for seed for the ensuing seed time.

4. For recommending to the farmers to convert all their unsound potatoes into farina or starch.

The meeting request Mr. Brown, and Mr. Marr, the clerk, to communicate this resolution to his Grace the Lord Lieutenant of the county, requesting him to call the meeting, with as little delay as possible.

NEWBURN.—On the evening of Friday last, a public meeting was held in the Town Hall, Bailie James Lyell in the chair, when it was unanimously resolved to memorialise the Government on the necessity of an immediate suspension of the Corn Laws, as a palliative in some measure to the evil that is soon to follow the alarming defalcation in the potato crop. The disease in that valuable esculent is very prevalent in this quarter.—Peebles Advertiser.

GLASGOW.—The Commissioners of Police came to the unanimous resolution, on Thursday last, of memorialising her Majesty's Government to open the ports for the admission of all foreign provisions free of any duty, it being argued by the various speakers that with scarcity of provisions comes a lamentable increase of crime.

LEITH.—On Monday the Chamber of Commerce of Leith passed resolutions in favour of opening the ports, and memorialised the Government to that effect.

CORK.—The Cork town council on Saturday unanimously passed the following resolutions: "That the council petition the Government, under the circumstance of the extensive failure of the potato crop, to open the ports for the admission of grain and all descriptions of food." "That the Government may direct any sum or sums of money, by way of loan or security, needful for obtaining such supply of oats, &c., for the use of the poor against the year 1846, to avert the evil of famine amongst them, which is likely to take place without these precautions."

BELFAST.—The Belfast corporation (almost exclusively Conservative), at a meeting on Saturday, adopted the following resolution by a large majority:—"That a petition be presented to the Queen, praying that under the present circumstances of the anticipated scarcity of food in this country, the ports shall be opened for the free admission of grain, and that distillation from grain be immediately prohibited." The merchants and other inhabitants of Belfast are about to meet for the same object.

THE WEST RIDING AGAIN IN MOTION.

HALIFAX, THURSDAY MORNING.—Last evening the qualification campaign for the West Riding of Yorkshire was recommenced in this town, when the Odd Fellows' Hall was filled with an audience probably unequalled on any former occasion for numbers and enthusiasm. Mr. Cobden and Mr. Bright attended, and their entrance into the hall, along with Mr. Jonathan Ackroyd, the chairman, and other gentlemen, was the signal for repeated cheers. The meeting was called for the purpose of renewing the qualification effort of last year, and every man present seemed to feel the stimulus which past success is calculated to afford. After some very appropriate and impressive observations from the chairman, the meeting was addressed by Mr. Cobden, M.P., Mr. Edward Ackroyd; Mr. Plint, of Leeds; and Mr. Bright, M.P. The present position of the country, and of the Free Trade question, formed the great subject of the speeches; every argument met the response which the experience and intelligence of the audience dictated, and the exhortations to a further increase of the register of the West Riding were received with an enthusiasm from which great results may be expected.

At the conclusion of the meeting the chairman stated that the registration committee sit on Tuesdays and Fridays to receive applications for qualifications, and to take measures for securing the property suitable for the purpose.

The meeting concluded with three times three cheers for Free Trade.

Halifax has taken the lead; but we understand that Huddersfield, Bradford, Leeds, and Sheffield, are also on the move.

THE LEAGUE—NEW CAMPAIGN.

(From the Scotsman.)

The League, taking prompt advantage of the present crisis, held a great gathering at Manchester on Tuesday, which should act as an example and a signal to the Free Traders throughout the country. We have made room for the principal portions of the speeches of Messrs. Cobden and Bright, both of which are full of sound advice and stirring appeals. In particular, the address of Mr. Cobden is one of great value, distinguished by all his wonted clearness and vigour, and presenting a striking view of the position in which Free Traders are placed at the present juncture, and the duties to which they are called. Mr. Cobden's warnings not to consider the question of the Corn Laws as settled, because a Lord has written an ambiguous letter, and because the ports are likely to be temporarily opened to stave off a famine, are well-timed and not unneeded. The wavering and embarrassment of the monopolists, and the certainty that circumstances will compel them to a temporary suspension of the Corn Law, should be taken by Free Traders not as guarantees of victory, but as incentives to effort. The monopolists are weaker than they were, but not a whit more willing; and will yield nothing that they can safely or possibly keep. It may, indeed, be set down as certain that the ports are about to be opened, the dreaded scarcity now appearing so near as to admit neither doubt nor delay. All the other countries placed this year in similar positions to Britain, or even in positions far less alarming—Russia, Holland, Belgium, even Turkey—have promptly and timely removed their restrictive laws, and, in some cases, have even resorted to bounties on importation. The Peel Government is, of course, considerably behind with its measure of relief; but in a day or two it will certainly show that, in the forcible phrase of Mr. Cobden, it "has learned Christianity from the Turk, and humanity from the Russian." It is equally certain, however, that the compelled deviation of a monopolist, or at best nondescript, Ministry and Legislature into justice and sense is not likely to be of long duration, unless in one form or another additional force and duration can be given to the compulsion. They will certainly attempt to do in 1845 as they did in 1826, when they suspended the Corn Laws for a few weeks to avert absolute famine, and reimposed them on the very first day on which they could safely venture the step. The people are now, however, better inclined and far better able to resist such a proceeding than they ever were before. The popular mind has been well saturated with the facts and reasonings of the question, and few are now partisans of the Corn Laws save those who imagine that personally they have a special and sinister interest in their maintenance. It would have been impossible in 1826 to get up an agitation of one-fourth the activity and influence of that which can now be brought into operation. Besides this, both the Ministry and the Parliament are far more accessible to the pressure from without than those of 1826. Public opinion now operates more powerfully and immediately on the Legislature (though in this respect there is still room for advance) than in the days of borough-mongering; and Sir Robert Peel is incomparably a more bidable and "squeezable" minister than George Canning. Even, therefore, though no emergency come to their aid, the Free Traders are in an infinitely stronger and more promising position than ever before; and there cannot be the shadow of doubt that the circumstances of the present juncture, and the measures which it will necessitate, will give them a golden opportunity of using their advantages. As we stated a week ago, the probability is, that the reasons necessitating a suspension of the Corn Laws this year may be found in existence next year also, while it is certain that the farmers will not lament the loss of the rent laws, nor the public be inclined to pray for their restoration. It is easier to keep a door shut than to close it again after opening. The League have hitherto been thundering at a shut gate—let it be opened but a little and for a little, and the work will be vastly easier. But let not the mistake be cherished that the work is already done—an opportunity is only given for doing it, but an opportunity so valuable that to neglect it were no less than treachery to a good and great cause. The time has come not for celebrating the victory, but for commencing what only, if promptly and energetically effected, will prove the decisive assault.

(From the Leeds Mercury.)

At the opening meeting of the Anti-Corn-Law League, at Manchester, on Tuesday last, Mr. Cobden, with his wonted judgment and sagacity, addressed to the assembled Free Traders the language of salutary caution, as well as of encouragement and stimulus. Admitting the probability that the ports would be opened at this alarming crisis, he recommended his hearers not to rely too confidently on a temporary measure, as though it would amount to a repeal of the Corn Laws, but to put themselves in a position that would ensure the attainment of their ultimate object in the entire abolition of the duties on food. Ireland has often been on the verge of famine, and the ports were opened in 1820; but, notwithstanding, the Corn Laws were continued, after the temporary exigency had been removed. It may be so again, if the Free Traders are feeble and unprepared. We want, as Mr. Cobden says, "not the mere opening of the ports, but to set our backs against them, to prevent them from ever being shut again." Neither Lord Ashley's letter nor Mr. Escott's speech assures us of such a consummation. It is by their own strength, resolution, and well-timed activity that the Free Traders must obtain the victory. The threatened dearth, though in itself more lamented by Free Traders than by any others, because they know so well the suffering it will produce, is yet an opportunity to be improved. It affords another illustration of the folly of laws which restrict the trade in human food: and we must avail ourselves of that illustration to strengthen our ranks, and to call forth public opinion with such force that the Minister will not only be encouraged, but compelled, to abandon the Corn Laws.

(From the Bradford Observer.)

The League has met and spoken. On Tuesday evening the great Free Trade Hall in Manchester was crowded, and hundreds could not get in. Mr. Cobden was the first speaker. As our readers may naturally suppose, he soon came to speak of the failure of the potato crop in Ireland. "But we are not," said Mr. Cobden, "come here to-night to exult in the fallen and menacing condition of our unhappy sister island, Ireland. We are come to devise a remedy; and what, I ask, is the natural and obvious remedy against the gaunt famine which threatens a country like Ireland?"

You would say, "Open wide the ports, and admit the bread of the whole world to feed the people." (Cheers.) That is the obvious and natural remedy—that is the remedy which an enlightened despot would at once fly to. Witness Russia, witness Prussia, witness Germany, Holland, and Belgium; these Governments have not waited, but when their people have been threatened with want they have at once thrown open their ports, and in some cases stopped exportation, in order to supply their people with abundance of the first necessities of life. (Hear.) Why has not our Government taken a similar course? Why have they waited to learn Christianity from the Turk, or humanity from the Russian? (Cheers.)

Sir Robert Peel might probably open the ports, under the pressure of circumstances; but Mr. Cobden warned his audience that there was danger of them being shut out again:

Many people now say, "Admitting that Sir Robert Peel opens our ports, and foreign corn comes in, that will not settle the question;" and this is a point that I wish particularly to draw the attention of this meeting to, for I see a disposition upon the part of many of my friends to throw up their caps, and consider this question as settled. (Hear.) I do not exactly see my way to the settlement of this question yet. I wish I did. I do not think the opening of the ports would settle this question. We had the ports opened in '26; but they passed the sliding-scale in '28, with all its horrible iniquities. (Hear.) What I wish to impress upon you now is, that it is not the opening of the ports alone we want, but we want to set our backs against them to prevent them from ever being shut again." (Cheers.)

But for all that the League had done, it had much work yet to do. With famine for an ally; with millions shrieking on the brink of despair, and ready to be swept over with the besom of hunger, they must still work; they themselves must give the Corn Laws the coup de grace, else the serpent would be scotched, not killed. The ports might be temporarily thrown open, but they might depend upon it an attempt would be made to shut them again as soon as possible. The registrations must still be attended to. The 10s. qualification must be worked as efficiently as it was last year. Mr. Cobden hoped that the West Riding of Yorkshire, which had so nobly done its duty this year, would qualify 2000 more by the 31st of January next, and thus save the expense of a contest at the next election. Mr. Henry Ashworth and Mr. Bright were the other speakers. Mr. Ashworth thought that with wheat at 60s., and still tending upwards, it was time to sound the alarm, for they might be assured that they were on dangerous ground. Mr. Bright eloquently urged the meeting not to put their trust in princes. The conversion of a lord here and there would never carry the point. They should remember that there were no conversions among lords before the League became powerful; and when the League was powerful enough to carry a repeal of the Corn Laws without the aid of lords, they would be repealed, but not before.

(From the Macclesfield Chronicle.)

The enormous money engagements to which the country at this moment stands pledged, renders the crisis unspeakably more alarming than it would otherwise have been; and in regard to that contingency especially, the League has all along given the nation most solemn warning. Some telling remarks of Mr. Cobden's, in regard to the bearing of the foot question on the railway interest, will be found in our account of the League meeting, held at Manchester, last Tuesday evening.

(From the Blackburn Mercury.)

The past week, like its predecessor, has been less distinguished by the occurrence of remarkable events, than the symptoms presaging their coming. The public mind has been kept actively employed, although few circumstances have offered themselves to divert it. Reflection on the country's condition and prospects continues all engrossing. The event of the week is the great meeting of the Anti-Corn-Law League, in Manchester; and it is to be regarded as a gigantic indication of the spirit to which we refer. Reflection on the country's prospects furnished the incentive to that great convention, and the topic of discussion.

before it; and truly no topic more important was required, or could have been found better fitted to converse such an immense meeting, and so thoroughly enchain its sympathies, as that which engaged its attention. Its numbers and influence—the topics discussed—the spirit manifested—and above all, the circumstances under which it was summoned—constituted this one of the most imposing demonstrations this extraordinary body has ever made. What a refutation it furnished of the drivelling assertion of the dissolution of the League, lately made so dippantly by some of the Tory organs. Anxiously as Free Traders are constrained to regard the present prospects of the country—their anxiety could not be unmingled with satisfaction and pride. They reviewed their seven years' campaign. Little less than hopelessness distinguished its commencement,—wasting toil and anxiety had marked its progress—and, as Mr. Ashworth observed, "had furrowed the cheeks of old men amongst them," who, were nevertheless ready, if necessary, to re-devote themselves to the arduous work. But the astounding and important evidences of approaching triumph were enough to render apprehension of a renewed campaign of seven years unnecessary. The citadel of the enemy is abandoned by its watchmen, the League has completed the sap of its foundations—the mass totters—it needs but a last, combined, determined effort, to hurl it into ruin. The special object of the meeting appeared from the addresses of the different speakers to warm up the country to make that effort, to prepare for its prolongation if necessary. That the fall of monopoly is at hand, there are strong reasons to believe. Our earnest aspiration is, that its fall may come quickly, and that it may arise no more.

(From the Newcastle Advertiser.)

The Anti-Corn-Law League are once more fairly in the field. They have opened another campaign with unabated earnestness and zeal, at a period when all that appears requisite to secure their unconditional triumph is almost within their immediate reach. Mr. Cobden's address deserves an attentive perusal, as well because it may be regarded as an enunciation of the views of the League on the present crisis, as on account of its admirable and sagacious reasoning. While admitting the desirability and probability of the ports being opened, he cautions the friends of Free-trade not to be satisfied with a measure merely temporary in its character, and urges them to secure a victory so decisive as to prevent the continuance of the Corn Law after the impending danger shall have passed away. Not only must the ports be opened, but we must be able "to prevent them from ever being shut again;" and the most effectual way of doing this is by largely increasing the number of Free Traders on the county registers. The people are pretty well agreed, we conceive, that the hazards, uncertainty, and cruelty of the Corn Law are too monstrous to be tolerated; and all that they have now to do is to make one more united effort, and in the abolition of the Corn Law to pronounce the doom of every other law at variance with the general good. The key-stone out, the fabric will not long remain.

(From the Glasgow Argus.)

The meeting of the League at Manchester, which took place on Tuesday evening, was one of the most telling demonstrations which have as yet been made in behalf of Corn Law repeal. Mr. Cobden's speech is a perfect masterpiece of popular oratory, and told with electric effect upon the thousands who were assembled on the occasion in Free Trade Hall. The gains which a close attention to the registry has secured to the League are perfectly astounding, and are stimulating to exertions in the south of England, which will rescue some of the agricultural counties from the withering blight of monopolist influence. Come when it will, the League will be ready, with its armour on, for the struggle which will universally characterise the next general election.

OUR EXPORTS AND HOME TRADE.

It may be remembered by many of our readers, that in the spring of 1840, immediately after the close of a year of unusual depression in trade, a paper was issued from the pen of Mr. Edward Baines, jun., of Leeds, purporting to prove (what to many appeared a staggering proposition) the extent of the depression of the trade of 1839, by the increased exports of that year. In a country where we are so much in the habit of measuring our prosperity by the extent of our commerce, and where an almost entire absence of statistics with regard to our internal consumption, leaves us with little general data as to the increase or decrease of that consumption at home, we are too apt to take the statistics of our foreign trade as conclusive of the general condition of the country at any given period. It must, however, be evident to all, that an increase of our export trade may co-exist with a corresponding increase of production without influencing the amount of home consumption, or it may arise directly from the diminished means of the home consumer. A large export trade may arise either from a great productive power, or from the inability of the country to consume its own produce from some artificial cause. And the only means of determining at any particular time, whether an increased or decreased amount of our exports is to be considered as an evidence of prosperity or depression, is to ascertain the proportion which it bears to the whole production of the year.

That an increase of our exports may be an evidence of a decreased home consumption, and of an unusually depressed state of the country, the statistics of the trade of 1838 and 1839 afford abundance of evidence. And this proposition will appear even more clear to the practical merchant, when he considers how much more easy it is to procure consignments of manufactures to foreign markets, when the home trade is in a depressed state, than when it is prosperous. For the purpose of making this principle more clear, and showing its application in another way to the experience of the present year, we will shortly refer to the facts connected with the trade of those two years, 1838 and 1839.

In the year 1838 the declared value of our exports amounted to 50,000,970*l.* and in 1839 to 53,233,580*l.*; so that, judging only by this criterion, the latter would be at once pronounced to have been the more prosperous year of the two. But it must be quite clear, that without knowing the state of our home consumption at the same time, we have not sufficient data, for forming a correct opinion. For this purpose we have not, however, any direct statistics on which we can rely; but we have a means of discovering the whole extent of our production by the amount of the various articles of raw materials imported and consumed at the different periods. Now, in the two years in question, we find this remarkable fact—in 1832, while the amount of our exports increased so much, the whole quantities of raw materials imported and taken for consumption materially diminished as compared with 1838. It is, therefore, thus rendered clear, that out of a smaller entire production we exported a much larger quantity, and beyond doubt, therefore, retained for home consumption a quantity less, not only by the additional amount exported, but also by the lesser entire quantity produced. The following are the quantities of raw material which were consumed in 1838 and 1839.

Cotton Wool lbs	460,756,013	355,781,960
Silk, raw "	3,683,739	3,483,363

—Board of Trade Tables.

But notwithstanding the great decrease here indicated, of the whole amount of goods which was produced in 1839 compared with 1838, we find that we exported in the two years as follows:—

	1838.	1839.
Cotton manufactures ..	£16,715,857	£17,694,303
Silk "	777,280	865,763
Linen "	2,730,272	3,422,488
Woollen manufactures and yarns	6,179,604	6,679,277
Total of all goods ..	50,060,970	53,233,580

—Board of Trade Tables.

It is impossible to look at these two statements, the one exhibiting so great a decrease in the whole amount of goods produced, while the other exhibits so much larger a proportion of what were produced, as being exported, without being forcibly struck with the sudden and rapid decline in the home consumption. And it cannot be without peculiar utility at the present moment, in more ways than one, as we shall hereafter show, that we should refer to the immediate cause of this enormous decrease in the home consumption of manufactured goods. After the American crisis of 1836-37 had passed away, the commerce of the country assumed an unusually steady and healthy appearance, and the close of 1837 and the greater part of 1838 bore all the evidences of a prosperous and legitimate trade. There never was a period more free from speculation or excitement of any kind. The Bank of England had regained a safe and satisfactory position, the amount of bullion was steadily increasing, the people were well employed, the public revenue was improving, and food was abundant and moderate in price till the autumn of 1838. The price of wheat in 1837, and the greater part of 1838, averaged from 48*s.* to 52*s.* the quarter. In the autumn of 1838, when it was discovered that the harvest was defective, the price suddenly rose until it reached 73*s.* the quarter on the 5th of September; and from that time, and during the whole of 1839, it fluctuated between 70*s.* and 80*s.* the quarter. Now, it is especially worthy of remark, that at that moment there existed no other cause whatever for the depression in trade which immediately followed that rapid increased price of food. There was no other general source of public loss. The effects of the speculations of 1835-36 had entirely passed away with the crisis in the latter year. But when we consider that from Sept. 1838, and during the whole of 1839, computing the consumption of wheat at twenty millions of quarters per annum, the weekly cost of bread to the whole country was increased by the sum of 400,000*l.* or at the rate of 20,000,000*l.* for the year, it is not difficult to understand why the home consumption of manufactured goods should have declined so materially as we have shown it to have done. It were impossible to find a better and more conclusive reply to those who contend for a high price of corn as a means of promoting a great home trade, than the remarkable facts to which we have now referred.

In the debate upon the Corn Law question in March, 1840, Sir Robert Peel referred to the arguments which we have now stated, and by way of replying to them said, "That if it were contended that an increased amount of our exports proved a diminished home consumption, it might equally be contended, when our foreign trade was declining, that it proved only an increased internal prosperity." Sir Robert Peel, however, omitted to notice that the fact of an increased export proving a diminished home consumption was only contended for, because it co-existed with the other fact, of an entire decrease of the quantity of goods produced. And if the right hon. baronet had said, that the argument then contended for amounted to the admission, that a decline in our export trade, co-existing with a large increase of our entire production of goods, proved an increased home consumption, then there can be no doubt such an inference would have been borne out by the arguments and facts then used. And we have now come to a period when the exact reverse state of the facts as they existed in 1838 and 1839, leads to the reverse conclusions. During the last six months, while our entire production of goods has been larger than at any former period, the proportion of those goods which has been exported has been gradually diminishing; and we now find, that a decrease in our export trade is an evidence of an increasing home consumption.

That the entire production of goods in the present year exceeds that of any former one, we have the best evidence, again, by comparing the entire quantities of raw materials consumed.

By the Board of Trade Tables of imports, which we published in our last supplement, the following are the quantities of the various articles of raw materials of our manufactures, imported to the 5th of Sept. in the present year, compared with 1844.

	1844.	1845.
Cotton wool cwt	4,860,100	5,068,177
Silk, raw lbs	2,450,777	2,538,725
Thrown "	220,960	266,343
Flax cwt	1,990,141	1,814,869
Hemp cwt	421,045	477,709
Sheep's wool lbs	43,871,706	46,134,778

The consumption of dye stuffs and other articles, generally contributing to manufactures, has also considerably increased during the present year.

For the first four months of the present year, to the end of April, the amount of our exports showed an increase over those of last year; but in every month since that time there has been a rapid and somewhat considerable decline, as the following statement, taken from the official accounts, show:

	1844.	1845.
COTTON MANUFACTURES EXPORTED.
Four months, to May 5 ..	25,991,353	26,347,715
Four months, to Sept. 5 ..	6,800,681	6,882,174
SILK MANUFACTURES EXPORTED.
Four months, to May 5 ..	238,094	241,391
Four months, to Sept. 5 ..	309,067	312,711
LINEN MANUFACTURES EXPORTED.
Four months, to May 5 ..	1,010,936	1,000,798
Four months, to Sept. 5 ..	1,100,893	1,029,925
WOOLLEN MANUFACTURES EXPORTED.
Four months, to May 5 ..	2,351,894	2,483,916
Four months, to Sept. 5 ..	3,500,096	3,083,433

Thus showing that the exports of woollen manufactures have decreased nearly 800,000*l.*, and cotton manufactures upwards of 200,000*l.*, during the last four months, as compared with 1844. And the effect is even more striking when we compare the progress of the whole amount of the exports from month to month.

ENTIRE EXPORTS OF THE PRINCIPAL ARTICLES OF BRITISH AND IRISH PRODUCE AND MANUFACTURES.

Four months, to May 5 ..	14,987,255	16,035,365
In 3 months, to May ..	4,503,464	4,447,213
— June "	6,005,253	4,916,171
— July "	5,131,341	4,800,121
— August "	5,545,233	5,033,616

It is thus shown that, in every succeeding month, our exports have been diminishing at a greater rate. And in the face of so much evidence as we have, that at the same time the whole amount of production has been larger, it must follow that the home consumption has been increasing so much, as not only to include the deficiency in our exports, but also the excess of our entire production. Here, then, we have a remarkable result of a continued abundance, and comparatively moderate price of food up to the period in question; and the whole experience of 1844 and 1845, to the time to which these accounts are brought down, again furnishes another conclusive reply to those who contend that a high price of corn is necessary to maintain a good home market for manufactures.

It is, however, impossible that we can dismiss this subject without referring to the new condition in which the country is placed in consequence of the recent advance in the price of provisions, and to the certainty that the price must continue high for a considerable time to come. Little more than two months ago the average price of wheat was 49*s.* the quarter, now it is 59*s.* But this increase of the price of wheat does not actually indicate the real advance in the price of bread. A highly intelligent correspondent, on whose accuracy we can place the most implicit reliance, writes thus:

"The low quality keeps down the averages, and keeps up the duty. It is quite on the cards (and indeed we are approaching to such a state now), that our corn might all be so bad as not to reach 50*s.*—(our correspondent is a landowner in the north)—and thus keep up the duty at 20*s.*, when we had not a sack of flour fit for human food. In fact, the worse the article, the higher the prohibition against purchasing a better. I was very much struck the other day with this unfair operation of the averages. I purchased some fine flour at 35*s.* the load, about two months ago, when the average price of wheat was 32*s.* When I returned from the Continent a week since, I found the averages at 58*s.*, but I had to pay 56*s.* the load for the same quality of flour." The rise in the average price of wheat is no fair indication of the real advance in the whole entire additional sum which the country is now paying for food, which is more truly shown by the difference between 35*s.* and 56*s.*, as the price of a load of fine flour. With the experience of 1838 and 1839 before us, it is impossible that any prudent man can disregard so important a cause of disturbance to our recent unusual prosperity as is presented by this great increase in the cost of food, and the disturbance which must take place by the altered distribution of the entire expenditure of the country for some time to come. There are many reasons which will, in all probability, prevent any sudden reaction at the present time; but it cannot be denied that the almost universal failure of the potato crop, and to say the least a defective grain crop, have, within the last two months, materially changed the future prospects of trade.

ADULTERATION OF FLOUR.—A special petty sessions was held at the Crewe Arms, Crewe, on Friday, when there were present on the bench five of the six justices in the district of Nantwich, to hear informations against several of the millers and flour sellers in the district, who were charged with adulterating their flour with alum. The court-room was full of hearers. The first case called on was against Mr. James Cookson, of Warrington, for having in his possession, at Crewe Green, a quantity of alum for the purpose of adulterating flour. It was clearly proved, that about 44 pounds of alum were found in the defendant's mill, together with a quantity mixed in the grain, with beans and wheat, and which were then being ground into flour. On the part of the defence a great number of witnesses were examined, many of whom grossly perjured; and, after a most patient investigation, which lasted nearly the whole day, the defendant was convicted in the mitigated penalty of 40*s.* and costs. There is another information against the defendant, and 15 against other parties. As this system is carried on to an alarming extent, we call upon the public to exert themselves in the cause, and give them the following extract as a stimulation to the work:—"The pernicious ingredients, alum and spirits of vitriol, used by bakers as binders and whiteners, are the causes of thousands of untimely deaths in this country, and a large portion of the diseases under which mankind are suffering."—Liverpool Albion.

THE HAGUE, Nov. 3.—Among the many measures adopted by the Government to procure from abroad a supply of provisions to make up the deficiency in our crops, especially potatoes, is the following:—His Excellency the Minister of the Colonies informs the merchants, that by the King's authority, orders have been given to the Governor-General of our East Indian possessions, to encourage by all possible means the exportation of rice to the mother country, and to take care that during the year 1846 Dutch ships, the half of whose cargoes at the least consists of rice to be imported into the Netherlands, shall be admitted free into all the little ports of Java, to exempt them—1, from the payment of export duties on rice, or to cause it to be returned to them if they have already paid it; 2, from the import duty on the sacks for the rice; and, 3, from the anchorage, convoy, and harbour dues. The captains of ships are only bound to give security for the amount of their dues, in order to insure the importation in the Netherlands.—Dutch paper, Nov. 4.

David Salomons, Esq., late sheriff, has presented the City of London Schools with 1660*l.* 18*s.* 4*d.*, for the purpose of establishing scholarships of 50*l.* a year for ever.

LETTERS ON THE CORN LAWS, No. XLIX.

TO THE DUKE OF RICHMOND, PRESIDENT OF THE AGRICULTURAL PROTECTION SOCIETY.

MY LORD DUKE,—The resolutions published by the general committee of the above-mentioned Society, dated the 4th inst., are not graced by your name. Your responsibility may be the less apparent; it is not the less real. Until disowned, every member of that Society, much more its president, is committed to the approval of proceedings which the minds of many can only regard with unqualified reprobation and unutterable disgust.

The thoughtful and humane of all ranks, parties, and classes, are anxiously contemplating the condition of the country as to its supply of food. They look far and near for the means of averting the most fearful of calamities. Other feelings on public measures are for a time in abeyance. "All mankind's concern is charity," except that of your Central Society, and theirs is "protection."

Already numerous meetings have been held, as many more will soon be held, to suggest alleviations, or pray for their prompt adoption, in order to meet the coming crisis. The analyst will have to record that, at a juncture so momentous, one meeting was held for the purpose of taking care that the bread-tax should neither be removed nor abated. President of protectionists, in that fact you are "damned to everlasting fame!"

You call the "apprehension of inadequate supply" unfounded. And why? Not because you know it to be so, for you forthwith apply for information to your country correspondents. The assertion is made in confessed ignorance, and then the forms of an inquiry are prescribed for its confirmation. Your local agents cannot mistake their duty. Facts are to be furnished for your assumptions. You question even the deficiency of the potato crops. You are satisfied of nothing, and with nothing, but that plunder extorted from contingent starvation which you stimulate and struggle to retain under the veil of "protection to British agriculture not less than that at present existing."

There is suggestive falsehood in the terms of your inquiry. You ask whether the crops exceed or are below "an average." You inquire simply of quantity, and not of quality; and, had the instruction been more complete, what would avail the crops being up to an average, the population not being kept down to an average? The wants of progressive increase cannot be met by averages. There are 380,000 more mouths to be filled this year than last. The mouths of last year were not redundantly crammed, though the crops far exceeded an average. This reference to average is sheer delusion.

One clause of your resolution contains what is meant for proof of your professed opinion:

"That it is the opinion of this society that the supply of wheat, and other grain in this country is not such as to justify alarm, notwithstanding the efforts so industriously made to impress the public mind with a conviction to the contrary; and that the supply will be found sufficient; since the average prices at the present time barely exceed those contemplated as desirable by the framers of the Corn Law of 1812."

You misrepresent Sir Robert Peel. He never professed to legislate for 56s. a quarter, as the price of wheat unfit, without admixture, for human food. He never professed the protection of wholesome corn at 70s., by a duty of 15s. a quarter. And this, as you know, is the present state of the markets. The spirit of his Act is violated by the effect of literal adherence to its provisions. You have more than your bargain. The duty ought to be only 1s. The 14s. are yours by the partial clumsiness of the machinery. This sharp practice, however, adds little to the enormity of battling for "protection" at all at such a moment.

Corrupt motive is insinuated in the mention of "efforts so industriously made to impress the public mind." Could dishonesty as well as industry have been shown; could the falsification of facts and figures, of quotations and authorities, have been proved upon the alarmists as they have been proved upon the publications of your society, you would have felt no delicacy about the production of the demonstration. You would have spoken out plainly. Efforts to ascertain and make the public acquainted with the truth ought to be "industriously made." They need no cowardly or dirty innuendo. Such "protection," my lord duke, is left to your Central Society.

The greatest curiosity in this document remains to be noticed. You suggest a proof of the advantage of "protection" to the community, and that proof is in comparative cheapness. The verba ipsissima run thus:

"That the price of grain being (proportionably with the means of the people) lower in this country than in the above Continental states, proves that the protection afforded to the producers of grain in this country is beneficial to the community at large."

The community, then, is benefited by comparatively low prices of grain. "What! can the devil speak truth?" There stands the proposition, clear and distinct, in the manifesto of the Agricultural Protection Society. The question of fact, as to relative prices, and the relative means of the people, I pass over. It matters not to the principle whether your assumptions on those points be correct or incorrect. You have linked together the common good and low prices; and you know that low prices are neither the object nor the result of Corn Laws. Low prices are your everlasting objection to Free Trade. Rest the merits of your monopoly where now you have placed them, and debate is brought to an immediate termination. Every thing is conceded. In your words, protection makes confession before execution

The condition, "proportionably to the means of the people," is ingeniously introduced to evade the comparison of actual prices. It suggests many questions. If the people, by skill and industry, multiply the means, is that a just reason for making laws to raise the price of their provisions? If let alone, would not prices be yet lower in proportion to their means, and therefore (by your own logic) the community more benefited? Have landowners a vested interest in the gains of merchants and manufacturers, and thereby a right to appropriate, by class legislation, a portion of those gains? Who make the people's means? Are they not enhanced by the extension of industry, and limited by its restrictions? In what plight do the people's means leave millions? What signifies this doctrine of proportion to the potato-eaters? It is a shadowy consolation to the hungry peasant that some Continental serf is hungrier than he; and that, while the loaf is three times more than that serf can afford to pay, it is only twice as much as he himself can afford to pay. Cold comfort to the drowning man, in 20 fathoms water, that somebody else is drowning in 30 fathoms water. Such comfort brings his grace of Richmond to the pauper peasantry of England.

The Protection Society has lost a chance. At a time when facts sufficiently alarming have been ascertained, and there is a large margin of vague but not altogether causeless apprehension; when a combination of calamity threatens the wealthiest portion of the United Kingdom with hard struggle and sore endurance, and its poorer with the horrors of absolute famine; when accurate knowledge, careful forethought, and prompt action, are imperatively demanded; when each man asks his neighbour, what can be done, what is going to be done?

—at such a time, the Central Society might have aided other inquiries, by calling for facts from its agents without tainting them by "a foregone conclusion;" it might have co-operated with all who, through the length and breadth of the land, are uniting themselves to wrestle with the demon of want; it might have argued that even if alarm be unfounded, there are no means of allaying it so efficient as prompt measures for the amplest supply that can be obtained; and it might have resolved that no considerations of class interest should stand a moment in the way of the people's food and the people's painful reliance on the future. Instead of so doing, the Central Society seizes this awful moment to "call the attention of all peers and Members of Parliament representing their interests, or resident within their respective districts, to the necessity of supporting inviolate 'protection to British agriculture not less than that at present existing.'"

In a painting of the Deluge, a whole family perishes because the infatuated grandsire clutches with unrelaxing hand a bag of gold, and thus the bough breaks on which they clung, and which upheld them all above the waters. The type is not complete. It does not appear that the old man's gold was not honestly earned, or that it was extorted by taxation upon human necessities.

A NORWICH WEAVER BOY.

CORRESPONDENCE.

Colehill House, Highworth, Nov. 3, 1845.

DEAR SIR,—I rejoice to see that the League are still in full activity. How are your funds? If you are looking for further subscriptions, I will send as in former years, 50*l*.

The signs of the times are strongly for you; but I agree with Cobden, that we must not relax in our efforts.—Yours faithfully,

G. Wilson, Esq.

Rosse Priory, Nov. 3, 1845.

My dear Sir,—I am pleased to see by the report of the meeting of the League at Manchester, that you are quite alive to the important crisis which is at hand, in consequence of the failure of the potato-crop; and no time should, I think, be lost in bringing the powerful machinery of the League into play, to arouse the people, and through them the Government, to the approaching danger, which can alone be prevented, under the blessing of Providence, by giving every encouragement to merchants to import food largely from the southern states of America, where the supply is abundant. If the Government delays much longer opening the ports in Great Britain as well as in Ireland, the necessity for an additional supply of grain will become more imperative; and for it we shall be forced to pay in the precious metals. The consequences of a drain of gold to our trade, and the misery it entails, must be too fresh in the remembrance of every one not to call forth feelings of the greatest alarm at the possibility of such an occurrence.

It is evident that the supply can only come from America. Other nations have been beforehand with us, and set us a wise example by throwing open their ports, and securing that supply which we can only buy by offering a high price in hard cash; whereas, if orders are sent out immediately to New Orleans, there is every chance of our manufactures being taken in exchange, instead of our having to pay in gold, which, as I said before, would prove not only a fatal blow to our trade, but also to the great works now in progress, which are giving employment to so many thousand people. It is now ascertained beyond a doubt that the failure of the potato crop is general, both in Ireland and Scotland. Ireland, whose wretched population has long been reduced to the cheapest article of food, which has now failed, must evidently become a prey to famine, with its usual attendants—crime and disease.

Scotland will also suffer most seriously. The consumption of potatoes in this country is very great, and constitutes one half of the food of the people. It is needless to observe that the annihilation of so large a proportion of their food will be most severely felt, especially when to this scarcity is added the increased price of every other article of consumption. That there is but too much foundation for these fears cannot be denied. The disease in the potato is gradually spreading north; and those in the Highlands are beginning to be affected; and I do not believe that by the 1st of Jan., there will be a potato left in Scotland. True it is that the people can fall back upon oatmeal, but the price of this will soon be beyond the reach of many—and has advanced already from 26s. per sack (at which it was selling last year) to 42s. Indeed all kind of grain is rapidly reaching famine prices—Laving advanced from 10s. to 20s. per quarter in the last three weeks; old wheat selling at 85s.; new wheat at 65s.; and barley, new, at 37s.; all of which are extravagantly high, considering there is a good crop in this part of the country. But corn dealers clearly foresee, that if there be so large a deficiency in one item of food, even if there was a good average crop throughout the country generally, which there is not, there must be a scarcity; for instance, at Perth alone, not taking into account Newburgh and Dundee, and the other ports on the Tay, upwards of 80,000l. was last year paid for potatoes shipped to England, all which supply is for this year stopped, which of course must raise the demand for other produce.

If we can only succeed in getting the ports open, with the present feeling as exhibited by Lord Ashley and others, as to the final doom of the Corn Laws, we need not fear a re-imposition of the duty.—Yours faithfully,
George Wilson, Esq.

LETTERS FROM THE SOUTH OF ENGLAND.

FIRST LETTER.—THE FAMINE.

While the question of opening the ports for the admission of more food is occupying the attention of all who are learned on such a subject, or who should be so, in London, the disease in the potatoes, their actual dissolution into nothing but rottenness, is occupying the attention of those in Hampshire who know little about port opening, and little of the potato disease, save that they are likely to have much hunger during the ensuing winter, and very few potatoes.

It has appeared to me very extraordinary that so much should be written of the potato disease in Ireland, and so little said of it by the newspapers, or apparently known by them, or cared to be known, in England. I speak of the west and south of England more especially, as the districts with which I am best acquainted. If the state of the potato-crop in Ireland is to decide the opening of the ports, surely the English potatoes are not to be overlooked, nor the English labourers, whose chief article of diet potatoes are. With bread high in price, and likely to rise, even a large supply of potatoes would not be enough this year. How much greater must the suffering be when to dearthness of bread there is the companionship of scarcity of potatoes! Bacon is now 9d. per lb. in Hampshire. No labourer can buy it; and what is worse, those who have hitherto fed pigs to have some bacon, to sell to pay the shoemaker and the tailor, cannot keep their pigs—they have no potatoes. Those who raised good crops, and stored them away apparently sound, find the mystery of rottenness upon them, and the heavy misfortune of want upon themselves.

Notwithstanding the advance in the prices of all kinds of food, and the repeated assertions of master agriculturists, that wages rise and fall with the prices of food, no rise whatever is taking place in many parishes; and even where there is a rise, it is not in any degree commensurate with the asserted rule.

In the parish of Wallop, Mr. Lewis, a farmer, with a good character for fair dealing, and who like most others settles with his men once a month, told his men last Saturday at the monthly settlement, that he would advance their wages from 8s. a week, at which figure they have been paid for a long while past, to 9s. The men begged hard to have the sum set at 10s.; but Mr. Lewis said he could not promise it until he saw how his neighbours could do, some of whom objected to give the 9s. Thus, though bread has risen between 40 and 50 per cent. since last year, wages are only now rising at the rate of about a fourth of that rise in bread. Yet almost every shilling of these wages is expended in food; and this at a time when the potato mystery is emptying every cottage of its potatoes.

Already the village shopkeepers and tradesmen feel it, and complain that the labourers are neither paying what they owe for clothes and groceries, nor are they making new purchases. They are rapidly sinking by the high price of bread to that state in which they would live almost exclusively on potatoes; and this while they have no potatoes, or soon will have none, to live on.

I find one or more of the London morning papers have "potato commissioners" in Hampshire, inquiring into the state of that article. Their reports will be published, and you will have them to reprint if you think fit, so I need not enlarge on the details. I can only assure you the worst accounts from Ireland do not convey to us anything worse than Hampshire and the adjoining counties exhibit. I have seen in that very parish of Wallop, already mentioned, a family store of potatoes which was sound a month ago, and which is now rotten to the full extent of one-half, with the disease rapidly extending into the other half. A mother of a family, whose store is still worse, I saw the other day looking over her potatoes; and out of three sacks, which were good at Michaelmas, she has only one bushel of good ones now, the other eight bushels being gone absolutely to pulp. A person standing by said, "Surely if Sir Robert Peel saw your 'tatoes he would do something for you, and the like of you?" "God be good to him!" said the woman earnestly; "What I and my poor family be to do if the Lord Almighty do not send some good angel upon the earth, I know not. We be like to have nothing for it, but to die; and it be a hard thing to look forward to—that of dying of hunger. And it be a'most as bad to be half dying as we be now."

A shopkeeper, who retails potatoes, Mr. Wallis, has just told me that besides losing about one-half of his own crop, he feels the potato pestilence, added to the dear bread, affecting his trade very severely. Selling the potatoes in small quantities from day to day, they are picked by the poor purchasers as a matter of course; and the tainted ones, which a day before were perhaps sound, turned back upon him. Dealing as he does, also, in flour and bread and groceries, also in bacon, butter, and cheese, he sees a third of the money paid for bread and flour, which used to be paid for sugar, tea, butter, cheese, and bacon; and he sees in addition to that, persons who used to have potatoes of their own, buying them from him with money which is not only withheld from grocery purchases, but from bread and flour.

I believe Mr. Wallis's evidence as to his potato crop, and the frightful disease in it has been taken by a "potato commissioner," and sent to a morning paper—the Chronicle, if I mistake not.

At present I will not farther pursue the potato subject.

SECOND LETTER.

Labourers and Landlords.

On Monday (20th of October), I was present at Stockbridge, in Hampshire, when premiums were awarded to about 80 farm labourers, ranging from boys up to old men, and also to some women; the premiums, 101 in number, being given for long service, for cleverly-executed work, for careful attention to live farm stock, for the best cottage gardening, for the best managed allotments of a quarter of an acre each, for the virtue of foresight, and for generosity to suffering relatives. The premiums varied from 5l. to 3l. for each individual.

I shall not at present halt to inquire into the moral worth of these sums of money. Whether their amount and manner of distribution may effect all the good which is expected of them is one question, and the good intentions of the givers is another. Of the goodness of the intentions I have no doubt. But some of the sentiments delivered by the gentleman who presided for the day are worthy of special notice. I speak of Charles Baring Wall, Esq., M.P. for the borough of Guildford, in agricultural Surrey, and the owner of a large landed property in agricultural Hampshire; a gentleman whose liberality is not that of sentiment alone.

In addressing the men and boys, and the women, who received the premiums at the Town Hall, he said, amongst other things:

"The secretary had stated the pleasing fact that 100l. had been distributed that day; but this was not mentioned because it was a large sum, nor as being adequate to the value of the labourers around him. They all knew their value as labourers. They all knew what they owed them for giving them the sweat of their brow—the aid of their toil; and it would, he believed, gratify those who thus honourably fulfilled the duties of their station to know that they were sympathised and co-operated with by their employers."

And, in addressing the clergy, gentry, and farmers, after dinner, at the Grosvenor Hotel, he said:

"That they did their duty fully, he did not pretend to say;

few did; but still they were on the way, and he hoped each successive year would find them approximating more nearly to it. Since he knew the county, great improvements had taken place in it, and especially during the last seven years, through the instrumentality of that society. They were all liable to ride their favourite hobby over-much, and though he highly estimated the value of such an institution, he did not think that it could cure all the evils of our present social state. It was merely one of many agencies which must be employed, and in its own way had its use; and it was gratifying to state, that it had not only the support of a majority of the landlords, but also of the tenantry of the district, and under their auspices it was doing much good. They might not be able to go at railway speed, but he hoped they were steady and sure. The more happy they made the people, the more they would promote their individual interests. They must give education to improve the mind; and, at least, they ought to secure to the work-people good full bellies and well clad backs. (Cheers.) This would give them a better return than any speculation whatever; it would join them all in bonds of union, rich and poor together, and soften down the asperities which were but too apt to grow out of the want of friendly intercourse between the different classes of society."

Mr. Twynam, a tenant farmer, having given utterance to similar sentiments, a gentleman present, Mr. Busigny, complained that much of what was done and said at these meetings was idle show. The labourers wanted better wages, better food, and better cottages. And if the landlords were sincere in their friendship for the labourer, they would all dine together on such an occasion as this, instead of at different inns, at different hours, on different kinds of fare.

Mr. Wall, in reference to these remarks, spoke to this effect:

"With respect to the cottages round Stockbridge, he did not personally know their condition—not thoroughly. But those on his own estate were very different from what they had been. In some districts much difficulty existed in improving the cottages, because they were held on lives, and the landowners had no power over them whatever. Still even with such property a change for the better was in progress. He did not like standing up for his own class, merely because he belonged to it, but he had on several occasions when these lifehold properties fell in, and he had an opportunity of "doing what he liked with his own,"—taken advantage of that circumstance to improve the cottages upon them. With respect to the introduction of the labourers into that room, he was sure there was among those present no more objection to sit with a smock frock on each side than a frock coat—the class to which he (Mr. Wall) belonged. But he questioned whether there were not practical difficulties in the way. If all had been admitted, the room would have been too full even for Mr. Busigny, and as the labourers could not themselves have afforded it, he did not know whether Mr. B. would have liked to pay for the wine, &c., which the smock-frocks liked as well as the frock-coats.—(Laughter.) He had considered the subject, and had been led to the conclusion that it was inadvisable. The workpeople had dined at a more convenient hour, and had got away in good time to their own homes. They enjoyed themselves more among their own class; they did not injure themselves by spending above their means, and it would not be for the comfort or convenience of either one or the other class to drive them forcibly together. At the same time he repeated there was no personal disinclination to dine with smock-frocks, and if Mr. Busigny would get up another society for the improvement of cottages, and a dinner at the Three Cups, he (Mr. Wall) would be happy, not to preside, but to take his seat at the lower end of the table, and contribute to his utmost to aid its objects."

I have given these quotations from Mr. Wall's addresses for two purposes. First, because they suggest some remarks on a topic which has lately occupied some public attention. We have read of the Messrs. Chambers, of Edinburgh, holding their annual soiree with their work-people, and enjoying—masters, men, and invited guests, a social evening on perfect equality. We have heard of the factory workers of Oldham, inviting their employers to a soiree; and rising above mere social equality, they (the workmen) have filled the position of hosts to the masters. We have heard that the factory workers in the employment of the Messrs. Bright of Rochdale, stated to be above 900 in number, were brought to Manchester in a special train the other day, as were also those of Messrs. Whittaker, of Ashton-under-Lyne, 1200 in number, to see the Free Trade Bazaar, the day being given as a holiday, and the expenses of transit to and from Manchester, and the admission to the Bazaar, paid by the respective employers. Other reports of holidays and kind approaches to occasional equality of social life reach us from the regions of the factories. We, who live at a distance, have heard the wings of the press flapping over us, with poetry on them, mingled with the eloquent joy of Sergeant Talfourd at finding the hard-handed hard-working men of Manchester taking boyhood's play, and boyhood's name to the play, of the "Saturday half-holiday." The same press, on the same day, with the same wings; to wit, supplements, double supplements, and additional supplements to the double, brought us from London—London having inhaled it as if by a breath from Manchester—Jerrold's speech, with its simile, already illustrious, of the polar bear on the polar ice, the bear and the ice drifting into lighter and warmer latitudes; and the poor beast, used to darkness, howling and roaring, as if heaven and earth were coming together—fit type of the bears of human kind, who have loved darkness rather than light.

We have heard, too, of Leclair, of Paris, giving a hundred workmen, and upwards, a share in the profits of his business, on the principle and in the faith that he himself would have higher profits because they would become better workers and better men. All these things, indicating human progress, have come upon us from the cities and from the marts of trade within a few weeks.

But in those few weeks we have also heard from Dorsetshire that "an experiment" was made by George Banks, Esq., M.P., and his agricultural friends, to dine labourers and landowners in the same room; and farther, we have heard that the experiment was successful. But again we have heard from other quarters that it was a shabby thing to put the labourers at a side table by themselves, and dismiss them as soon as they had eaten their dinner and given "three cheers for the gentlemen." Comparisons have been made between the sociality of the men and masters of Dorset and the sociality of the men and masters of Oldham, in Lancashire.

Now I have never been inclined to admire the wisdom of Mr. George Banks—not his political wisdom—but I think in this dinner experiment he has not been fairly treated. To compare the working men of Oldham—who, many of them, in the experience of public meetings become public men, while in years they are little beyond boys; who all of them associate together through boyhood and manhood in the direction of societies, assemblies, and deliberative meetings—to compare them with the farm labourers, who have no experience in public association (unless it be the experience of disaster, when Dorsetshire labourers associated, and were dispersed by transportation), to compare the factory workers—who, being skilled in all the arts of managing their masters by associative experience, and who at last, in friendship, treat their masters to their hospitality—with the secluded and excluded, the cloddish and clayed, farming-men of Dorsetshire, is wholly unfair. But as you will see in my next letter, even landowners and land-labourers associate together, with a liberality and kindness on one side, and independence and enjoyment on the other, not surpassed anywhere else by any other people. I have, at least, seen one such assemblage; and it is because I have seen it that I have given the quotations in this letter from Mr. Wall's addresses at Stockbridge.

If any gentleman can contend at an agricultural dinner that it is not desirable to mingle people together who do not desire to be mingled, he can best afford to do so. He asks to preserve the separate dinners, because he knows the parties on each side prepared to dine, are not prepared to meet. But he holds a festival with his own labourers and poorer neighbours, because he and they are prepared to meet, and can enjoy the meeting.

THIRD LETTER.

Mr. Wall's Festival at Norman Court.

This occurred on Friday, the 17th of September. I was at that time attending the Poor Law inquiry at the Andover workhouse. Andover is 11 or 12 miles from Norman Court, and 10 miles from the village of Broughton. That village is four miles or thereabout from Norman Court. Hearing of the festival, I came across the country to see it. Not knowing anywhere else to go to, I took up my quarters at Broughton; and I wish I may never have worse; I should like to see all who can appreciate good accommodation as well quartered as I have been at the village inn there.

On the 16th, the day before the festival, the rain poured and the wind blew; cloud careered after cloud, and blast warred with blast. Still cooks cooked, carpenters hammered, tents were erected; and in the villages of Broughton on one side, and West Tytherley and West Dean on the other, preparations were going forward in boiling and roasting to supply the respective tents of the innkeepers in the park, only second in magnitude to the roasting and boiling at the squire's mansion in the park. But large as they were, they were second to that; the cooking there was on a scale of great compass.

The reason why the innkeepers of the villages had tents in the park was, that more people were expected to come, and did come, than the mansion could hold; and because, on a former occasion, several thousands of strangers had been there more than provision had been made for, or were invited; and who, though admitted to the tables so long as anything remained on them, only displaced others who had been invited; all of them saying, if they had only been able to get something to buy to eat, the staying to see the sports and the grand fireworks at night, would have been more agreeable.

This year Mr. Wall issued tickets to all who had been invited to dine amounting to about 1000, and better accommodation was therefore secured. The sports, consisting of every variety of healthful, pleasing, and harmless games, were open to every one who came, no matter of what rank, nor from whence.

The morning of the 17th dawned, and was fair and clear. For ten days and nights there had been rain and wind—sometimes more of the one than of the other; but always less or more of both. As already said, on the previous day was a storm. This morning was agreeably bright and fine. A few drops came on once or twice before the sun had risen high; but the sun himself, so pleasant upon the holiday-goers, seemed to say, as they said—

"What a shame! we ought to have no rain to-day." And then the rain said, "Well, then, I shall go somewhere else;" and it shrunk within its clouds, and they bundled themselves up and mounted upon a high and dry wind, and rode away.

Having breakfasted at the Greyhound, or the Hare and Hound, or the Dogs—I am not sure which it is, but the traveller who likes a good breakfast, the freshest of watercresses, and eggs and bread and butter, and coffee and cream, will not make any mistake, as it is "the house of the village—having breakfasted, and read while at breakfast the printed rules of that day's vegetable, fruit, and flower-show, the competitors in which were all to be labourers living in cottages rented from Mr. Wall, in Broughton, the two Tytherleys (East and West) for which show a liberal and comprehensive scale of premiums were awarded—having breakfasted, and also read at breakfast the catalogue of the Norman Court Lending Library, which library consists of 500 or more volumes, provided at Mr. Wall's expense, the only qualifications to obtain which is a desire to read, and a request to be allowed to borrow a book—the books consisting of the best periodical and serial works of the day, and of the standard works in religious, moral, and scientific biographies, poetry, instructive tales, and so forth; having also, when at breakfast, listened, as I have often done since, not only in Broughton, but in all the villages and districts around Norman Court, to the respectful, grateful, almost reverential remarks on Mr. Wall, as a kind landlord and liberal helper of all who need a rich man's help—as an employer of many men, and a payer of good wages—as the protector, not only of the living, but of the dead—the restorer of grave-stones of churchyards and of churches—having breakfasted, read, and listened to all these things, I, with some other friends, drove off in a "trap" for Norman Court.

Up Broughton-hill, westward, we toiled, one or two getting out, that the horse might have less toil; up Broughton-hill, a portion of the chalky ridge crossing the country, we went and got to the top of it, and upon the old Roman road from Winchester to Salisbury, (Winton to Sarum), locally called the "Devil's Walk," which road in part was altered and amended by the Socialists of Harmony Hall, who are now in difficulties with their property, difficulties which some venerable fathers and mothers of the villages say were to be expected to befall anybody who meddled with the "Devil's Walk;" having surmounted Broughton-hill, and left the wide expanse of woodless farm fields behind, turning only round to look down upon Broughton in its nest of trees for a minute, and upon the three Wallops, (in their bourne farther north, and upon "Lenard's Grove" (the cross roads which so named tell their own tale,) between us and the villages of the Wallops, we looked westward and southward, into a country all different from that east and north of us. A succession of woodlands, now in hollows and now on heights; now with open fields, and elsewhere, with winding glades; now humble and cope-like, and again lofty and majestic, lay before us and below us, over a distance of six miles, bounded by another bold range of chalky hills, resembling that which we had just come over.

By turns we went down and again up; to the left and to the right, and on, forward, turning again and again. Elderly men and women were standing aside to let us pass in the narrow woodland roads, or setting down to rest themselves with their baskets of vegetables which they were carrying to the show. Boys with clean "smocks" on, or new jackets, were pushing on as fast as they had breath to Norman Court, and shouting as we passed; old and young, male and female, rich and poor—most of the rich, who had horses at home, walking as well as the poor, lest there might be no stabling for all the horses expected there; all these peopled the roads; and each gave the other joy of the fine day, as they journeyed onward.

To linger long enough to tell how the ripening filberts hung upon the bushes which bordered us in clusters; how the glittering wet in the morning sun gave freshness to the autumn leaves; how the dark woods towered aloft, and the stealthy rays of the sun, as if it crept into a solemn cathedral silently and softly to worship; to linger long enough to describe all these would be to leave neither space nor time for what is coming.

We arrived near the front of the mansion, commanding a magnificent view southward over woods and meadows, and fields; dells, eminences, openings, thickets, and through noble park trees, amid which the carriage-roads led off, and lost themselves. On the side of the mansion next us, extending over a dozen acres or so backward, and now on our right hand, was a green smooth sward embosomed in lofty lines of trees, these lines being but the front rank men of deep thickets. Into this we turned, and drove to the tent of Mr. Lane, from Broughton, which stood fronting downward and towards us.

On our right hand, at entering under the trees, was the sign of the Lion, Mr. Beauchamp, from West Dean; and half-way up, in front of the trees, was the Black Horse, Mr. Fowkes, from West Tytherley. Varieties of other smaller tents with confectionary, and exhibitions of natural curiosities and such like, were in the intermediate spaces. But the grand attraction were two tents of Mr. Wall's, on the left hand side, near the centre; one was for the show of vegetables, fruits, and flowers; and the other was a kind of store, at which Mr. Wall himself presided, furnished with a variety of fancy and useful articles, to be given as prizes to those who might win them at such games as archery, for which there were six targets, with bows and arrows in abundance; such games also as cricket, and nearly all kinds of ball playing, puff and dart, quoits, hurdle racing, leaping, and so on. There were generally such chances as 12 shots for a penny; the men attending to the targets, &c., receiving the pennies, and giving a ticket to the winners, who carried it to Mr. Wall, and received prizes according to its amount. If it was a 2s. 6d. or 3s. ticket, there would be a silk handkerchief, and a knife perhaps, or a hat, or a waistcoat. For the children there were swings and roundabouts; and ropes with seats on them were suspended between the venerable trees, that young people who wished to swing might swing there.

The vegetable and fruit show was exceedingly good, and would have done credit to many professional gardeners. It certainly did credit to Mr. Wall's cottagers, of whom about 100 were competitors. The judges were Mr. White, the gardener, at Norman Court, and two other gentlemen, whose names I now forget. The beautiful fuchsias, and other flowering plants from the cottage-windows, showed favourably for the domestic neatness and taste. So did the garden products tell for cottier industry. But, if all dwellers in humble houses had as good dwellings and gardens, with as good a squire, and as good a steward between them and the squire, as they have, there would be more comfort and more industry exercised to obtain it throughout England than there now is.

As visitors arrived, some in carriages, some in vans, and some in holiday waggons, others in gigs and trap-carts, from distances varying from one to ten miles, those who were known had tickets given them by Mr. Sergeant, the land-steward, to the dinner. A yeoman cavalry band, in their uniform, mounted about and played music, which the woods re-echoed, or would have re-echoed, had there been less din of human voices, and a lower breeze of wind. There were several policemen of the county constabulary on the ground, but as it was observed at the time, every man was his own constable; no mischief was done.

The chief dinner was spread in the court-yard of the mansion twice, from 250 to 300 dining each time. The great body of the people, however, dined in the tents on the green, having tickets which paid for their admission and their fare. Each party dining in the court passed into the mansion, and went through the splendid suite of rooms on the ground-floor by way of exit. On a former occasion, the house was left open to every person indiscriminately. They did no wilful damage, but there being many thousands of them going in and out for a whole day, they did damage to elegant furniture, whether intending it or not. On that occasion, a gentleman staying on a visit with Mr. Wall, had left his bedroom-door open, not expecting that any of the strangers would penetrate there; also, he left his money in sovereigns, and his jewellery lying open on his table. The staring wonderers, who had never before been in such a house, went, hundred after hundred, into that room, as well as into others; but there was not there, nor in the house, a single act of theft committed. Yet these people had the full compliment of poachers, petty thieves, and loose reputations among them; persons who were honest against their inclination, because they saw and felt they were trusted.

On the present occasion, Mr. Wall sat down at one of the tables, but did not preside; the presidency and several other offices of honour devolved on some of the principal tenants and the farm steward. The domestic servants, from the house-steward downward, waited on and served the visitors with alacrity and kindness; as much so, indeed, as if the kind spirit of their master was thoroughly infused into them.

On Mr. Wall's health being given, he delivered a short address, thanking the people for coming to see him and dine with him, and hoping to see them again and again, and to see a closer bond of friendship established between persons of all ranks than there ever yet had been.

The sports upon the green went on. Every minute some prize was won at one or other of the games. The floor of the tent in which the vegetable show had been was boarded for dancing, with a platform for the band. Accordingly there was dancing. And, when night closed in, there were fireworks; and these were on a scale of grandeur rarely excelled, if ever excelled at all. Artists of first-rate ability were brought from London to conduct their exhibition. Fire balloons went off and away; and rockets went up and shot off, and showered down brilliancies that illumined the wondering country. While the multitudes gazed and admired, devices in fire of all shapes and colours, and of many meanings, succeeded each other, rockets firing all the time, with a magnificence that would have made Vauxhall clap hands and shout. But there was little shouting here, and not a hand was clapped. The excessive wonder at such prodigies done in fire constrained to silence. And the silence of the human tongues was all the deeper, and the grandeur of the fire-works all the greater, that the black shadows of the trees started back, and struggled to be out of sight, each behind his own tree, as if affrighted; while the lofty branches showed themselves in the red glare and in the blue, as if the giants of the forest stood with heads erect and hair on end.

The fireworks at Norman Court were sublime; and the people who looked upon them, upwards of 2000 in number, seemed at a loss whether to have most gratitude to Mr. Wall for his kindness, or most admiration for his unrivalled liberality. They gave him the best return they could give; they went all to their homes, without mishap or disturbance, all pleased with the day's entertainment, and pleased with one another. The only exception, if so it may be called, was that some of the labourers from the railway, farming through West and East Dean, from Salisbury to Bishopstoke, came up at night, after leaving off work, and seemed as if "they would not go home till morning." But even they, considering they were "navvies," were not so far amiss.

ONE WHO HAS WHISTLED AT THE PLOUGH.

THE REGISTRATION.

WESTMINSTER.—It appears the Westminster constituency has greatly improved since the last election; the number of voters on the householders' list at the last election was 9614, the number on the same list of the forthcoming register is 11,440, being an increase of 1826. This increase has been affected by continuous attention to the register every year since the last election. Some of the overseers have been compelled to insert the names of the occupiers of small houses in the rate-book, and on the list of voters; others, however, still persevere in setting the law at defiance, by keeping the occupiers of compounded houses off the rate-book. The result of the revision, which is no test of the state of the new register, is as follows:—Free Trade claims allowed, 38; Monopolists claims allowed, 14; Free Trade objections sustained, 151; Monopolists objections sustained, 209. A great number of those who had claimed to be rated were put on the list of voters, and were not objected to, and do not therefore appear in the account.

HERTFORD.—Free Traders struck off, 16; Monopolists ditto, 28. Monopolists added, 9; Free Traders, ditto, 25. Free-trade gain, 10.

DEATH OF J. R. GIBBS, Esq.—The Liberal and Free-trade party have sustained a loss by the death of John Rolls Gibbs, Esq., the able editor of the Aylesbury News and Bedford News, which papers have obtained popularity by their zealous and untiring advocacy of Liberal and Free-trade principles, and their unflinching exposures of the evil workings of the game laws. The deceased (who was but 31 years of age) had been long known as a political writer of sound and correct views, and the articles emanating from his pen have ever been forcible and convincing. It is, indeed, lamentable that so promising an advocate should have been thus cut off in his youth and in the zenith of his usefulness and activity. He has left a widow and young family to mourn their irreparable loss, afflicted parents to grieve; and by a large circle of relatives and friends will his decease be long felt. He died at his residence at Aylesbury on Friday afternoon last.—From a Correspondent.

WINDSOR ELECTION.—The nomination is fixed to take place on Saturday, and the polling on Monday next.

REPRESENTATION OF WORCESTER.—The rumour of the probable elevation of Sir Thomas Wilde (the Liberal representative of the city of Worcester) to the House of Lords is again in circulation, and a succession of similar principles is talked of in the person of Mr. Edw. Holland, of Dumbleton, Gloucestershire (a large landowner in the southern and eastern part of Worcestershire). Mr. Holland was formerly one of the members for the county of Worcester, and is well known as an advocate for extending the leasing-system in farming. He is also favourable to the abolition of the Corn Laws, and is a subscriber to the League fund. It is thought he would have a better chance for the county than the city representation. He is a great favourite with the farmers in the eastern part of the county.—Globe.

BREAD STUFFS.—We regret to see that this odious American term is finding its way into our agricultural reports, and instead of speaking of grain, of which so much of the public food is derived, we are told continually in the English, as well as the Irish and Scotch papers, of "the material rise which has already taken place in the value of bread stuffs," instead of in the value of bread, or in the value of grain.—Leeds Mercury.

AGRICULTURE.

HONESTY THE BEST POLICY.

The Corn Law has begun to act. For the first time since its enactment, in 1842, the protective law has fulfilled the object of its framers. Providence has visited this country with a deficient harvest, and the Corn Law is about to convert deficiency into famine. It has already caused a scarcity. It has operated to prevent the accumulation in this country of a store of grain, the produce of foreign land. Already is the agricultural labourer, with a numerous family, complaining that all his wages go to purchase BREAD. The comforts of the artisan and the skilled labourer are abridged, and there is every prospect of a further abridgment. The prosperity of trade and manufactures, which was recently hailed as the source of so many benefits to agriculture, is in hazard, and may vanish altogether under the effects of such another season as that just past. And how stands the farmer? An intelligent and experienced farmer in the west of England said a few days since to a friend of ours, "You may think we (the farmers) are making great profits now, but I assure you that is not the case; though the price is high to the consumer, the quantity of wheat is so deficient, and its quality so inferior, that we shall not do so well as we did last year with a good crop and lower prices."

And this we believe to be true; for if the farmer were to balance the account of all he pays for protection and all he receives from protection, he would in most cases, find himself a positive loser by the system.

Let us call the attention of the farming community to the actual state of the corn trade, and the permanent influence it is likely to have upon the business of husbandry. And in entering upon this review, let us remember that if the agriculturists could be permanently benefited by a law which produces artificial scarcity of food, they would profit by an injustice. Their gain would be derived from a direct robbery of the rest of the community. Their wealth would be derived from the poverty, not the prosperity, of their customers. Like usurers, they would be devouring those they profess to feed. We know enough of British yeomen to say, that where they understand "protection," they spurn gains thus obtained. And farmers do now in a great measure understand the questions involved in the protective system. Were it necessary we should confidently appeal to the farmers' sense of justice from their desire of gain; but there is no necessity for making any such appeal; for in this instance, as in all others, honesty is the best policy. The high prices the farmers are now receiving—where in fact they are receiving them—only enable them to meet their "protection" rents, tithes, &c., out of the comparatively low produce which, under their present insecure tenures, they are able to raise. They are working—aye, and in chains of the most galling kind—for their landlords, not for themselves. The present is a crisis in the condition of husbandry on which much of the future prosperity of the farmers depends. That the Corn Laws, whatever may be their other merits or demerits, are the main source of the hazard and uncertainty which attend the naturally steady business of a farmer, is now generally admitted. "Let the question be settled, let us know what we are about," are now the universal demands of all intelligent farmers. And that the question can be settled otherwise than by Free Trade, the wildest monopolist will scarcely assert. And the question is likely to be settled. Yet there is still a strong and numerous section of the landholders, represented in the Cabinet, it is said, by the Duke of Wellington, who have determined to resist this settlement to the uttermost. They care not for the welfare of the community; they disregard the earnest desire of the agriculturists for a firm basis for their business calculations; they think only of maintaining the semi-feudal system under which the farmers of England have been ground down to the dust. Now then it is the interest no less than the duty of farmers to lend their aid to put down this faction; a faction which, after all, only uses its political influence for aristocratic and selfish ends. Few farmers will forget how the "protection" agitation of 1844 ended in places for the Duke of Richmond's poor relations, and a silver salver for Mr. Baker, his grace's instrument. The political landlords then used the farmers; and there are some signs that the same faction intend, if they can, to use the farmers again. Not ten days ago, a gentleman expressed his intention of making a visit of discovery to No. 17, Bond-street, to ascertain whether the "Central Protection Society" had even a nominal existence. Nothing less than ocular proof could satisfy him that even a door-plate and a live secretary told that the society was in being. On Wednesday last, however, an advertisement appeared, dated from the "room in Bond-street," and signed by the secretary, from which it would seem that another attempt is about to be made upon the farmers' gullibility. So the Morning Post, whose leading articles have lately been of the doleful cast, has returned again to a style of vigorous assertion and its former contempt of vulgar facts, which bespeak an intention of once more doing battle for monopoly. Farmers, however, have had enough of their "friends," and will not be easily moved again to shout for high rents and yearly tenures.

We have expressed a doubt whether the farmers generally are really getting any vastly high prices, although the consumers are paying at a dear rate for their bread; and the two are quite consistent, without imputing, as the Post does, all sorts of rogueries to the millers and bakers. Competition will effectually prevent those tradesmen from getting any extraordinary profits; and it is well known that they never get such good profits when prices are high as when they are moderate. The Mark Lane Express says, "There is a difference of at least 20s. per quarter between the best and worst samples of this year's produce, which plainly proves how wretched must be the quality of the latter." And from the same authority we learn:

"The very inferior quality of a large proportion of the wheat of this year's growth has hitherto prevented the duty receding more than a step or two, and from present appearances it is questionable whether the article will for some time be admissible below 12s. per quarter."

And again:

"Had the quality of the new produce been only tolerably good, the duty would undoubtedly ere now have fallen to 10s. per quarter, or perhaps lower, in the regular course of things, the finer sorts of red having for some weeks past been selling at 70s. and upwards, whilst choice samples of white have realised as much as 80s. per quarter at several of the principal consuming markets. It may readily be conceived therefore how bad must be the quality of the common runs, to have kept the general average below 60s. per quarter; such has, however, been the case, the last weekly return for the kingdom being only 58s. 2d. per quarter."

Now, good first rate flour cannot be made from the wheat of this year's growth without a considerable mixture of old wheat, or of wheat grown in a drier climate; and as the Corn Laws exclude foreign wheat, millers are compelled to give exorbitant prices for the comparatively small quantity of old and dry wheat which is to be obtained. Dry wheat they must have; and therefore, though the few who happen to hold it may make great profits, the great mass of farmers, who have only this year's crop to sell, get less than they would obtain if millers could buy dry wheat at a cheaper rate. The consumer can only give a certain price for flour; and the miller, in order to manufacture it at that price, must give so much less for the damp wheat, in consequence of the exorbitant sums he is compelled to pay for dry samples. We happen to have before us bread made from wheat of this year's growth—good heavy wheat, selling for 64s. a quarter, which was well got in after remaining a considerable time in the field. This was ground for the grower without any mixture of dry wheat; and the bread, though sweet and wholesome, is close and dark. No miller could venture to make such flour for sale; his article must contain at least one third of flour made from dry wheat, bought perhaps at 75s. or 80s. a quarter.

Now, had there been a good supply of dry wheat in the market, as would have happened had the trade in corn been free, the miller could have given the farmer a better price for his damp wheat of this year's growth. Much of the wheat of the present year sells for less than its intrinsic value, estimated by its weight of flour, because its condition is so bad, that the miller must use a very large proportion of high "protection" priced dry wheat to produce marketable flour. At this moment a large importation of dry foreign wheat would tend to raise the prices of inferior conditioned wheat in the hands of the farmer, while the consumer would get his flour and bread at lower rates. Such considerations, and similar practical examinations of the real circumstances of the corn and provision trades, will satisfy farmers that, to use the words of Mr. Huskisson, "Monopoly is not always profit."

A STALE TRICK.

It is an old and not very ingenious device amongst those who are detected in attempts to appropriate to themselves the goods of other people, to try to divert attention by raising an outcry against a third party. Yet to this seedy shift it appears the monopolists are now driven; for we see that the Morning Post, after stating that "no one pretends that we have not enough of corn," and that there is "nothing urgent" in the present state of affairs, goes on to say, "people get alarmed at the London price of the loaf of bread, but that is really a bad criterion of the pressure of the price of wheat upon the people throughout the country." And why, think ye, readers? Because the fault all lies with the bakers!!!!

The time was when under the paternal despotism of the Turks, some of the finest regions of the world became so ruined and depopulated that the fertile lands failed to produce food for the people; and when the people murmured, the eastern despot, with an anxiety to shift the blame similar to that which actuates the Post, told the people to hang the bakers. Accordingly the bakers were hanged, yet the price of bread did not fall in consequence. Then the people, with a discriminating intelligence which we commend to the consideration of the Post, hanged the sultan.

See the Post's incitement to hang the bakers:

"Instead of setting up a clamour for the overthrow of British agricultural protection because the four-pound loaf costs 10d., it would be much more just to inquire how much of that 10d. is received by the producer of the wheat, and how much may possibly be the undue profits of those who come between the wheat producer and the bread-eater. These charges would weigh with equal pressure upon the bread-consumer whether wheat was bought from the importing merchant or from the cultivator of our own soil."

We have elsewhere referred to some of the circumstances which compel the makers of flour and bread to charge a much higher proportionate price for the manufactured article than the farmer gets for his raw grain; as, for instance, the high price caused by a very limited supply of dry foreign wheat. This is directly and solely attributable to the Corn Laws, and the millers and bakers have just as much to do with it as they have with causing Turkish misrule. But it is essential to the protectionists that the blame should be cast anywhere except in the right quarter. They are in a state of alarm because the public is disposed to put the saddle upon the right horse, and the prime minister is not disinclined to draw the girths.

This is the array of figures by which the Post hopes to stir up the public mind to the point of hanging the bakers:

"A quarter of wheat of average quality produces 313 lbs. of fine flour, 10lbs. of seconds, 31lbs. of thirds, 77lbs. of bran, and in the dust and dirt brushed away from the wheat about 14lbs. weight of each quarter is lost. We have, however, 313lbs. of fine flour. The sack of fine flour, which weighs 280lbs., produces 86 loaves of bread of 4lbs. each. The produce of a quarter of wheat, therefore, gives about 96 4lb. loaves of the finest quality. These, if sold at 10d. each, would produce 80s., leaving still 151lbs. of the quarter of wheat to be sold for inferior purposes. Now, by the returns for the week ending 25th October, the price of wheat was 59s. 5d. the quarter, and the average of the six preceding weeks upon which the duty was struck, was 56s. 2d. per quarter. It will be seen, then, that the London public pay 80s. for the fine flour produce of 60s. worth of wheat, leaving 151lbs. of the coarser parts to be sold, and added to the 80s."

This looks imposing; but is it true? Let any one invest 60s. in the purchase of wheat—he can't get dry wheat for less than 70s. or 80s. a quarter—get it ground into flour without admixture, and then make it into bread, and let him see whether he will put in his pocket the tempting profit promised by the Post.

Now we don't speak without warrant, for we have tried it. And it is obvious that the array of figures posted by the "Central Society" proves too much, for the profit there said to be derived from a quarter of 60s. wheat, would show a royal road to fortune for not a few enterprising bakers who would sell at lower prices. Why don't Bicknord and Company open a baker's shop at 17, Bond-street, and recruit the funds of the "Central Society," by proving practically the "undue profits" of the bakers? We cannot help commending this scheme to his grace, and suggesting that perhaps one side of the shop might be profitably devoted to the sale of Scotch salmon!

Now let us suggest to our readers, agricultural and others, producers as well as consumers of wheat, that we may learn something from the practice of the Turkish populace; and, without first perpetrating the wrong of hanging the bakers, the unwilling agents of scarcity, let us repeal at once and for ever the cause, and the only cause, of scarcity or apprehended scarcity in this country, every law which restricts or "regulates" the importation of foreign corn.

LECTURES FOR LANDLORDS.

There may be a vast body of "useful knowledge" adapted for the consideration of the landed gentry drawn from the speeches of the agricultural associations of this season. For instance, at the Chertsey Meeting, in Surrey, Mr. Trotter, M.P., said:

"He must congratulate them that the country had last year produced quite sufficient food for the population without foreign assistance; and, when he took into consideration the great increase in that population, he thought it was a very cheering fact, and he had no doubt that if they continued the same course of skill and exertion which they had hitherto pursued, they should always be able to achieve the same result."

True, Mr. Trotter; but how is it when the year does not produce food enough for the population, as happens, perhaps, two or three years out of five? However, when legislators talk in this fashion, it is plain they see the way in which the wind blows. Col. Challoner on the same occasion afterwards went more closely to the real question:

"He agreed with the Hon. Member in his opinion, that the land was able to produce sufficient food for the population, but it could not be done without great labour, great exertions, and in some counties entirely turning over a new leaf. They should recollect, that although their population was increasing enormously, their quantity of land was still the same, and it was only by increasing its fruitfulness that they could hope to supply food for their population. Some gentlemen talked of bringing poor land into cultivation, but he was of opinion this would never answer, because he knew the expense of doing so, and that it would never pay unless corn was at high prices; which he thought they could not see again in this country, unless it were the result of scarcity, which God forbid should ever be the case. He had told them on a former occasion, that they must not rely upon what they termed protection; they must rely upon themselves, and they might rely upon it that the time would come when they would have none, and would be compelled to depend upon their own exertions. It might be next year, it might be 10 years, but they might depend on it the time would come; and he called upon them, therefore, to be upon their guard, and not be taken by surprise, if they were told some morning that next year there would be no Corn Laws. He had no fear, but even then they would be able to cultivate their land profitably if they exerted themselves. He had been recently in Scotland, and he saw land which formerly only produced five sacks of corn an acre, from which five quarters were now thrashed. Supposing, therefore, that the former quantity fetched 60s., the farmer would be better off with the increased quantity if it only fetched 40s. He, therefore, repeated that he had no fear that if they were deprived of the benefit of those enactments which they considered a protection, that they should still be able to cultivate the land with sufficient profit to themselves, give good wages to their labourers, and a remunerating rent to their landlord."

Then spoke Mr. Wells, a large farmer; and, as usual, gave a sufficient reason for the actual state of inferior husbandry. He said:

"That a great many observations had been made about improving the condition of the labourer, but he thought the position of the tenant ought also to be taken into consideration. ('Hear, hear,' and cheers.) If the tenant had assistance from the owners of the soil he could do much to improve the condition of his labourers, but the bad covenants under which they now held land prevented them from doing so. They had no inducement to improve; they were bound down to a certain course of cropping under all circumstances, and which he must call a most stupid system; and he hoped their landlords would take these matters into their consideration, and render their tenants assistance. They had many grievances to complain of, which acted as a bar to improvement. There was the useless timber, the game—('Hear, hear')—although, happily, they were not much troubled with that in this neighbourhood; and many other things in which the landlords might render their tenants essential assistance; and until this was done, they could not expect that tenant farmers would exert themselves. ('Hear, hear,' and cheers.)"

Mr. Briscoe, a landowner, also gave an excellent comment on the same text. He said:

"As some observations had been made with regard to the protection afforded to British agriculture, he might be excused for saying that he rejoiced to hear landlords give their opinions respecting it, for it had always been his opinion that it was more a landlord's than a tenant's question. (Cheers.) He held it to be the duty of a landlord to give assistance and support—and that not scantily, either—to his tenant. (Cheers.) He also thought that all those unwelcome restrictions in leases that had been alluded to by Mr. Wells, and which prevented the tenant-farmer from exercising his skill and ability, and from making use of those scientific experiments which were so advisable, ought to be done away with. ('Hear, hear.') So far as regarded himself, he would inform them that a short time back he had the pleasure of signing a lease for one of his tenants, in which there was not a single condition or restriction, except that the premises should be kept in repair. (Cheers.) An old tenant of his had some time ago made him a similar observation to that of the gallant Colonel, namely, that he expected shortly there would be no protection; and he told him in reply that should such an event occur, he would be happy to give him a lease by which the rent should depend on the prices. (Great cheering.) He should be ready to do so, and he thought no landlord ought to object; it was perfectly fair to both parties. If corn fell, the rent would fall with it; and if it rose, the rent would rise also. (Cheers.)"

Mr. Newman, a farmer, and one of the judges of ploughing, also said:

"He concurred with Mr. Wells in the opinion, that there could never be any permanent improvement unless the landlords came forward and assisted their tenants, and gave them a better tenure of their land. ('Hear, hear.') Under the present system, a tenant was induced to get all that he could out of his land, during the latter period of his holding it; and it took the new comers-in five years to bring it round again, so that eight years were lost. Under the six months' tenure it was impossible to think that a farmer would make improvement. He might have a good landlord upon whom he could depend; but landlords, like tenants, would die, and fresh ones come in their place; and worse than all, fresh agents, who would look over the land, and if they found it in a good state would turn out the tenant at six months' notice, perhaps to his utter ruin, and put a friend of their own in his place. ('Hear, hear,' and cheers.) If the farmer had a security for his holding, he would always farm up to the mark, and thus render it better for the landlord, the tenant, and the labourer. (Cheers.)"

That the public and general expression of such sentiments are due to the exertions of the League is to us a source of pride and gratification; for of all things we desire to see the farmers emancipated from that deplorable thralldom they now endure.

The following practical testimony in favour of leases, or rather of the necessity of leases to improvement, was given at Preston by Mr. Scott, a Scotch farmer, brought into Lancashire by Mr. Clifton:

"If any marked improvement in the agriculture of the district had taken place since their last meeting in consequence of their different system of management, they must attribute it entirely to Mr. Clifton, who was the means of bringing them to Lancashire, as, had he not granted them leases on fair and liberal terms, none of them would have been here. At their last meeting, he took the liberty of stating, in opposition to what fell from Colonel Rawstorne, his opinion of the beneficial effects of leases; and he took this opportunity of again stating that he did not think any substantial improvements need be expected in the general agriculture of this or any other district before the landowners were prepared to follow Mr. Clifton's example, and grant leases on the same liberal terms; as no tenant-at-will is warranted in laying out his capital on the improvement of another man's lands, unless he has security for reaping some advantage from it. In short, no sensible, calculating tenant will do it, and no right-thinking, well-informed landlord will expect it, as the necessary outlay to put land in a fit state of profitable cultivation is far beyond what most people are aware of, and certainly much too great a risk without having at least a chance of getting it back. (Applause.)"

He pointed out some of the defects in the farming of the neighbourhood, and said no improvement could be made till the land had been drained and much stock kept, and added:

"But this system of farming was attended with a very serious outlay of capital, and the question seemed to be who was the proper party to bear the necessary expense of putting the land into a fit state for profitable tillage. His opinion was, that if landowners were prepared to grant leases on fair and liberal terms, they would not find much difficulty in letting their lands to tenants of capital and enterprise, who would manage matters as they ought to be; but, if landowners were not prepared to do this, they must continue to submit to their estates being very imperfectly cultivated, or adopt the only alternative of improving their lands themselves. (Applause.)"

At the same meeting Mr. Garnett, jun., said:

"He hoped, however, he should yet see the land covered with corn instead of rushes. In Scotland he had seen on one side of the road a beautiful crop of corn, and on the other nothing but heath. This was entirely the effect of industry and skill; and to such an extent had the improvement of land been carried in that country, that the Duke of Roxburgh, when the leases upon a part of his estates recently expired, was able to re-let his farms at an advance of 30 per cent. on the old rent."

It appears, also, from the report of the inspectors of farms made to the Ashton (Lancashire) Society, that the farmers are beginning to find they can do without "protection"—that they can best protect themselves by exertion and industry.

"At the conclusion of their general report of last year, the inspectors remarked upon a feeling of depression which was observable among some of the farmers of this country. It seemed in many instances to have checked enterprise, and thrown a chilly damp upon all improvement. They are happy, however, to observe, that it has now mainly passed away. The farmer begins to perceive more and more, that by management, industry, and outlay, all difficulties may be overcome; but that, without these, neither difficulty can be mastered, nor good effected. While, then, the inspectors admit that much has been done, and is now in progress, they would remind the tenantry that much yet remains undone. They would urge them to go on with spirit and enterprise, and assure the farmer, that if he so acts, he cannot fail of prosperity and success. If, on the other hand, he stands still, or falls back, in the general competition which is now so greatly increasing, he may rely upon it, he will not be able to maintain even his present position. While the manufacturer is improving his machinery, the farmer must not neglect improvement in his sphere of action; and while one farmer, from spirit and management, gives increased productiveness to his land, his neighbours must follow in his steps, and keep pace with him, or it is evident, to the plainest reason, they cannot hope to succeed in the race of competition."

RISE IN THE PRICE OF BREAD.—In consequence of the recent advance in flour, the incorporation of bakers in this town have, this week, raised the price of bread to—fine 1lb. loaf 10d.; coarse, do. 9d.—Kilmarnock Herald.

THE CORN TRADE AND THE CROPS.

(From the Mark Lane Express.)

Three weeks of unusually fine weather has enabled farmers in the north to save a large quantity of grain, which at the close of last month was almost given over as totally lost. That the quality of much of the corn lately carried must be indifferent cannot, when the repeated drenchings it has undergone be called to mind, be for a moment questioned; still it has been got in, and will therefore, in some way or other, help to furnish food for man or beast, which, considering the deficiency of the crop of wheat as a whole, and the extensive failure of potatoes, is something gained. This slight improvement in our prospects has not been without its influence on the trade, and farmers having (as is usual at this period of the year) thrashed out pretty freely, a check has been given to the upward movement in prices.

So far from it having been discovered that the yield of wheat is better than expected, complaints of the number of quarters procured from a given quantity of straw are becoming more general in proportion as thrashing is proceeded with; and the fact that there is a difference of at least 20s. per quarter between the best and the worse samples of this year's produce proves plainly how wretched must be the quality of the latter. Meanwhile the investigations which are being proceeded with, to discover the extent of the potato disease, have brought nothing to light which warrants us in stating that the alarm on that subject is ill-founded; indeed the reports from all quarters are of a nature to confirm our worst fears; and however quiet the trade may at present be, we cannot divest ourselves of the apprehension that prices of bread stuffs will ultimately rise to a point threatening serious inconvenience to the poorer classes of the community.

The very inferior quality of a large proportion of the wheat of this year's growth has hitherto prevented the duty receding more than a step or two, and from present appearances it is questionable whether the article will be for some time admissible below 12s. per quarter; this is under existing circumstances, unfortunate, inasmuch as the tardy manner in which the duty diminishes will give the opponents of the law grounds for raising an outcry which may have some effect on our expediency minister. There has lately been a great deal of talk about an Order in Council to admit corn free; and though we do not believe that any such project is contemplated, still it indicates the course of public feeling. Had the quality of the new produce been only tolerably good, the duty would undoubtedly ere now have fallen to 10s. per quarter, or perhaps lower, in the regular course of things, the finer sorts of red having for some weeks past been selling at 70s. and upwards, whilst choice samples of white have realised as much as 80s. per qr. at several of the principal consuming markets. It may readily be conceived, therefore, how bad must be the quality of the common runs, to have kept the general average below 60s. per qr. Such has, however, been the case, the last weekly return for the kingdom being only 59s. 2d. per qr. All the wheat lately received from abroad has therefore been landed under lock, and that which may still come to hand is likely also to be stored in bond, importers feeling perfectly satisfied that sooner or later a foreign supply will be needed, and that ultimately they will be enabled to enter their property at a very low duty, notwithstanding the opposing influence of the bad qualities of the new wheat. In one respect at least the law of 1828 was more favourable for the consumer than the present enactment, for after prices had risen to a certain point the duty came off rapidly; and though this was, we must confess, a strong temptation to tamper with the averages, yet it had this benefit, that when there was real necessity—such as we believe there to be at present—the impost was speedily reduced sufficiently to induce importers to enter for consumption.

At Mark Lane the trade in wheat has been extremely dull this week, which must be partly attributed to the effect produced by the rumour to which we have already alluded, viz., the ministerial intention of opening the ports. Foreign free wheat has moved off very tardily throughout the week; holders have, however, refrained from pressing sales, and quotations have remained nominally unaltered. By the official account just published, it appears that the total stock of wheat in bond in the kingdom consisted on the 10th Oct. of 513,666 quarters, whereof 207,574 quarters were in the port of London.

With oats the market has been sparingly supplied, the total quantity which has come to hand up to this (Saturday) evening, including 5181 qrs. from abroad, amounting to only 14,612 qrs.

STOCKHOLM, OCT. 21.—Although the harvest on the whole has been an average one, it has nevertheless entirely failed in some parts, particularly in Uppland.

FOREIGN CORN.—The following is extracted from a letter dated Mayence, October 27:—"Our corn market is rising daily, and prices are now at a height so as to create alarm. Wheat has been paid to-day at 15s. per matter; rye, 11½s.; barley, 8s.; oats, 5s. per matter, cash; and even at those prices holders are unwilling to sell. At Strasbourg 34s. to 37s. per 100ks. has been paid for wheat. There have been shipped to the Upper Rhine since this year's crop 20,000 quarters of wheat, and prices would rule much higher had not the countries on the Rhine produced an unusually large quantity. To follow the measure of the other German states, our government (Hesse) has prohibited the exportation of potatoes. Since eight days the potatoes in our vicinity have begun to rot on the ground as well as in the pits, and even in the granaries. This refers only to the white sorts; the red ones are sound as yet, but I am afraid they will equally be attacked."

CROP EXTRAORDINARY.—Mr. H. Rawcliffe, Longton, shopkeeper, has had this year, on a small extent of ground, lying to the south side of his house, about 32 perches, or thereabouts, of oats, which have been so productive as to yield the extraordinary quantity of three loads and five score (240lb. to the load) of meal, being after the rate of rather better than 17 loads to the acre.—Preston Guardian.

RECRUITING IN SCOTLAND.—It appears that in the midst of our present prosperity our countrymen are not at all actuated by the pugnacious spirit which has been characteristic of ourselves and ancestors for the last 1000 years. An officer and whole recruiting staff had been despatched from Woolwich to Scotland early in the summer, to recruit for the Royal Artillery, and, wonderful to say, they have not yet succeeded in procuring a single individual to join this distinguished corps. Some attribute this strange fact to the reduction of the retiring pension from a shilling to sixpence a-day. We have some hope that it is proof in some sort that our countrymen, even those who enlist for soldiers, prefer prosperous peace to war in any shape.—Stirling Observer.

THE POTATO PLAGUE.—REPEAL OF THE CORN LAWS.

(From the Morning Chronicle.)

Those peculiarities in the case of Ireland which especially call for prompt action, we have noticed on a former occasion. At this season of the year, before the frost blockades those northern ports which, so far as Europe is concerned, we must look for our chief supplies of the coarser species of grain, every week is precious. We must also entreat attention to the singularly insidious character of that mysterious calamity which now threatens that wretched country with the worst horrors of famine. We already know enough to justify the most distressing apprehensions; but we likewise know that we do not, and at present cannot, know all. The potato plague, or murrain, or whatever else it may be called, which is now devastating Ireland, is described by the Government commissioners as "an enemy whose history and habits are but yet imperfectly known." Nothing is perfectly known of this enemy, but that its ravages are of immense and unascertainable extent—that it attacks, on the shortest notice, both growing and housed crops which were previously considered safe—that the most promising signs of vegetable health may turn out to be utterly deceptive—and that the enemy is beyond measure difficult to dislodge from a soil of which it has once taken possession. Is this an enemy to trifle and temporise with? Is it to be believed that the Minister to whose anxious inquiries his own agents return such an answer as this—so full of dismal certainties, and suggestive of dire possibilities should have nothing to say to the prayer of wretched and affrighted millions, but—

"Let the law take its course."

We are almost ashamed to allude to considerations which, in the view both of statesmanship and of humanity, should now be held undeserving even of a passing thought. Yet we cannot forbear adding, that the class interests to which protection professedly ministers can, at all events, have nothing to apprehend now from the boldest and most sweeping of measures. All objections, or pretences of objection, to "sudden" change, are nullified by the circumstances of the present season. The change now would not be sudden. The utmost that any change could effect would be to maintain something like the status quo. Though an Order in Council slid down the scale to zero to-day, and an Act of Parliament fixed it there to-morrow, farmers are secure of their "remunerating prices." The landlords may make themselves quite easy on the score of a possible superabundance. Tamboff itself is effectually put hors de combat. The men who dread a corn invasion now are of that genus of alarmists who would have cried "fire" at the general deluge. Even the poor agricultural labourer, whom they dread "throwing out of employment," is provided for too. The railways will take care of him, if only Government will take care of the railways, and of that which keeps railways going.

We have only further to add, that, as the exigencies of the moment loudly call for prompt measures to meet a pressing need, the state of the public mind requires that such measures should be sweeping and final. Something must be done, and if less than everything be done, it will be but a new incentive to agitation. If compromise were desirable, it has long since ceased to be possible. Sir Robert Peel is too shrewd an observer, and too sagacious an interpreter of the signs of public opinion, to imagine that the spirit which spoke last week at Manchester, by the lips of Mr. Cobden, and still more in the enthusiastic cheers that welcomed the speech of the League leader, and most of all, in certain of the facts which that speech detailed, can be laid to rest by any half or three-quarter measure.

POTATO DISEASE.—From a Stockholm letter of the 14th ult., we learn that the prevalent disease in the potatoes has made its appearance in only a very few parts of Sweden; but, as the crop in general was scanty, the government had issued an interdiction against the exportation of potatoes from November 1st till the end of September in the next year.

POTATOES.—EAST LOTHIAN.—Our correspondent says—"I am sorry at not having anything more favourable to report respecting the potatoes, as those that were taken up about a fortnight ago, and closely covered up, are in many instances away to a pulpy mass. To preserve the bulk of the crop, therefore, for any length of time can never be thought of. The only thing that can be done is, to retard decomposition as long as possible, until they are used up by cattle, &c., and to secure that, let them be put in long narrow pits, in an airy but cool situation, and covered with straw alone; turn frequently over, picking out those that are damaged. A little quick-lime would be an advantage. Those that have escaped with least injury are the Irish cups. In a general way, the finer the variety, the more damage has been sustained."—Witness.

EXPORT OF POTATOES.—Considerable bustle prevailed at Dundee harbour last week in shipping potatoes for the Continent. Various vessels were loading with this staple produce, and it is probable that several more will be put in requisition for the same traffic.—Caledonian Mercury.

POTATO CROP IN FRANCE.—Notwithstanding the alarm for the consequences of the failure of the potato crop created in France, the price of bread for the next fortnight is to remain unchanged in Paris, that of the first quality being 38 centimes the kilogramme (7½d. for the 4lb. loaf), and that of the second quality 30 centimes.

THE LEIPSIK FAIR.—The fair just over has been an excellent one, except for woollens and hogs' bristles. Very extensive business has been done in cloths of all descriptions, at higher prices than those which ruled last year. The produce of the Zollverein manufactures, as well as articles of luxury and fashion, were in great demand. Leather sold freely and at advanced prices.—Frankfort Postamt's Zeitung.

NEW DUTIES IN THE ZOLLVEREIN.—The best-informed parties in this country feel no doubt that the new duty of 50 dollars per cwt. on figured worsted goods, has been decided upon by the Diet of the Zollverein. The Allgemeine Zeitung tacitly admits that an article in the Leeds Mercury of the 11th ult. is true in its facts, but it represents that the increased duty on worsted goods "had in fact already been fixed upon in the session of 1842, but that by a false interpretation of the word broché it had not then been put in force." This is true. The augmented duty was then only avoided by the interpretation put upon the word "broché." The German press seem to be very sure that the first news concerning the resolutions of their Diet should have reached them this year, as it did in 1842, through the Leeds Mercury. The great yarn-consuming and dealing towns of Elberfeld, Berlin, and Leipzig first learnt from our columns that there were not to be augmented duties on cotton, worsted, and linen yarns; and the protectionist Allgemeine Zeitung calls this decision a triumph of the English party.—Leeds Mercury.

REVIEW.

British Manufactures. By G. Dodd, Esq. Knight's Weekly Volume, No. 70.

At the present moment, the question of food is one of such absorbing interest, that our readers will be glad to obtain some information respecting the manufacture of bread, and the means that are sometimes used to eke out the supply of wheaten flour. Even in the best of times, fraudulent bakers are guilty of adulteration:

"In making loaves of an inferior quality, potatoes are frequently used; and if the quantity be small, the bread is said to be improved thereby; but when added in large quantity for fraudulent purposes, which is sometimes the case, the bread is deteriorated. The existence of too large a quantity of potatoes in bread may often be indicated by the bread cracking and crumbling, by its soon turning sour, by adhering to the knife when cut, and by leaving a depression when pressed by the finger. The erroneous impression that white bread must necessarily be better than that of a darker tint, and therefore worth a higher price, frequently offers an inducement to the baker to add bleaching ingredients to his bread, in order to produce this effect; for no flour except the very finest will produce white bread. In this instance, the taste of the purchasers is partly to blame for the occasional admixture of bleaching substances in the bread. Alum, ground bones, or whiting, are among the ingredients occasionally employed for this purpose; and the means whereby the employment of them may be detected are soiled by chemists to be these:—If bread contain whiting or chalk, and if diluted sulphuric acid be poured on it, there will be an effervescence; but there will be no deposit when pearlash is added to the filtered solution. If ground bones be contained in the bread, and diluted muriatic acid be poured on it, effervescence will ensue; and if it be then filtered and pearlash added, a white heavy deposit will be precipitated. If an excess of alum be used (a very small quantity improves the bread), pour boiling water on the bread; let it cool, and then press out the moisture; boil it away to one-third; when cold, filter it through blotting paper, and add a little muriate of lime to the filtered liquor. If a muddiness now appear, an excess of alum may be suspected. For a similar end, persons sometimes use an excess of salt in their bread, as, by absorbing a great deal of water, it increases the weight of the loaves; when this is the case, the grain of the bread is very rough; and two loaves, on being parted, generally part uneven, one taking away a portion from the other."

In various parts of Britain, and still more on the Continent, other kinds of grain are used instead of wheat:

"The inquiries of practical chemists into the comparative nutritive qualities of different kinds of grain have shown that wheat possesses the largest proportion of nutritive matter, but that other kinds are also capable of forming very wholesome bread. Household bread and brown bread, though deemed of inferior quality to wheaten, are still made from wheat flour mixed more or less with bran. The Scotch peasantry, until a comparatively recent period, ate very little wheaten bread. They used to mix a peck of oatmeal with an ounce of salt, and make it into a stiff dough with water, then form it into flat cakes, and afterwards bake it. These oat cakes, and a somewhat similar kind made from barley, were the substitutes for leavened or fermented bread."

The Cornish miners eat bread made almost wholly of barley instead of wheat. In some parts of the north, penmeal mixed with oatmeal has occasionally formed the material of bread. Parmentier, the French chemist, proved that potatoes, turnips, horse-chestnuts, briony-root, and other plants were capable of yielding a meal which might be made into bread more or less wholesome. In some cases he cut potatoes or turnips into slices, dried them thoroughly, pounded them, and then mixed them with grain-flour; in other cases, the potatoes or turnips were boiled, mashed, and in that state mixed with the flour. A large portion of the bread used in America is made of one-half maize or Indian corn, and one-half barley, with a leaven of wheat. One measure of rice with two of barley afford a wholesome bread, as do equal weights of barley and potato-pulp, or equal weights of wheat and rye. Grain of rice, the pith of the sago-tree, the root of the mandioc, are all formed in various ways into bread in Eastern countries.

"From these details it appears that many vegetable substances are susceptible of conversion into a material for bread more or less salubrious, and it is an object of prominent importance to increase this list, since it is not in human power to command at all times a plentiful return for the labour which the husbandman bestows on his field of corn."

The Americans assert that the bread made wholly or in part from Indian corn is more strengthening than that in which wheaten flour alone is used; and those engaged in very heavy work prefer the maize-bread. The late William Cobbett was also a great advocate of Indian corn, and he was very anxious to have it substituted for the potato. Recent attempts have been made to render wood alimentary, and the experiments have now become important in consequence of the deficiency of the corn harvest in the timber-growing countries of Northern Europe. The experiments were made by Professor Autenrieth, of Tübingen. The following detail of this novel mode of boarding a family is very curious:

"The wood is first thoroughly stripped of its bark, and then cut transversely into thin slices about an inch in diameter. These slices are beaten to fibres in a pounding-mill, and then mixed with the sawdust which results from the cutting. The woody particles are boiled in a large quantity of water, in order to remove, as far as possible, the harsh and bitter principles it may contain; or else they are subjected for a long time to the action of cold water, by enclosing them in a strong sack, and beating or treading the sack in a rivulet. The wood is next dried by exposure to the sun or to the heat of a fire, and is afterwards ground repeatedly, till it assumes the form of a rough flour."

"The wood flour is then formed into small flat cakes by the addition of water which has been rendered slightly mucilaginous or gummy. Professor Autenrieth employed one ounce of the roots of the common marsh-mallow, which rendered eighteen quarts of water sufficiently mucilaginous to make four pounds and a half of wood-flour into cakes. The cakes are baked until they are quite dry and of a brownish-yellow colour; after which they are broken up and ground repeatedly, till the flour will pass through a fine bolting-cloth. According to the hardness or softness of the wood must the baking and grinding processes be repeated more or less frequently. When birch is employed, the labour is much shorter than with beech or other woods of a more compact kind.

"The flour thus prepared acquires nearly the smell and taste of corn flour, but never presents the same appearance, being never white, but of a yellowish hue. It does not ferment without the addition of some leaven, and in this case sour leaven of corn flour is the best. With this it makes a spongy and perfectly uniform bread, like common brown bread, and, when thoroughly baked, is said to have a better taste than the bread prepared in times of scarcity from bran and husks of corn. The addition of a little wheat-flour is recommended to form a wholesome bread in the following manner:—Two pounds of wheat flour and three pounds of sour wheat leaven are mixed up with a little wood-flour and milk, and allowed to stand for some hours in a moderately warm place to rise or swell. About fifteen pounds of birch-wood flour and an additional quantity of milk are then kneaded in, and the dough is rolled out into thin cakes. These cakes are allowed to stand for some time to swell, and are then well baked in an oven. Thirty-six pounds of bread may be produced from the ingredients mentioned above.

"As a proof that wood-flour is both soluble and nutritious, it has been stated that starch is obtained from it in the same way as from wheat-flour, which with boiling water forms a thick, tough, tenacious jelly. More decisive proofs have likewise been obtained by experiments on animals. Professor Autenrieth tried its effects on a young dog. He kept the dog a whole day with only water, and then set before him a gruel of indifferently prepared wood-flour, salt, and water. At first the animal ate very little of it, and in the evening was very weak from having taken so little food. During the night he ate freely of the gruel, and in the morning became lively. He now had as much gruel as he could eat four times a day, and in the course of a few days appeared perfectly reconciled to his diet. This course was continued for seven days, the dog remaining in health, and even appearing to grow.

"The Professor next tried the effects of the wood-flour on himself and his family. They used it in the form of gruel, soup, dumplings, and pancakes, all made with as little of any other ingredients as possible; and not only did they suffer no inconvenience from this kind of diet, but they also found it palatable. When formed into bread, as before described, Professor Autenrieth first tried its effects by eating a quarter of a pound of it, with weak coffee, for breakfast. The more bread he ate, the rougher and more unpleasant did it become; his throat became somewhat constricted and his stomach oppressed, so that he felt convinced at the time that its continued use would prove injurious to him. At dinner-time, however, his appetite returned, and he ventured to eat of several kinds of soup made of this flour. Finding no inconvenience from this, he ate another quarter of a pound of bread in the evening with some milk, and no longer found any repugnance towards it or subsequent oppression. He slept well, and arose in his usual health."

"According to Von Buch, the mode of making bark-bread in Lapland is as follows:—When young and vigorous fir-trees are felled, the tree is stripped of all its bark, and all the outer parts peeled away, except an innermost rind, which is extremely soft and white. This is hung up for several days in the air to dry, and is afterwards baked in an oven, then beaten on wooden blocks, and pounded as finely as possible in wooden vessels. The meal is mixed up with hexel, with threshed-out ears of corn, or with a few moss-seeds, and cakes about an inch in thickness are formed of this composition. 'Nature,' says Von Buch, 'receives with reluctance the bitter and contracting food, and the boors endeavour to disguise the taste of it by washing it down with water: but in the beginning of spring, after having lived on this bread a great part of the winter, they become weak and relaxed, and are incessantly tormented with an oppressive shooting and burning about the chest. The Laplanders of Kemi Lappmark are described as using bark in a still more crude form. During the summer they peel off the innermost bark of the fir, divide it into long strips, and hang these strips in their dwellings for winter store, subsisting meanwhile almost entirely on fish. In winter, when their supply of fish fails, they cut these strips of bark into small pieces, and boil them with water and reindeer tallow for several hours, till in consistency they form a thick kind of broth."

We give these few extracts on account of their temporary interest; but we are bound in justice to state that Mr. Dodd's account of British manufactures is ably and accurately written, and that his details are full of instructive knowledge.

The following very clever jeu d'esprit has appeared in the Glasgow Argus, and bears internal evidence of having come from the same sources as the Odes on Cash, Corn, and Catholics, which some thirty years ago set the country in a roar. It is gratifying to find the sweetest of modern poets firmly adhering to those principles which he maintained against the usurpations of monopoly in the disastrous struggle when the Corn Laws were imposed. Free Traders have not forgotten their obligations to the poet who fought their battle almost single-handed under the most disadvantageous circumstances, and they have reason to rejoice when they find that the veteran puts in his claim to share in the victory.

A THRENODY ON THE APPROACHING DEMISE OF OLD MOTHER CORN-LAW.

By THOMAS MOORE.

I see, I see—it is coming fast,
Our dear old Corn-law's doom is cast!
That ancient Lady, of high degree,
Is as near her end as she well can be;
And much will all vulgar eaters of bread
Rejoice, when they see her fairly dead!

For never, from ancient Medea* down
To the late Mrs. Brownrigg, of bad renown,
Has any old dame been known, they aver,
Who could starve and carve poor folks, like her.

But, dear old dunsell, they wrong her sadly,
'Twas all by law she behaved so badly;
And God forbid, whate'er the event,
That free-born Britons should e'er repent
Wrongs done by Act of Parliament.

But is it indeed then come to this,
After all our course of high-bread bliss?
Poor, dear old Corn-law!—prop of Peers,
And glory of Squires, through countless years,
Must all thy structure of Pounds and Pence,
Like another Babylon, vanish hence?
Must towering Prices and Rents sublime
Thus topple, like turrets touch'd by time—
And all, for what? that each shirtless out
May bolt, for breakfast, a larger loaf!
For this one vulgar purpose alone
Is all this inelegant mischief done.
For this poor Knatchbull—hard privation—
Must lower a peg his "social station!"
For this, even lords (distressing thought)
Will soon to short commons all be brought;
Will fall with their wheat so much per quarter,
And get to look, blue as Bucky's garter,
And stars will grow pale as prices fail,
And fees in tail will be cut off for sale,
And all will sink by a sliding scale—
As "slips o'er its slime the sleek snug-snail,"
Nor leave one corn-lord high and hale,
Though they flounsh now, to tell the tale!

* This lady, as is well known, was in the agricultural line. See, for an account of her farming operations, Ovid, Metamorph. l. vii. v. 227. Her skill in "carving" is thus briefly described by the same poet.

—stricto Medea recludit.

Ense senis pugnabit.

+ A line borrowed, with but little alteration, from one of the Lake poets, the original being as follows:—
"Slow sliding o'er its slime the slippery, sleek snug-snail."

FREE TRADE COUNTY QUALIFICATION.

A GENERAL MEETING OF THE LEAGUE COUNTY REGISTRATION COMMITTEE will be held at the OFFICES, Newall's Buildings, Manchester, on TUESDAY Evening next, Nov. 11th, for the purpose of taking the necessary steps to induce Free Traders in the Counties to purchase Freehold Qualifications previous to the 31st of January, 1846. The Chair will be taken at half-past six o'clock.

By Order of the Council,
JOSEPH HICKIN, Secretary.

TO COUNTRY SUBSCRIBERS.

Any person forwarding 3s. 3d. by Post-office order to the Publisher, 67, Fleet-street, London, will have one quarter's copies of the LEAGUE forwarded by post on the days of publication. Subscriptions for the paper may also be left with J. Gadsby, Newall's-buildings, Manchester; and the LEAGUE may be had by order of any news-agent in town or country. Subscribers who receive coloured envelopes on their papers must bear in mind that their subscriptions are due.

POSTSCRIPT.

LONDON, Saturday Morning, November 8, 1845.

The Court Circular of Friday morning makes the following announcement:

"A Cabinet Council was held yesterday afternoon, at the residence of Sir Robert Peel, in Whitehall-gardens. The Ministers present were Sir Robert Peel, the Duke of Wellington, the Lord Chancellor, Lord Wharncliffe, the Duke of Buccleuch, the Earl of Aberdeen, Lord Stanley, Sir James Graham, the Chancellor of the Exchequer, Earl of Haddington, Earl of Ripon, the Earl of Lincoln, and the Right Hon. Sidney Herbert. The Duke of Wellington and the Earl of Ripon arrived in town yesterday morning. The Council sat four hours."

This is the fourth Cabinet Council held within the short space of eight days; and yet, for any result that has appeared, the ministers might as well have remained at their country seats, their shooting boxes, or their watering-places. A deputation from the citizens of Dublin waited on the Lord Lieutenant, to press upon him the necessity of taking early measures to prevent the famine too likely to ensue from the failure of the potato crop in Ireland, and his Excellency delivered to them an oracular answer, from which nothing could be gathered beyond the fact that he had not yet received any intimation of the course about to be pursued from the responsible advisers of the Crown. England, as well as Ireland, waits for some exhibition of vitality and mental activity in these responsible advisers, and finds nothing but doubt, hesitation, and uncertainty. In another column will be found a sad account, from a known correspondent, of the ravages of the potato disease in Hampshire and the south of England; letters from Wales declare that a large portion of the principality has been visited by the same calamity; the great deficiency in Ireland is universally admitted, though there may be some uncertainty as to its extent; bread is rising, trade is sinking, the bank has raised its rate of discount, enterprise is checked in every direction, and this is the period at which a Cabinet deliberates for four hours, and only arrives at a conclusion in which nothing is concluded.

The Standard at dowy eye proclaims to the world that the Premier has the nerve and firmness not only to open the ports, but to adopt the policy of 1795, and grant bounties on the importation of grain. Night, however, works a change in the Ministerial dream; and at the dawn we find the Herald declaring that the sliding-scale works so smoothly and so well, that the crisis anticipated on the preceding evening cannot possibly arrive, and that the State physician will persevere in his cautious course of homœopathy without having recourse to any active remedies. The Premier's courage is blazing to its height in the evening paper; but when the morning journal appears, it is found, like the courage of Bob Acres, to have oozed out through the tips of his fingers.

We were not among those who expected any great or immediate results from the opening of the ports; the Corn Laws have done their work abroad as well as at home. Our Continental neighbours have no surplus to spare for our wants, and they seem resolved to retain all the provisions they possess for their own consumption. We find it stated in the Commerce, that the Municipal Council of Strasburgh, following the excellent example of the Councils of Mulhouse and of Nancy, has voted the purchase of 7000 metric quintals of foreign wheat, to be retailed to the poor should prices continue to rise in the approaching winter. The Réforme declares:

"Provisions are every day becoming dearer in Paris. Potatoes are now double the price they were a month since. The price of other vegetables rises in the same proportion. Poor families are already beginning to feel severely the effects of the bad harvest. If this rise in the price of provisions increases in the same proportion for only one month, the necessities of life will become beyond the reach of the indigent."

La Presse calls loudly for a prohibition of the export of corn. "Let us," says this republican journal, "let us prevent the English from coming to satisfy their hunger at the expense of those gifts which God has reserved for us. . . . The French Government ought to take care of the French population before it melts into pity for the sufferings with which Ireland is menaced." Food is going out of Britain. An Antwerp journal states that a large quantity of Irish potatoes has been destroyed by the police of that city as being unfit for human food; a vessel from Londonderry laden with potatoes appears among the arrivals in the ports of Holland. It is believed by many influential merchants, that if the present high rate of duty continues, much of the corn now in bond will be re-exported; and thus the reserve-stock will be irrecoverably lost to the country.

How the British population is to be fed for the next ten months, is the problem which the Premier must solve, for he has voluntarily incurred the responsibility. To him the nation has a right to look, because he has intercepted the supplies which would have come in the natural course of Providence, and the resources which he promised in their stead have been found failures. Events are too powerful for artifice; the irresistible march of circumstances tramples down shifts and contrivances. To enact Corn Laws under any circumstances was a crime and a blunder; to maintain them amid ominous menaces of scarcity and famine would be the very consummation of iniquity and absurdity.

The following announcement in the Standard of Friday evening has a semi-official character. We give it without comment, which, under present circumstances, is unnecessary:

"We are, however, we trust, in a condition to congratulate the Leaguers upon the certainty that the ports will not be opened, inasmuch as the stock of provisions in Great Britain is amply sufficient; and the deficiency in Ireland is not likely to proceed to an extent calling for any violent remedy."

AN EXAMPLE TO GREAT BRITAIN.—Mr. James Reed, Belgian Consul at Sunderland, has received from the Minister of Foreign Affairs at Brussels, an ordinance of the 24th September, 1845, of which the following is a translation:—"Leopold, King of the Belgians, greeting to all present and to come. The Chambers have adopted and we sanction what follows: Article 1st. Until the 1st June, 1846, will continue to be free as imports, wheat, rye, barley, buckwheat, maize, beans, and vetches, peas, oats, oatmeal, potato meal, and other like substances—vermicelli, macaroni, and Semolina potatoes, rice. The Government will grant besides, for the same term, the total or partial remission of the import duties on flour, cattle, and all provisions not set forth in this article. It will be perceived in these articles a balance duty of 10 centimes per 1000 kilogrammes. Article 2nd. It will be allowed until the 1st June, 1846, a remission of tonnage duty on the importation of potatoes, which shall be acknowledged of good quality and as consumption. Done at Laken, the 24th September, 1845. Signed, LEOPOLD."—Sunderland Herald.

EPITOME OF NEWS.

FOREIGN.

The Paris papers of Tuesday announce that it is by no means certain that Marshal Soudt will give up the Portfolio of the War Department. The Paris opposition prints appear to anticipate difficulties of a serious character between France and Turkey, on account of the conduct of Chekib in the Lebanon, against which the Baron de Bourquenay had hitherto vainly remonstrated. The Constitutionnel publishes a letter from Father de Plonghe, directly accusing the Druze chief of the murder of Father Charles, who was acquitted by the Turkish tribunal, notwithstanding the demand of the French authorities for his execution.—The Courier de Marseilles says, "We believe we may announce positively that the Government has conceived it to be necessary to send further reinforcements to Africa, and that, instead of 12,000, it will send 20,000 men before the month of February. This leads to a supposition that our troops will not enter Morocco before the spring, and that between this and then our military operations will be confined to restraining the population of Algeria. In the meantime negotiations will be opened with the Emperor Abderrhaman, in the hope of inducing him to carry into execution the principal clauses of the treaty of Tangier." It appears that of the 80,000 men previously in Algeria, not more than 20,000 are in the field under all the Generals; the remainder couped in garrisons, or sick in the hospitals. Allowing that 10,000 of these may be taken into Morocco, this would, with the intended reinforcement of 20,000 men, give an army of 30,000. This would be a formidable force if it could arrive intact at the intended scene of action in Morocco. But before it could get there half would be disabled by sickness or fatigue. If Marshal Bugeaud is in the spring to penetrate into the territories of the Emperor, he must have a reinforcement not merely of 20,000, but of 50,000 men, and there is his own authority on record for declaring that even in that case he will not be sure of success.—The Débats, in a notice of Lieut. Waghorn's success with his India mail experiment by Trieste, urges the French Government to take immediate steps for preventing the utter abandonment of Marseilles. It recommends principally the amelioration of the quarantine regulations.—The long-expected accouchement of the Princess de Joinville took place at the Chateau of St. Cloud on Wednesday morning. Her Royal Highness and infant (a son) were stated at three o'clock on that day to be as well as could be expected. It was reported that the young Prince would be created Duke of Tangier or Count of Mogador. The Court would, it was expected, return to the Tuileries towards the end of the present month. The accouchement of the Duchess d'Annamule would, it was expected, take place in the first week in December.

BRUSSELS, Nov. 4.—The Antwerp and Bruges police seized the other day a large quantity of potatoes which had arrived from Ireland in a damaged condition. It is probable that they were sound when shipped, but in many cases the voyage is prejudicial to that vegetable.

ANTWERP.—A letter from Antwerp of the 2d says, "This morning a cargo of 1000 sacks of potatoes of good quality and in excellent condition, arrived from Dundee; a cargo of potatoes has also arrived from Londonderry. The police have caused several cart loads of potatoes from Ireland to be thrown into the river. The Congress of the Customs Union at Carlsruhe is terminated; all the members have left the city, and it is affirmed that nothing has been done in favour of German manufactures. The next Congress is to be held at Cassel, but it is affirmed that in the interval there will be an extraordinary Congress at Berlin during the winter. Some persons hope that protective measures will be adopted at this extraordinary meeting, but this hope is ill-founded.

DOMESTIC.

A Cabinet Council was held on Thursday afternoon at the residence of Sir Robert Peel in Whitehall-gardens. The Ministers present were—Sir Robert Peel, the Duke of Wellington, the Lord Chancellor, Lord Wharfedale, the Duke of Buccleuch, the Earl of Aberdeen, Lord Stanley, Sir James Graham, the Chancellor of the Exchequer, the Earl of Londonderry, the Earl of Ripon, the Earl of Lincoln, and the Right Hon. Sidney Herbert. The Duke of Wellington and the Earl of Ripon arrived in town yesterday morning. The Council sat four hours.

The following important notice was issued on Thursday afternoon, at the Bank of England:—"Notice.—The minimum rate of interest on bills discounted at the Bank of England, not having more than 95 days to run, is 3l. 10s. per cent.

Sir James South, in a letter published in the Times of Wednesday, announces that Professor Faraday has succeeded in obtaining, experimentally, what he had long sought for, namely, "the direct relation of electricity and magnetism to light." The details of the experiments are to be made public at the approaching evening meetings of the Royal Institution.

During the past week several large flocks of those well-known winter visitors, the field-farce and the redwing, have been seen in various parts of England. These birds ordinarily visit us in November, and their early arrival this autumn proves that the winter must have already set in with considerable severity in Norway and Lapland.

The 51st anniversary of the triumphant acquittal of John Horne Tooke, the great philologist, Thomas Hardy, and John Thurgate, was celebrated on Wednesday evening at the Crown and Anchor Tavern, when a party of about 100 sat down to dinner. Dr. Bowring, M.P., took the chair, and was supported on the left by Mr. Fox, and on the right by Mr. Taylor.

On Saturday last, between the hours of eleven and twelve o'clock, a fire was discovered in the stackyard of Mr. John Carrington, of Ty Bryth, Minera. Great exertions were made by Mr. Carrington and his neighbours to stop the ravages of the devouring element, but their efforts proved unavailing; four ricks of oats, one of barley, and part of a stack of hay were consumed. A meeting was held in the Town Hall, on Tuesday last, which was attended by R.M. Lloyd, Esq., and other influential parties, for the purpose of investigating the cause of the fire. The firemen and various witnesses were examined, and we are sorry to announce that, from the tenor of the whole of the evidence, it was manifest that the fire had not arisen from spontaneous combustion, but was the diabolical work of an incendiary.—Carnarvon Herald.

Mr. G. R. Phillips, one of the members for Poole, attended a meeting of his constituents at the Town-hall on October 30, convened for the purpose of meeting him, and, on his explaining his Parliamentary career, a resolution approving his conduct was negatived by a majority of nearly two to one, much to the astonishment of the hon. member. This unexpected notification in all probability will close his connection with this borough.

About ten minutes after seven o'clock on Saturday evening last, a dreadful gunpowder explosion took place at the shop of Mr. Richard Jones, ironmonger, No. 58, Dale-street, Liverpool, which not only seriously injured Mr. Jones himself, and his shop-boy, John Buckstone, but more or less injured several other persons, and caused a devastation of property to a considerable amount.

Such is the demand, at the present time, for shipwrights at her Majesty's dockyards at Portsmouth, that our city is placcarded, offering liberal wages and a free passage to forty good workmen.—Chester Courant.

We learn, from the Scotsman, that Lord John Russell, accompanied by his lady, arrived in Edinburgh on Saturday the 25th. On Thursday the town council unanimously resolved to confer the freedom of the city on his lordship. No doubt, the corporation of Glasgow will imitate the excellent example set them by that of Edinburgh, if his Lordship, as we understand he will, should be induced to honour this city with his presence.—Glasgow Argus.

It is a fact that the largest entry of goods for export or the largest declared value ever included in one entry, was made at the Liverpool Custom-house the other day, in the ship Jeremiah Garnet, for China—1700 bales of goods, valued at 43,000l. The total cargo, it is said, will reach 120,000l.—Liverpool Mercury.

Orders were on Thursday received at the Cork Custom-house directing returns to be forwarded to the Castle, Dublin, setting forth the quantity of potatoes shipped from this and all the outports of the district since the 1st of September last; and also directing that returns should be made every Saturday of the quantities exported during the week, distinguishing in all cases those shipped to England, coastways, and to other places. Orders similar to the above have been received at the Custom-house of Dublin, and at the various outports.

As a proof that the feeling with regard to the suspension of distillation from grain is gaining ground, we may mention that we have just now heard (four o'clock) that an eminent distiller of this city has purchased to-day 400 hogheads of sugar, which of course he intends to use as a substitute for grain, in case it be necessary.—Dublin Pilot.

The North Riding Tipperary papers of Friday bring the horrible intelligence of the assassination, in open day, of Mr. Patrick Clarke, a gentleman of extensive property, and late of the firm of Clarke and Vincent, solicitors and land-agents, of Merriem-square, Dublin.

The directors of the Bank of Ireland have determined upon a further advance in discounts; namely, to four per cent. upon English bills, and to five per cent. upon Irish bills. This proceeding is one of great commercial importance under existing circumstances, and cannot fail to produce a material influence upon railway enterprise.

MARKETS.

CORN MARKET.

Monday, Nov. 3.—We have been only moderately supplied with English Wheat during the past week, and to-day there is no great addition to the show of samples left over from Friday: of all other grain the arrivals are scanty. There is no like in any branch of the trade. Where sales of English Wheat are pressed, lower prices must be taken, but factors will not sell at a decline. Bonded Wheat is held for 2s. to 3s. more money, but there are no purchasers at these rates. Barley, Beans, and Peas remain the same as last week. The Oat trade partakes of the general dullness without any material alteration in price. S. H. LUCAS.

FRIDAY, Nov. 7.—We have short arrivals of grain of every kind this week. There is no life in any branch of the trade, and to make sales, rather lower prices must be taken. NOTICE TO THE PUBLIC.

LEAGUE FUND.

All Subscribers of £1 and upwards to the LEAGUE FUND will be entitled to, and receive, a copy weekly of this publication for twelve months from the date of the receipt of their subscription.

Subscribers of half-a-crown, and under £1, will have forwarded to them a copy of THE LEAGUE, containing an acknowledgment of their subscription; and it is requested that all subscribers will be kind enough to send their names and addresses to the offices of THE LEAGUE, Newall's-buildings, Manchester, or 67, Fleet-street, London.

N.B. As there is considerable risk in the transmission of gold and silver by post, parties wishing to forward small contributions to THE LEAGUE FUND are particularly requested to make their remittances by post-office orders.

The Council of the League would also suggest to their friends in the country the importance of transmitting their copies of THE LEAGUE newspaper, after perusal, to such parties (more especially farmers) as may be either hostile or indifferent to the question of Free Trade.

By order of the Council,
JOSEPH HICKIN, Secretary.

We beg to inform our subscribers that bound volumes of the LEAGUE newspaper, containing the whole of the first year's Numbers, may be had on application at the offices, either in London or Manchester.

OBSERVE!

Samples of good Wheat were sold in Mark Lane on Friday at 74s. per quarter.

The duty on Foreign Wheat is 14s. per qr.
The national expenditure for bread is NOW at the rate of 20 millions a-year, or FOUR HUNDRED THOUSAND pounds weekly MORE than during the whole of last winter and spring.

BUY FORTY-SHILLING FREEHOLDS!

We again urge our Free Trade friends everywhere, promptly and strenuously to improve the precious weeks from now to the 31st of January in making out their title to citizenship on the cheap and easy terms on which it is offered by the ancient constitution of the country. Let every Englishman who would rescue his property and industry from the clutches of the greedy and sordid oligarchy that claim a vested interest in famine, come forward and accept this simple and all-efficient weapon of self-protection—the good old 40s. freehold county franchise.

Nothing else will do. Nothing but votes—and county votes are the easiest to be got and kept. If any of us ever dreamed that Sir Robert Peel would yield to any power on earth but the power of votes, either actually given, or registered to be ready when wanted; that he would submit to any other necessity than that imposed by Parliamentary majorities, present or prospective; that he would recognise any other "destiny" than the destiny whose decrees are duly enrolled in the registration courts, and counter-signed by the revising barristers; or that he would respect any other "public opinion" than the public opinion which is qualified and registered;—that dream is now at an end. For an unqualified and unregistered people, Sir Robert Peel either will not, or cannot, lift up a little finger. Unqualified and unregistered Russians, Turks, and Dutchmen get themselves attended to by their rulers—but not unqualified and unregistered Englishmen. The Minister who wields the resources of a wealth and power which we create, who quarterly receives a salary which we pay, cares not for us. He is in the hands of the Richmonds and Buckinghams, because the Richmonds and Buckinghams have the votes; and he will do their bidding so long as they have the votes. His and their power rests on votes—especially county votes; and by votes, especially county votes, must it be overthrown. WE MUST HAVE THE COUNTIES.

That we may have the counties, if we will, is as certain as that we have South Lancashire. There is scarcely a county in England that might not be won, either by efforts from within or from without, through the medium of the 40s. franchise; there is not one county that we would give up as quite hopeless. As, however, in the present stage of this movement, selection is desirable, to prevent a too minute subdivision of our forces, we subjoin a list of counties, every one of which may be ours, and ought to be ours, by the end of January—in every one of which there is an ample sufficiency of those materials and facilities, by the use of which the first four of the catalogue have already been won to the Free Trade cause:

South Lancashire	West Gloucester
Middlesex	East Somerset
West Yorkshire	West Somerset
North Cheshire	North Wilts
North Lancashire	North Notts
South Stafford	South Leicester
South Cheshire	Rutland
North Durham	East Surrey
East Cumberland	South Essex
South Northumberland	West Kent
North Stafford	South Hants
North Warwick	East Sussex
East Worcester	East Cornwall
East Gloucester	West Cornwall

With the entire confidence derived from a careful study of the resources of these counties, and of those bordering on them, and from the experience of the past year's efforts and successes, we tell the Free Traders of England, that every one of the above may be wrested from monopoly in time for the next general election.

We entreat our friends in all the towns of all these counties to begin their operations at once, by the formation of active and efficient Qualification and Registration Committees.

In some of the counties or divisions above enumerated, it will be obvious to many of our readers, that the means of self-emancipation afforded by a numerous and free-spirited town population, do not exist to a sufficient extent within the boundaries of the county or division itself. This, however, need create no difficulty. One county and one division may help another. As this is a franchise which does not require residence, the number of county votes which a man may possess in England is limited only by the number of counties in England. Every Free Trader, after looking to the safety of his own county, may step over the border, and take out his qualification in the adjoining one. This is what we have already done in the north to a great extent. In fact, a prosperous Manchester man's complement of county votes is regularly understood to be four, at least. We hope our friends will deem the precedent worthy of general adoption. As South Lancashire helps Cheshire and the West Riding, let the West Riding people step over into North Nottinghamshire, and look about them to see if they can find any little properties there to their mind. Cheshire and Worcestershire freeholds may afford desirable investments to the men of North and South Staffordshire; and we need not say that Londoners must take care of Middlesex, Kent, and Surrey. This sort of charity cannot be too diffusive—provided, that is, that in every instance it begin at home.

Working men of England!—all who, whether by the toil of head or hands, make England what it is—here is the way from a worse than feudal serfdom, to citizenship and sovereignty. Will you not walk in it? Your country is yours by right, for you have made it; will you not make it yours by law, and take the rule of it? The constitution means to give citizenship and sovereignty to every one of you that has 40s. worth annually of independent property, inherited or earned; but the constitution requires that the fact be authenticated by certain formalities, the first and chief of which is the purchase of a piece of land. Will you not comply? It does not seem a very hard condition. Property in the soil of England is worth having without the vote; but the good old English law and constitution gives the vote over and above, gratis.

IF SIR ROBERT PEEL IS NOT RESPONSIBLE, WHO IS?

We are determined to have no mistake about this. The Herald may wince, and set up the stale, stupid, and impudent cry of "assassination"—infinitely to the annoyance, we are very sure, of the Herald's master, who owes small thanks to anybody for reminding the world of the most discreditable passage of his life. But, good Herald, we assure you it won't do. Somebody is responsible, we suppose, for the government of the country. Somebody may take the credit, "individually and personally," of the fruits of good government—and must bear the blame, individually and personally, of the consequences of bad government. For certain things which befall a country there is, of course, no responsibility. For those contingencies which legal phraseology designates the "act of God"—for hurricanes and earthquakes, ungenial seasons and hostile elements—no human being is responsible. But for everything that comes within the range of human legislation and administration—for all arbitrary interferences with the course of nature and Providence—for all artificial hindrances of natural good, or aggravations of natural evil—for everything that a Government undertakes to do, that Government is responsible: that is, the men who govern are responsible—the man who presides over the Government is chiefly responsible. And again and again we ask,—If Sir Robert Peel is not responsible for all that may happen to the country under and in consequence of his own Corn Law—the law which he made, which he maintains, which he will not advise the Queen to suspend by act of prerogative, nor summon Parliament to repeal by act of legislation;—if Sir Robert Peel is not responsible, individually and personally responsible, who is?

Will they say that Parliament is responsible? Parliament is responsible for many things for which we should be very sorry to be responsible; and among the rest, for making the Corn Law of 1842. But Parliament is certainly not responsible for refusing to call itself together to re-consider or repeal the Corn Law. To call Parliament is an act of prerogative. Parliament is not responsible for there being no Order in Council to suspend the Corn Law and open the ports, which likewise is an affair of prerogative. Do they mean to insinuate, then, that the Queen is responsible—that it is by her Majesty's act or default that the Government carried on in her name is more merciless than that of the Czar of Russia, and less Christian than that of the Grand Turk? Every schoolboy knows better. An individual and personal responsibility of British sovereigns is unknown to the constitution. Royal responsibility in this country is put permanently into commission—is delegated to those functionaries whom our everyday political phraseology denominates "responsible advisers of the Crown." And the responsible adviser of the Crown, who now counsels Majesty to let the law of artificial famine take its course, is SIR ROBERT PEEL. Legally and constitutionally, politically and morally, to Parliament and to the country, is Sir Robert Peel now responsible—individually and personally responsible—for all the consequences of keeping up prohibitory duties with famine prices. All the bankruptcy, insolvency, and pauperism; all the stinting and pinching of men, women, and children in their daily comforts; all the famine and pestilence; all the mortality and crime that may ensue in this enormous public delinquency—ALL is Sir Robert Peel's doing.

Nothing in this world was ever plainer. The case is complete on their own showing. The Ministerial Standard itself gives us all the duties—the common sense of mankind may be trusted for the comment. On Thursday, the 23rd of October, when the potato disease first began to assume its present menacing aspect, this journal said:

"The ultimate consideration—that to which all other considerations must give place—is the duty of the state to ensure that not one of the Queen's subjects shall perish from famine Sir Robert Peel, we are convinced, is not the statesman to shrink from the most urgent of all a statesman's duties—the preservation of the lives of his fellow-citizens Should it prove necessary, as we trust it will not, Sir Robert Peel, we are persuaded, will not hesitate to suspend the Corn Laws

In the supposed case of a very great deficiency in the potato crop, it seems pretty plain that a suspension of the Corn Laws ought to be resorted to."

Since the 23rd of October, we have had no fewer than four Cabinet Councils, for the purpose of examining whether any and what special security need to be taken, "to ensure that not one of the Queen's subjects shall perish from famine," and of considering the best means of discharging "the most urgent of a statesman's duties—the preservation of the lives of his fellow-citizens." On Friday, the 7th instant, the same Standard announced the result as follows:—

"We are, we trust, in a condition to congratulate the Leaguers upon the certainty that the ports will not be opened, INASMUCH AS THE STOCK OF PROVISIONS IN GREAT BRITAIN IS AMPLY SUFFICIENT."

That is to say, Sir Robert Peel takes it on him to affirm that "the most urgent of all a statesman's duties" is in a fair way of being fulfilled, and that the stock of food in the country is such as "to insure that not one of the Queen's subjects shall perish from famine." Were there the slightest doubt on this matter, the ports would be immediately opened—opening the ports being, as a matter of course, admitted by the ministerial journalist to be the appropriate remedy for any deficiency of food. But as there is no deficiency of food—"inasmuch as the stock of provisions in Great Britain is amply sufficient"—of course the ports are not opened. It is a "certainty" that the ports will not be opened—implying that the fact of "ample sufficiency" is likewise a matter of certainty. Having arrived at this most gratifying—though, to the country generally, most unexpected—conclusion; having discovered the needlessness of applying a remedy to an evil which is ascertained to be purely imaginary,—Sir Robert Peel dismisses his colleagues to their respective country seats, and instructs his organs to cry lustily, "All right."

We trust we have succeeded in making ourselves perfectly understood. If there is any inaccuracy in our facts, or looseness in our logic, we beg the Standard to take an early opportunity of pointing it out, since we intend to be continually harping on this matter. Our position is simply and briefly this: that Sir Robert Peel, as Prime Minister of Great Britain, has now made himself responsible—"individually and personally" responsible of course (we know nothing of a responsibility "in the abstract")—for the "CERTAINTY" of his hypothesis that "THE STOCK OF PROVISIONS IN GREAT BRITAIN IS AMPLY SUFFICIENT," and for all consequences that may ensue on the policy which takes this assumed certainty for its basis. To this responsibility we mean to fix him. There he is, and there we will hold him fast.

GREAT FREE TRADE DEMONSTRATION.

PUBLIC DINNER TO C. P. VILLIERS, ESQ., AT BIRMINGHAM.

A public dinner was given on Thursday evening in the Town-hall, Birmingham, to the Hon. C. P. Villiers, M.P. for Wolverhampton. The dinner was appointed for four o'clock precisely, but long before that hour all the approaches to the hall were crowded with those who had procured tickets to the banquet, and multitudes who were drawn from curiosity and other motives to the spot. As soon as the doors were thrown open a tremendous rush was made into the hall, and in the course of a few minutes the main and side galleries and the body of the room were filled to overflowing. The principal gallery was reserved for spectators, and by four o'clock it was occupied by from four to five hundred ladies. The whole area of the hall was occupied by the various tables, on which was spread a magnificent cold collation. At either end were rows of cross tables, that under the organ being reserved for the chairman and his guests; the table of the vice-president being at the opposite extremity of the hall. Tables were also spread in the side galleries, every seat of which had its occupant. Upwards of 600 gentlemen sat down to dinner, and every seat was occupied long before the chairman and guests made their appearance. At five o'clock the Hon. C. P. Villiers entered the hall, accompanied by Henry Smith, Esq., Mayor of Birmingham, who presided on the occasion; the Right Hon. the Earl of Ducie, Richard Cobden, Esq., M.P.; John Bright, Esq., M.P.; Thomas Thornley, Esq., M.P. for Wolverhampton; J. L. Ricardo, Esq., M.P. for Stoke-upon-Trent; R. Scott, Esq., M.P. for Walsall; T. M. Gibson, Esq., M.P. for Manchester; Colonel Perronet Thompson; George Wilson, Esq., chairman of the League; C. J. Fox, Esq.; W. Brown, Esq., of Liverpool; the Rev. Mr. Bache, — Crawshaw, Esq., of Newcastle-upon-Tyne; Aldermen Cutler, Phillips, Geach, Weston, Muntz, Hutton, W. Scholefield, Clement Scholefield, Van Wart, Beale, and James James; Lucas Chance, Esq.; George Edmunds, Esq., clerk of the peace; T. Whitfield, Esq.; W. Ellis, Esq., low bailiff; and Eyre Lee, Esq.; who ranged themselves on either side of the chair and vice-chair. The latter was occupied by Thomas Phillips, Esq.; and the Honourable C. P. Villiers took his seat on the right of the chairman.

Mr. Villiers, on entering, was received with shouts of applause, which were repeated again and again, the whole company rising en masse, and the ladies in the gallery waving their handkerchiefs to welcome him on his appearance. The applause lasted for several minutes, and when silence was at length restored, the proceedings of the evening commenced, grace being said by the Rev. Mr. Bache.

The Mayor said, that in commencing the discharge of the important duties which devolved on him in connection with the situation in which he was placed, he felt in the deepest degree the onerous character of those duties; but he could assure the meeting that he would bring to them the best abilities which he possessed, and all the powers which he could command, depending alone on their consideration and sympathy for support. (Cheers.) The first portion of his duty was to congratulate them on the noble assembly which he saw around him; and in the second place he had, as a portion of his duty, to bring before them the names of some highly honoured individuals who were not then present. (Hear, hear.) It was not his intention to read letters, for in doing so he felt that he should occupy the valuable time of the meeting, which might be much better employed in listening to the various excellent speeches which would no doubt be delivered to them on that occasion; but, nevertheless, he considered it necessary to state that, amongst other letters, he had received one from the Earl of Radnor, in which that nobleman deeply regretted that he was unable to attend at the dinner, in consequence of his age, which had for some time prevented him from attending public meetings; but he had stated in that letter that he felt the deepest interest in the meeting, and the most sincere desire to co-operate with them in paying a well-deserved and just compliment to Mr. Villiers. (Loud cheers.) He regretted, also, that he had to mention the absence of another individual whose presence he had expected to hail—it was, he would admit, the unexpected absence of an honourable member for a borough, both of whose members he had been prepared to expect would attend—he meant Mr. Mark Phillips, member for the borough of Manchester. (Hear, hear); and he was authorised by that gentleman to say that his absence was produced by a cause which he (the Mayor) could not regret, namely, that this had been appointed as the wedding-day of his only brother. (Cheers.) That was a cause which he should say that he could not regret, and the same cause had kept away from that assembly another individual whose presence they would all have hailed with pleasure, an individual who had long been connected with the exertions which had been made for the abolition of the corn-laws, and as the advocate of commercial freedom—he alluded to Mr. Robert Hyde Gregg, of Manchester, whose connection with Mr. Phillips, and that alone, had caused his absence on that occasion. (Hear.) He had hoped to see present on that occasion the member for Birmingham, and he was enabled to say that the cause which had prevented the attendance of Mr. Muntz was that this day was fixed for an interview with the honourable gentleman by Prince Albert, at Windsor, and he was enabled to say, on the part of Mr. Muntz, that he should feel the greatest pleasure in joining in any testimonial of respect to Mr. Villiers, and to say that he would on all occasions vote for a repeal of the corn-laws. (Loud cheers.) He had also hoped to have seen Mr. M. Gibson there, as well as the other member for Manchester, and Mr. Ricardo, M.P., and he had a hope that they might appear before the conclusion of the meeting, for trains were constantly arriving, and they might have been but casually delayed. Before he proposed the toast which was the first on the list on all such occasions, he would beg to remark that previous to the meeting he had experienced anxiety arising from two sources—his first cause of anxiety being that this great assembly, which had been so long looked forward to, should be worthy of the occasion which had caused it, and he had also felt anxious that it should pass away in such a manner that it might be afterwards referred to with admiration, and looked back to with pleasure. (Cheers.) When he looked round that hall and saw himself surrounded by such a meeting—when he recollected that hundreds had gone away, unable to obtain tickets of admission—when he knew that they had present representatives of the neighbouring manufacturing towns—the representatives of the trade of their own districts of that firm, the name of which was eminent throughout the world—namely, the firm of Bolton and Watt (loud cheers), and of numerous other firms, which, though smaller and less extensive in their operations, but yet not less enterprising or active (loud cheers)—when, in addition to those individuals, he saw around him representatives also of the agricultural interest assembling not less largely,—he should at once admit that his first source of anxiety had been removed, and he had no desire left but that they should remember that they had assembled, not at a party or political meeting, but at a social meeting, the object of which was to mark their respect for an eminent individual, whose principles they approved of, and whose public conduct they admired; and he felt that every one around him would cordially co-operate with him in carrying out that purpose. (Hear, hear.) The toast which he had to propose was one that required no preface on his part. It was the health of an illustrious lady who filled with dignity the highest throne in the world—who, filling the most exalted position, stood forth pre-eminent for all those virtues which we most admire in her sex, and all those graces that most captivate us. (Loud cheers.) He would give them "The Queen."

The toast was drunk with the greatest enthusiasm. The next toast was "Prince Albert;" after which followed "The Prince of Wales, and the other young branches of the Royal Family;" and "The Queen Dowager;" all of which were received with acclamation.

The Chairman then said that the next toast he had to propose was "The Navy and Army" (cheers), and in proposing that toast he could not avoid expressing the hope that henceforth the navy of England would be employed in assisting the intercommunications of commerce and civilisation all over the world (loud applause); and with respect to the army, he could not avoid expressing the hope that the army of this country would be in future employed in the protection of our rights, without any undue encroachment on the rights of others. (Cheers.) "The Navy and Army."

The Chairman said that he now came to the health of the individual to honour whom they had assembled, and in approaching it he felt deeply his own inability to discharge his duty as chairman on that occasion; but he had, however, the great satisfaction of knowing that it was a toast which required no introduction, and that whatever want of ability he might evince in bringing it forward, it would nevertheless be received in such a manner as would show how highly they appreciated the merits and talents of the individual to whom it referred. (Cheers.) The last toast which he had proposed was one which had reference to those who well deserved the gratitude and admiration of their country for the patriotism and self-devotion which they had so often displayed. They had drunk the health of those who had so often illustrated those high qualities, and thereby expressed their admiration of them; but he would now turn from such a theme, which applied so much to themselves—he would turn from the dead and the absent, and give his thoughts to the living and the present. (Hear, hear, and cheers.) It was unnecessary for him to say that the toast which he was about to propose was the health of the distinguished guest who had on that day honoured them by accepting their hospitality, and in bringing forward that toast he was satisfied that none in that assembly would suppose he was going to insult Mr. Villiers, or to disgrace himself by addressing to him the language of vain flattery or empty compliment; for it was due to him, it was due to them, and it was due to himself to avoid such a course. (Cheers.) Why had they assembled on that occasion to do honour to Mr. Villiers? It was because they had seen in the conduct of that gentleman since the commencement of his political life everything to admire; that they had witnessed his untiring advocacy of those principles in which they most concurred; and because they all admired the zeal and ability with which he had so advocated those principles. (Cheers.) If he were asked to define more clearly what those principles were, he would answer briefly in two words, the principles of commercial freedom. (Cheers.) He had been always, since the commencement of his public life, the advocate of commercial freedom, the advocate of the rights of labour, and of the social, moral, and intellectual advancement of the human race (cheers); he had been constantly engaged in extending those principles which, if carried out, would effect the development of truth, and most successfully effect the promotion of civilization. (Loud cheers.) If it were asked why they had assembled to do so much honour to Mr. Villiers for advocating those principles which were possessed and supported by so many others, or why they were so grateful to him for exertions to remove a law which others were also desirous to remove, he would answer that it was because ever since his first advent in the House of Commons he had been constantly remarkable for the clearness, the intelligence, the sagacity of mind, and independence of purpose, he might almost say the political prescience which enabled him to put his hand at once upon the flaw in our system which had the effect of depriving the labourer of the value of his labour, and which made the occupation of the merchant and the manufacturer, instead of being occupations of honour, pursuits of anxiety and harassing care, and which had done more to check the progress of the people than any other system which he had ever heard of. (Hear, hear, and loud cheers.) They admired the conduct of Mr. Villiers in Parliament, and they could not withhold their approval of a man, who, in such circumstances as he was placed, surrounded as he had been by the fence which aristocratic life hedges round those born within its precincts, encompassed

MANCHESTER, NOV. 10TH.—A requisition is in the course of signature, calling on the Mayor to convene a public towns meeting, to memorialise the Government in favour of opening the ports for the free admission of grain and all kinds of food.

by those prejudices which the influences which he was subjected to might be expected to engender, and being, in addition to that, a member of a profession the education for which was supposed to have a tendency too often to narrow the mind, whilst it sharpened the intellect, (hear.) under such influences as these—the influences of rank, of prejudice, of fashion, with the prejudices of professional education, to overcome—he had formed his views, and notwithstanding all these circumstances, there was no man in England who was better qualified as the advocate of commercial freedom. (Hear, hear.) He requested sincerely that the honoured guest would accept that mark of the admiration of the people of Birmingham, and that small though it might appear, it would be as sincerely and as honestly accepted as it was offered, and he trusted that it would not suffer, in being unduly estimated, from any want of ability on his part. (Cheers.) He would not delay the assembly any longer by dwelling upon the health of one whose conduct was so much admired by all around him, and he would therefore propose to them—"Charles Pelham Villiers, Esq., M.P."

The toast was received with the most enthusiastic cheering by the whole assembly, who rose at once and burst into a simultaneous and deafening cheer.

Mr. VILLIERS then rose to respond to the toast, and his rising was the signal for a renewed burst of applause, which was again and again repeated. As soon as silence had been restored, he said—Gentlemen, I am sure that you will readily believe that I cannot rise without great embarrassment in attempting duly to acknowledge the peculiar honour which you have done to me this evening. (Cheers.) When I consider the flattering circumstances under which I am your guest on this occasion, and the friendly manner in which the chairman has expressed his sentiments with respect to me, I feel the greatest difficulty in conveying to you in adequate terms my sense of your kindness and consideration. (Loud cheers.) I hardly feel myself entitled to so much distinction. There are many this evening, there are many men now at your board, who possess talents far superior to mine, and who have rendered more effective services to the great cause of commercial freedom with which we are identified, than myself. I am only distinguished from them perhaps by having been longer in Parliament; and I may state what they will bear me out in saying, that when they entered the House I was not idle (cheers); but that I had been long toiling in the same direction with themselves, and that I had been so toiling under greater disadvantages than they have had to contend with. (Cheers.) I have no higher title to honour than that since I entered Parliament as the representative of a respectable and intelligent constituency in your neighbourhood, I have striven to do my duty, and that I have never preferred the interests of individuals or of a class to the interests of the community. (Loud cheers.) Or have I it on my conscience that in any single instance have I preferred my own advantage to what I have considered my duty to the public. (Cheers.) I can only say, that if the course which I have pursued has had the good fortune to meet with your approbation, and if the humble advocacy which I have given to the cause which has this evening been connected with my name can be considered a service, this gratifying manifestation of your opinions, on this occasion, gives me the amplest reward for all that I have done, and offers to me the highest encouragement to persevere. (Cheers.) You know, gentlemen, how the House of Commons is constituted—you know the feeling which they entertain on the question of the Corn Law—you know also the unfortunate manner in which they identify their own interests with the maintenance of that law; and you can therefore readily understand how it is that those who assail that law, and place themselves in hostility to them, act under the greatest possible disadvantage. But I am sure that I can answer, as well for those distinguished men who are present on this occasion, as for myself, that nothing has cheered us more in the part which it has been our lot to take against that law, nothing has more encouraged us to persevere, than the confidence which we have felt that sooner or later the respectable, the intelligent, and independent portion of the community would and must appreciate the importance and the truth of our principles and views. (Hear.) I draw, therefore, from this assemblage a satisfaction more than personal. (Hear, hear.) I accept it as a sign of the progress of the cause, and as a gratifying verification of what we have expected. (Hear, hear.) And, gentlemen, allow me here to hope, that coinciding with us in our views upon this question, you will not underrate the importance of your openly declaring your opinions. The Legislature no doubt must ultimately decide this question; we who sit in the House of Commons have of late seen the most conclusive signs that they who have thus to decide feel that they are wrong, and that they cannot much longer maintain their false position. (Hear, hear.) They think they have an interest in the Corn Law, but evidence has been pressed upon them by their own ministers, and by circumstances which they cannot dispute, which leaves them no doubt that they can no longer maintain their interest consistently with the interests of the community. But, gentlemen, if you will allow me to say it, there is one thing which they appear not to know—they seem to be ignorant of what your opinion is in reference to this great question. They really appear to be ignorant of what is the opinion of persons throughout the country, of the intelligence and respectability of those whom I have now the honour of addressing. They appear to be in want of some sign of the opinion maintained by the intelligent and independent portion of the public. They choose to assume that if you dissent from agitation you coincide with them, and pretend that the public either agree with them in opinion, or are indifferent to the operation of the Corn Laws. Gentlemen, I do not, certainly, believe that the aristocracy of this country are better than other men, but I do believe that they are just like other men (hear, hear);—they are very much like all those in other classes of society, who, if they help themselves to something which they are not entitled to, require a great deal of pressing to make them give it up. (Cheers and laughter.) They are like other great bodies in this country—they will not move unless the steam is up. (Laughter.) And it is not a gentle pressure, but a high pressure which they require. (Laughter.) Sir James Graham was never nearer the truth than when he wrote, and it is one of those things which he has not unsaid (loud cheers and laughter), that the aristocracy of this country, when backed by public opinion, were omnipotent; but without it, or if opposed to it, they were virtually without power. (Cheers.) The truth of this has been specially indicated in reference to the laws imposing restrictions on food. What they now require, and the want of which I believe, stands at present between us and the repeal of the Corn Laws, is some clear, intelligible, and unmistakable expression of opinion throughout the country. (Hear, hear.) They want to be assured that the public are as much impressed as we are here with the evils and mischiefs superinduced by these laws. Satisfy them of that, and I firmly believe that another session will not pass over without the Corn Laws being repealed. (Cheers.) If this is the case, need I say how important it is that the opinion of this most noted and important town should be known (cheers);—how important it is that this great capital of the manufacturing industry of the country should speak out firmly on this and on every future occasion? (Hear, and cheers.) What Birmingham has done when its opinions were strong, its spirit aroused, and its determination taken, is yet fresh in the recollection of many in both Houses of Legislature. (Hear.) That which was then done was regarded almost as the result of rebellion, but has since been deemed and admitted to be salutary and beneficial. That entitles you of Birmingham to the confidence of the country, when you choose again to act; and I am satisfied that you cannot manifest your feelings on this occasion without exercising a powerful influence on the Legislature. (Hear, hear.) It is for that reason peculiarly gratifying to all sitting here who have perseveringly laboured in this cause, as well as to myself, to see this unequivocal testimony of the state of feeling in this town. (Hear, hear.) We accept it, not as a manifestation in favour of a party or of an individual, but in favour of a great principle and a righteous policy, the immediate adoption of which you identify with the permanent well-being of the people at large. (Cheers.) Commercial freedom is an object in every way worthy of your efforts and exertions. The chairman well characterised it as connected with all the best interests of commerce. Commercial freedom is only an extension of that liberty, in its truest sense, for which you have fought before, instalments of which the people of this country have so frequently succeeded in obtaining. (Hear, hear.) Commercial freedom is as much a right of the people of this country as any other for which they have struggled and obtained, and there is as much reason why they should now claim it. (Hear, hear.) And such are the circumstances of this country, that if its commerce continue to be restricted, as it has been heretofore, it would be almost as well without the liberty which it now possesses, and of which it so justly boasts. The people of this country have acquired much liberty for themselves, they have at least acquired the power of saying what they please, and thinking as they please, and praying where and as they please. They have secured to themselves civil and religious liberty, and the liberty of the press, and the result has been that with which every extension of the liberties of this country has been attended—the country has been greater and the people have been better for it. (Cheers.) Nay more, the people of this country are, as a consequence of what they have thus got, more peaceful and more powerful, more intelligent and enterprising, and more eager to raise their condition. It is on this account that they are the more aggrieved by restraints on their commerce. What is it to a man that he is more intelligent and skilful than his neighbours, if he is not allowed to enjoy the full fruits of his industry? What is it to him that he is free if the comforts and necessities of life are beyond his reach? (Hear, hear.) What are these to a man if he is not permitted to spend his wages where he pleases, and has to share them with monopolists? What is it to millions of men that they live in the midst of wealth, and luxury, and abundance, if they are doomed themselves to live on the lowest kind of food, which, failing them, they are reduced to destitution? (Hear.) And is that not the position of millions of our fellow-subjects in these two islands? (Hear, hear.) And the great question which is now agitating the country is, whether this calamity of destitution will not speedily befall them? (Hear, hear.) Does any man believe that this state of things is necessary, or a visitation of Providence, or that it is an evil which human foresight could not have foreseen and provided against? It is the necessary and natural result of legislating against food. (Cheers.) It is the direct consequence of that law which we assail—a consequence which has been foreseen by us, and which the Legislature and Government were warned against over and over again. By the laws, the Legislature makes the best kinds of food inaccessible to the people, and drives them to the use of inferior kinds; and if any of those calamities which we now dread should happen, they will be rendered totally destitute. Such has been the constant and invariable result of rendering food difficult to be obtained by the masses of the people. No man who has been a party to the legislation which occasions such evils has a right to talk of the visitations of Providence in connection with this matter. (Hear, hear.) We will not, on so great a question, accept them as authority in favour of calling these evils visitations of Providence, who proposed, support, and still maintain the system of legislation which I assert, and which you all believe, is the true cause of the mischief. (Hear, hear.) It is to this, and to this alone, that the evil is attributed by all persons of sense and observation, who have either written of, spoken of, or observed the state of this country at present. (Hear, hear.) It is the constant observation of every foreigner who comes here that they witness extremes in the social condition of this country which are discernible nowhere else. With greater wealth and abundance in our possession than any other country in the world can boast of, they see, by its side, a mass of poverty and suffering in England and Ireland which is not equalled or approximated elsewhere. (Hear, hear.) Now all this is invariably traced, by all intelligent foreign observers, to that law which we are now met to oppose, as the necessary consequence of the law that makes food scarce and difficult to obtain. I saw the other day that Lord John Russell had passed an eloquent panegyric on the constitution of this country, while addressing the citizens of Edinburgh, and to much that was said on that occasion of the particular advantages which the English people enjoy, every reasonable man in the country is ready to assent. But no Englishman now dares to boast of his institutions in any part of Europe, without being exposed to the reproach that in his country a law is still stoutly maintained, the whole consequences of which fall with dreadful effect upon the poor. (Hear, hear.) With all your boasted freedom, they say—with the long catalogue of your sacred rights, vindicated, fought for, and obtained—see only what injustice is daily perpetrated in your hand under the forms of liberty. (Cheers.) Other people may complain loudly of the despotism which crushes them to the earth, but where do you find such practical injustice wrought as results in this country from that code of laws which within the last thirty years have been passed to make the wealthiest aristocracy in the world wealthier still, by means which expose millions of the people to want? (Cheers.) Gentlemen, I am aware that, in speaking in this place on this subject, we may be reproached with having it all on one side, and with not hearing what our opponents may have to allege in favour of the Legislation of which we complain. This is a moment when we have no desire to shirk the question, certainly; it is a moment when we are perfectly ready to hear all that the friends of monopoly have to allege. We are all aware that the sliding-scale, which is their patent machine for making food scarce, is asserted by them to spring from a solicitude to make food not only abundant and cheap, but to render us in respect of it independent of the foreigner. (Hear, hear.) This is really a rare moment in which to examine the virtues of this device. By this scale we are told food will be rendered abundant, and we, in its supply, will become independent of the foreigner. I repeat it, that now is a favourable opportunity for ascertaining how far it has succeeded in accomplishing one end, and how far the other has proved itself an advantage to the country. And here, let me say that there are other sliding-scales besides our own in the world; for in this matter other people have, unfortunately for themselves, imitated our example; and it is not a bad time to examine them all. They attempted a sliding-scale in Holland and Belgium. At the first moment when there was the chance of a deficiency of food, how did they fulfil their promises to the people of these countries? Why the authorities lost not one moment in assembling in these countries, and consigning those scales to that place from which it was the honest hope of all that they might never return. (Cheers and laughter.) In both these countries, as in our own, the people have had the good fortune to have the producers of food preponderating in the Legislature, and they have all not unnaturally hit upon the same device for making food abundant. (Hear, hear, hear.) It has not, however, with them been allowed to stand in the way when there arose the apprehension of a scarcity. There was no time to be lost, and they at once assembled and passed resolutions that their sliding-scales should be removed (hear, hear), and that a system of entirely Free Trade should be resorted to. (Cheers.) I know of no better instance of the mischiefs of the protective system, and of the advantage of that for which we contend, than that with which Holland furnishes in this respect. Upwards of two centuries ago, to go back to its former history, and draw useful lessons from it also, it had an entirely Free Trade: it did not then raise one grain of corn, and yet it is alluded to by all contemporary writers as the granary of Europe. (Hear, hear.) Amongst others, Sir Walter Raleigh has observed that Holland was able to supply the wants of the other countries of Europe, when they were visited by a deficiency. It enjoyed a perfect Free Trade in corn, and the consequence was that it could always command a surplus wherewith to supply the wants of its neighbours. Raleigh says, ever since it resorted to the system of freedom of commerce, it had always an abundance of food, not only for its own people, but on an average about 700,000 quarters available for the communities around it that were ill provided. Does anybody believe that Holland ever had occasion to substitute the system of the sliding-scale for that of Free Trade, while it enjoyed that blessing? What is the condition of Holland now? The Dutch substituted the miserable system of the sliding-scale for that of Free Trade, and on the instant that they find themselves likely to be pinched for food, they are obliged once more to resort to the old system, which they so unfortunately abandoned. (Hear, hear.) And what confidence have we lately shown in the system of protection? What read we now in some of the public journals? Why, that ministers of the crown have been meeting four hours a day for the last week, for the purpose of seeing how decently they could get rid of their sliding-scale. (Cheers and laughter.) The only scruple which they now appear to have upon the subject is, that they are the authors and promoters of the scheme, which they are now desirous of throwing overboard. (Hear, hear.) And what, in reference to their late doings, is the universal opinion of the country? Why, that if there has been one act of folly greater than that of establishing the sliding-scale, it has been that of not seizing so favourable a moment, as was offered, for abolishing it. (Hear, hear, and cheers.) I am not exaggerating, in the slightest degree, when I say, that this is the prevailing opinion throughout the country. (Hear, hear.) They had a great and a glorious opportunity of getting rid of this mischievous scale, but they have not profited by it. (Hear, hear.) The sliding-scale promised to make us independent of foreigners. Now, will not that be a signal advantage to us at this moment? (Laughter.) What everybody is now regretting is, I believe, that foreigners have not enough for us to depend upon, if we should be in want, and that we cannot, in our present exigency, be more sure of their supply. (Loud cheers.) Those who devised this notable scheme seemed to forget that this was likely to follow: that if we made ourselves independent of foreigners, they would become independent of us. In looking at the organs of monopoly, I find that they are able to meet this emergency by saying that Sir R. Peel is not afraid—that he is ready to meet whatever emergency may arise, because he is ready to give a bounty to foreigners to induce them to send us food. That is extremely good of him; but I should like to know who are to pay that bounty? (Hear, hear.) I do not suppose that Sir Robert is going to pay it. (Hear.) I take it that the people of this country would have to pay it, and that the remedy proposed seems to be, that you are not only to pay more than you should do in this country for your food, but that when you want more you are to be especially taxed to enable you to buy up the food of other people. (Hear, hear, hear.) I really believe that there is no merit whatever in the sliding-scale but this, that now it deceives nobody. To confirm this, I recommend the people of this country to carry back their memories. What was the state of public feeling during the months of August and September last? Were not the state of the weather, and our prospects of the coming year in connection with it, the all engrossing topics of conversation? Were not these all-important subjects then anxiously revolved in everybody's mind? All were anxious to know whether we were to have plenty or scarcity, whether food was to be dear or cheap. And what means all this anxiety about the harvest? Why, everybody is anxious about the state of the nation, because they see that the food of the nations is made to depend on the most variable thing in the world, the English climate, and that abundance or scarcity, dearth or cheapness, is made to turn upon the clouds of August and September. Now, what is the meaning of this? Why are people anxious about the price of food? Because they have certain ideas fixed in their minds at present connected with the dearth or cheapness of food. (Hear.) There has been so much experience of late as to the consequences of abundance or scarcity of food upon the condition of the people, that there is no one in this country, I believe, who is not prepared to say with confidence what must be the result of the one and the other. You cannot divest the people of this country of the idea that when food is cheap and plentiful, credit will be good, trade will be brisk, manufactures will be prosperous, wages will be high, and the country generally in a state of prosperity. (Cheers.) And that when it is scarce and dear, money will be scarce, credit impaired, manufactures depressed, wages low, all local burdens increased, and that capital, which in prosperous times is available for railways and other great public works, must be necessarily withdrawn to pay for the increased charge of food. (Cheers.) These are the ideas which now obtain in all thinking minds. (Hear.) It is only natural, then, that there should be anxiety as to whether the harvest is good or not. (Hear, hear.) But the question is, whether all this apprehension and anxiety is necessary? Ought we to be dependant alone on the harvest? or having ascertained that it is desirable that food should be cheap, should we not take the best, most certain, and the readiest means to secure that end? (Hear, hear.) And is it the means to make food cheap that have been taken by the Legislature? Why one should know that there is not a single article which is in great demand in this country, which is subject to the regular principles of commerce, that is at any time deficient in supply. (Hear.) There are many articles of which we obtain our supplies from foreigners; but in which, there being no legislative interference, as in the case of food, the supplies are, nevertheless regular and abundant. There is no exception to the rule, that these are at all times supplied not only with regularity and in sufficient quantities, but with a tendency to fall in price. (Hear, hear, hear.) It is a fact which the monopolists should be eternally called upon to explain (hear, hear), that with Free Trade we have always a sufficient supply, and low prices; whereas when we take such pranks into our heads as making a sliding-scale with regard to any article, we are immediately exposed to all the evils of an uncertain, and often a deficient supply and high prices. (Hear, hear.) And such is the result of our experience of the Corn Laws. And I want to know in this, the thirty-first year of the Corn Law, whether they have one thing of any other kind to allege in its favour? (Cheers.) We expect to know something of the character of a man when he is 21 years old; surely it is time, if any thing can be said in favour of this law, that we should be made acquainted with it, now in its 31st year. (Hear, hear.) What we really know is, that it occasions great anxiety for about two months in every year; it throws the country into a state of confusion about every four years; that it has always occasioned a great loss to the country, and peculiar privation to the poor. (Cheers.) I do not know anything in which our friends exerted themselves to so much advantage in their attacks upon this absurd law, as in showing the influence of more or less food upon the moral and physical condition of the people. They have worked out this point in a manner that must satisfy everybody. (Hear, hear.) How the working man suffers privation when bread is scarce and dear, and gets the comforts and advantages he desires when it is plentiful and cheap, is now demonstrated. This exposition, too, has not been without its effect on our opponents, the monopolists. (Hear, hear.) When I first entered Parliament, I remember that I was told the Corn Laws must be maintained as a national object, that they were necessary to the maintenance of the national credit, that the national debt could not be paid without them, and that it raised wages. Now, however, we no longer have the plea of national credit brought forward in support of the Corn Law; we are now told "All we want is time. Give us time and we are now told "All we shall have plenty of corn, and food protection, and you shall have plenty of corn, and food shall be as cheap as you wish." But I have an objection to waiting. (Cheers.) I mistrust the man who proclaims himself the advocate of cheapness and plenty, and yet keeps a Corn Law in his house. I distrust people who combine to keep a monopoly, in order, as they say, to make things cheap. That is not the way business is done in this world. (Hear.) The manufacturers, it is true, endeavour to make things cheap, but they do so under the pressure of competition. (Cheers.) But when a man says, leave me a monopoly in order that I may make the article in which I have the monopoly cheap, I distrust him. (Cheers.) I distrust protective societies for agriculture, for I never see that they do anything with the purpose of cheapening food. They assemble often, it is true, and they talk much—they tell each other how cheap corn can be grown by improved methods of cultivation—what new inventions have been made in agriculture, and the great advantages which would result from their adoption; but in my view all they prove is, that if they would only put their shoulders to the wheel, and not trust to protection, they would be able to meet any competition that could be brought against them. (Hear, hear, and cheers.) But after all the learning and all the talent brought out by the protective societies, we see nothing done by them. If we could perceive that they did anything at their meetings besides reading long lectures to benefit the farmer, I should say they were really in earnest. If they drew up a report on agriculture and said, we have made the farmers on our estates our political tools; we have, by our legislation, placed them under great disadvantages; we make them pay high rents by holding out expectations that we know can never be realised; we make them improve the property for our benefit; and we compel them to preserve a species of vermin, which it is our sport to hunt and kill (hear, hear); and the result of such treatment and interference has been that the farms are badly cultivated, and the people badly supplied with food;—we recommend that all landlords in future should secure their tenants in their farms—that we will do it ourselves, and that vermin should be destroyed by the tenants; no doubt that in that case the learning of Liebig and Smith of Deanston would be soon turned to account, and be useful in developing the resources of agriculture. But while the protection people confine themselves to lecturing, and do nothing, they have no claim on confidence, nor have they any reason to call on us to wait the result of their improvement (Hear, hear.) But there is another reason why we should pause before we trust these upholders of monopoly. They say, give us a little time, and we shall be able to give you all you want; but unfortunately whenever food has been cheap and abundant, they were the only people that were annoyed at it, and discontented. (Hear, hear.) Last year, had you been in the House of Commons you would have heard what I now tell you confirmed; you would have seen a certain gentleman with a huge bundle of papers in his hand, speaking with much energy and firmness, hurling threats against the Treasury bench; and had any stranger entered at the time, and been told that the speaker was a member of the Society for the Protection of British Industry, he would have supposed him to be some great and philanthropic statesman propounding a scheme for raising the condition of the people; but how astonished would he have been when he found the bundle of papers consisted of prices current of almost every article of agricultural produce, animal and vegetable, and heard him quote the one after the other to show, by way of complaint, how much bacon was less per pound and flour was less per stone than he and his friends had been led to expect they would be when they assisted in bringing the present Government into power. (Hear, hear.) The prices in 1841 were brought forward and compared with the prices at the time—charges for breach of faith were made against the Minister, and threats of withdrawal of confidence heard. (Laughter and cheers.) The discussion on the occasion was what was termed in the House a practical debate; (hear, hear;) and it absorbed the interest and engaged the attention of the whole party who want time to produce cheaply. (Laughter.) He got the ear of the House, and it went forth that that was a bad night for the Government. This was an instance of a gentleman high in the confidence of and trusted by the party representing the agricultural interest occupying the House of Commons two hours and a half in complaining of the great fall that had occurred in the cost of the necessities of life. (Shame, shame.) Certainly that was an exhibition calculated to astonish those who look upon our constitution as characterised by intelligence and benevolence, and who consider the British legislature as remarkable for its Christian character. (Cheers.) The gentleman who brought this complaint forward is however a most respectable gentleman. He sits in Parliament as a country gentleman, and, besides doing his part in passing laws for 28,000,000 of people, he attends quarter sessions and officiates as a magistrate. For my part I rather like the simplicity with which he stated his views on the subject. There was no concealment or hypocrisy in the matter (hear), and as I think, he made a most valuable speech. Indeed it is impossible to overrate its importance. (Hear.) I was glad the other day to see that that speech had been spoken of even by one of the hon. gentleman's own party as a remarkable one. One gentleman was indignant at the indiscretion of his honourable friend, he meant Mr. Escott, who said a short time ago, that when he heard that speech of his honourable friend (Mr. Miles) he saw that the game of protection was up. (Hear, and a laugh.) And it is true the game of protection was up from the moment that speech was made; (a laugh;) listen to any of these gentlemen, or read their published opinions, you would not suppose that their object in supporting the Corn Laws was to make the necessities of life scarce and dear. It was well, therefore, that the indiscretion of one of the party let the cat out of the bag. A nobleman, of whom I do not wish to speak with disrespect, referring to his experience of the last session, said the Corn Laws were doomed—he meant detected. (Laughter.) I hope that noble lord is a prophet. Another gentleman, a captain in the navy, said, I have heard two things this year; I have heard that the population of the country is increasing at the rate of 1000 a day, and I see the object of protection is to make the necessities of life scarce and dear. (Hear, hear.) Why this is worse, said he, than the Chinese, for they do all they can to feed their people, and make food plentiful and cheap. And he goes down to his own country, and says, this will never do; the population is increasing at this enormous rate, and your system is not one to provide them with adequate subsistence. This statement, then, had a good effect upon the House. Shortly afterwards Lord John Russell thought it necessary to bring the condition of the working classes before the House. The working classes do not, said his lordship, keep pace with the increasing wealth of the country. The wealth increases rapidly, but the condition of the working classes has not increased in like proportion. Lord John Russell made a most able speech on that occasion, and referred to circumstances that had occurred during the last fifty years, by which the condition of the people had been affected, and he referred also to matters for which Parliament was responsible, and which they might remedy; but he came to no other conclusion than that what prevented the people from advancing in condition and comfort was those laws which make scarce necessities of life. (Hear.) He asked the House to take the matter into immediate consideration, and it was curious to see the manner in which the proposition was received by the Government. The price of food was then low, and the Government had to meet two things—they wanted to take credit to themselves for the prosperity which then existed, and at the same time keep well with their own friends. But that was a difficult task, because their friends wished food to be dear, and the Government had admitted that the prosperity existing depended on its being cheap. Sir J. Graham, who succeeded the noble lord, did not oppose the motion, but moved the previous question; but he admitted that the game of protection was up, and in his speech he made a clean sweep of all the rubbish that had been put forth in favour of protection, and a more clear and comprehensive argument against protection to maintain price no one ever heard. He stated the effect of the price of the necessities of life on the condition of the working-classes, and proved that when food had been abundant and cheap, the moral and physical condition of the people had improved. No speech delivered by any Free Trader could be more conclusive as to the advantages of the cheapness of the necessities of life than that of Sir James Graham, the Secretary of the Home Department. (Hear.) No one of the Government supporters, no one of the protection party, said one word in reply. The simple-minded gentleman to whom I have referred said not a word. He was content with having complained of cheapness and plenty; he did not deny the results on the social condition of the country. I had a motion on the paper on the very subject; but my friends advised me not to bring it on after the speech of Sir J. Graham. I had evidence from every part of the country showing that the people are more prosperous, happy, and moral when food is cheap than when it is dear. Ten days after I brought forward my motion for the repeal of those laws that exist only to make the necessities of life dear and scarce, and no answer was offered but that the people were then well off, there was plenty of employment, trade was brisk in every department, and it was asked, as the law has failed in its purpose, why disturb things as they exist? The Minister admitted that the law did not meet the objects for which it had been framed, but he said, why interfere with it at such a time of general prosperity? many voted in the minority who had not voted before determined to trifle with the country no longer. The Howards, the Cavendishes, the Fortescues, and Russells refused to be any longer parties to what was clearly exhibited in the course of the session to be either a fraud, practised on those who were said to be protected by this law, or an enormous injury to the community at large. (Cheers.) And I do believe, that if there was a public meeting in any part of the country, no high-minded men would be found to support a law so shabby in its purpose, and so dangerous and mischievous in its results (hear, hear); and I don't see how these people who are the real or pretended "friends of humanity" can countenance any longer a law which has been demonstrated beyond all question, by late exposures, to be a giant cause of misery. (Hear, hear, and cheers.) And it is on the ground of humanity I like to rest this law (loud cheers); yes, it is on the ground of its inflicting positive physical evil on those least able to bear it that I want to consider it. I don't underrate its commercial, political, or financial bearings. I have considered them all, and nothing is more complete than the arguments against the Corn Laws on these heads. The mischief and folly of a law which interrupts the commerce of the country by preventing food from being made a medium of exchange, cannot be equalled. And I don't believe there is any town in which the rights of capital and the interests of individual enterprise are more egregiously injured by commercial restrictions than in this very place. (Hear, hear, and loud cheers.) You are large exporters to countries where the produce of the soil is the only means of exchange, and you have your commerce limited, and the business of this great town interrupted, by an impertinent and violent interference with the rights of capital, of which the feudal or dark ages afford no more flagrant instance. (Loud cheers.) Again, I know nothing more important for you to consider than the bearing of the law on the financial condition of the country. When you see great works set on foot, it is in times when capital is abundant, and men find from the prosperity of trade its application in this direction profitable; but let there be anything like a scarcity of food, and a large abstraction of the national means to pay for it, we see that public works are stopped, and that confusion ensues, of which we have been so often the witnesses before. It is equally bad in a political point of view. It prevents that knitting together of nations in the bonds of mutual interest and amity which keep off the greatest curse—the infliction of war. What is the result of these restrictions as regards other nations? We are regarded as a nuisance throughout Europe. We are looked upon as foes everywhere when we might be revered as friends by all. (Cheers.) But at this moment I am calling your attention to the practical bearing of this law as a food question. There is now a deficiency of food. One great article of food is supposed to be lost, and there is great difficulty in obtaining food from any other country. The price of the necessities of life is rising everywhere. (Hear, hear.) It has now reached that point at which it was when, after a long duration, starving men broke into the shops of tradesmen and plundered them to get food. (Hear.) The price has now reached that point at which it was when the scenes of Paisley and Stockport were enacted—scenes to which Sir R. Peel said he could not refer without emotion (hear, hear), which sprung from that scarcity, and during which Sir J. Graham said crime, poverty, mortality, political discontent invariably pervaded the country. (Loud cheers.) The price has now reached that point at which it was when the revenue declined—when the imposition of the Income-tax was found necessary; and when the public works, commenced under more favourable auspices, were checked. There is a prospect of the recurrence of such a state of things. (Hear, hear.) There is no confidence to be placed in the apparent prosperity of the country. In 1838 everything appeared as healthy and sound as possible. It was in that year that I implored the House to take the Corn Laws into their consideration, warning them that the career of prosperity might be stopped by the failure of a harvest. In May they rejected my motion by an overwhelming majority, and in the Sept. following the whole country was alarmed by a deficient harvest. (Hear, hear.) We have now many of the signs of that year; the same results may again recur. I say, then, when was there any political question submitted to an intelligent community more ripe for decision? When were the people more strongly called on to urge the Government to provide for these prospects of the country? (Cheers.) Gentlemen, Government have decided on nothing; they wait for you to suggest what their decision shall be. (Hear, hear.) There never, in my opinion, was a time when the people of this country were more called on to speak out. I was convinced that it would be a libel on that character which you have honourably acquired, if at such a time you were found lagging behind the rest of the community, and that you would by your silence give evidence of wanting public spirit. In a cause of justice and humanity you would be never found wanting, and I am sure that you would not descend to notice the humble efforts of an individual like myself if you did not intend to rise up yourselves and accomplish the work. (Cheers.) Gladden the hearts then, cheer the courage of millions by calling on Government to strike down at once and abolish for ever their selfish and mischievous obstacle to the supply of food for the people. (Loud cheers.) And if ministers should resist that appeal, or Parliament should sanction their refusal, call on them to put the electors on their trial, and try whether they are the proper depositories of power, or faithful guardians of the interests of those unenfranchised millions who earn their bread by the sweat of their brow. (Loud and continued cheering, which lasted for some time.)

The CHAIRMAN: You have seen something of the qualities of the men by whom your interests are advocated in the House of Commons, and Mr. Villiers referred to the many noble and honourable names found supporting his motion. Mr. Villiers told us also that this question must be settled by the Legislature. We must not forget that the Legislature consists of two Houses—the Lords as well as the Commons; and let us not forget that, in the former, there are amongst the first of the nobility our most able and intelligent advocates. There are men in that House who would not degrade themselves by being parties to a species of legislation described as a fraud in those who sanctioned, and an enormous wrong inflicted on those who were the objects of it. I am now going to propose the health of a nobleman equally distinguished for his station and talents, as well as for the energy with which he carries out everything that has reference to the improvement of agriculture in connection with the interests of commerce and manufactures. (Cheers.) There is a nobleman amongst us this day who takes a pride and pleasure in showing that his interest is not confined to agriculture, but by his presence at this commercial assembly he gives a proof how anxious he is to see manufactures and agriculture flourish together. (Great cheering.) I give you, Earl Ducie, and those noble lords who advocate the principles of commercial freedom. (Loud cheering for some time.)

The EARL DUCIE rose and said: I can hardly express to you the gratitude I feel for your very kind reception, and the more so, as I find from the authentic accounts of proceedings in another place, a similar honour was refused me. I need hardly say that it was not at a meeting of free traders I was so treated. You have associated my name with those of other peers who are sincere and zealous advocates of the repeal of the corn-laws. I am the least of those advocates (no, no); but I must say that though we have not been so active as Messrs. Villiers, Cobden, and Bright, we have used good judgment in the course we have taken. It is not the cue of ministers in the upper house to declare themselves "friends of free trade" in the abstract. (Hear, hear, and a laugh.) Were we to press the subject, we might call forth some dogged dictum from the Duke of Wellington which might inspire our opponents, and strengthen their opposition; whereas, all who know the House of Lords are sufficiently aware that it will go with the times. (Hear, hear, and laughter.) On occasions of this kind I have generally said a few words as to the bearing of the corn-laws on agriculture, but that part of the subject has been taken out of my hands. A little pamphlet, published by Messrs. Trimmer and Morton, practical agriculturists, has quite superseded any observation I could make. They looked on the corn-laws in a debtor and creditor point of view. They took different farms in different soils, and they showed what their owners gained by protection, and what they lost. They proved to demonstration that protection only injures small farms, and that the only farmers who gained by it, are those who you might have least expected, dairy farmers. The first time I received that book, I was a little staggered by the facts which it adduced; but having read and considered it several times, I am now quite satisfied that it underpins, rather than overprints, the real state of the case. (Cheers.) Now, as I know a great many willing and anxious to see a repeal of the corn-laws, and to secure full commercial freedom, who have some lingering doubts as to whether their agricultural friends may not suffer in some way or other from such an event, I recommend all such persons to lay out a shilling in the purchase of the pamphlet, and to read it carefully through. (Hear, hear.) I have said that the only persons who were proved to gain by protection were the dairy farmers, and they did so by the non-employment of labour. Now, if protection only benefited those who employed little or no labour, it was a curse, for it would be far better that such ground was turned into arable, to feed our population, and employ the thousands of agricultural labourers who were now not adequately paid. (Hear, hear, hear.) I know that to the deductions in that pamphlet our opponents make the objection that the protection supposed applies only to the charge for labour, and that the price of labour is regulated by supply and demand. The law of wages, like every other law, is supposed to work within wise, regulated, and well-defined limits; and wages will adjust themselves to supply and demand when other circumstances do not prevent that law from working properly. There is no price of labour so purely dependant on supply and demand as that of the manufacturers, but the law there works within limits strictly defined. If the demand raises wages beyond the market price of the work, the manufacturer will soon cease to export; and so on the other hand, if the supply reduces the wages to a starving point, dying men cannot work, and so there is a limit to the operation of the law in that way. But as to the agricultural labourer, the case is totally different. The supply has long exceeded the demand. I speak particularly of the southern districts of England, where the population is not drawn off to such towns as this. And if that law had been strictly acted upon in such places, the labourers would have come to the starving point long since, instead of being kept up, as they are, to the bare existence point. (Hear, hear.) Therefore I think the pamphlet quite correct in saying that the wages of the labourer are to a certain degree dependant on the protection to food. If there had not been a law to say that the land should support its own poor, they must have starved; but wages were given them to keep them out of the workhouse. There is another kind of labour, as to which the law of supply and demand acts to a great extent. But these labourers cannot be brought down to the starving point, for they require a good and full supply of food to bear up against the waste of such arduous labour. My friend Mr. Cobden asked at Manchester, the other day, if those holding railway property considered how much they lost by the high price of food. Now, as there is hardly any one who has not shares either in lines in the course of formation or in prospective lines, I should like to know, have those parties ever considered what they are likely to lose by protection, as it affects such speculations? The ten per cent. deposited on the estimated or real cost of railways was almost equalled by the sum paid for protection. (Hear, hear.) That was an important fact, and it was one which he could with very great ease prove to demonstration. A great deal had been said of late with respect to the opening of the ports; but they could not expect a government which had scarcely any strict political principles (cheers)—a government which existed by a sort of hermaphrodite support (cheers and laughter), would have any such strong or devoted sympathy with the people, and such a desire to prevent want in this country. (Hear.) There was not less venom in the snake because a few of his joints rattled discordantly—nor was there less danger as regarded the corn laws, because Lord Ashley, or Mr. Miles, or Captain Rous sung a somewhat different tune from the government. (Hear.) The question of the corn laws was at present in a peculiar state, for in consequence of the existing state of circumstances—in consequence of a deficiency in the harvest, the advocates of the abolition of the corn-laws had now an opportunity of showing to the country practically, that which they formerly demonstrated theoretically—namely, that a great amount of suffering on the part of the people arose from the corn laws (hear, hear), the effect of which was to increase the price of bread, and that an attempt to persuade a labouring man that such a law would not affect him in that manner, was, in fact, to attempt to cheat him into the idea that he had a full belly when he had not. (Cheers.) The friends of the League in Parliament had done everything which could be expected from them; they had one by one destroyed all the arguments of those who were opposed to them, and had demonstrated the injurious tendency of the corn laws. Mr. Villiers and his coadjutors had nobly done their duty in Parliament, and it now remained for the people of England to rise and express their opinions with regard to their sufferings from this law—to express their opinions not in an isolated movement in one place now, and in another place at a different period, but simultaneously to rise and appeal boldly to the Parliament and to the government, and say that they were resolved no longer to be trifled with. (Immense cheering.) If the people took that course, they might depend upon it that the assembling of the next Parliament would be the precursor of the end of a law which was a curse to the consumer and to the agriculturists, a delusion, and, he might add, a snare. (Loud cheering.)

The Mayor said that the next toast which he had to propose was one with respect to which he should not feel it necessary to address any lengthened observations to them. He would call on them to fill a bumper, whilst he proposed to them "The health of Richard Cobden, Esq., M.P."

The toast was received with thunders of acclamation, which having subsided,

Mr. Cobden rose and said—Mr. Mayor and gentlemen, I feel deeply indebted to you for the kind and warm manner in which you have received the announcement of my name, and I may add that I am truly encouraged and gratified by the aspect of the meeting, and the numbers which have assembled here this evening. (Cheers.) The greatest gratification next to that which I received from the manner in which the electors of Wolverhampton returned my friend, Mr. Villiers, to Parliament, is that such a tribute has been paid to him by the men of Birmingham on this occasion,—because it will put into his hands additional weapons in the House of Commons, which I am sure he will use right manfully for the common benefit of us all. (Loud cheers.) I did not come here for the purpose of making an argumentative speech on the subject of commercial freedom, for all now are made aware, from experience of the results, how injuriously the restriction of commercial freedom acts, and the poorest and least informed can see that those consequences which were predicted from the existing system are approaching. (Hear, hear.) We are now near a state of famine, and this, as my friend (Mr. Villiers) has already stated, is one of the results which were frequently predicted as to be expected from the law which prevented the importation of corn. It was a prediction which had been made by every enlightened speaker and writer on the subject, from the time of Lord Grenville's protest in the House of Lords in 1815, down to the last pamphlet which had been written in relation to the question. (Hear, hear.) We have to expect from time to time, amidst occasional gleams of happiness and prosperity, such seasons of gloom as that which we now witness in consequence of the operations of the corn-law, for that is its necessary result (hear, hear). A consequence, which has been well described by my friend Colonel Thompson, that veteran champion of free trade (cheers), in one of those graphic comparisons for which he is so remarkable, when he said the country, under the influence of the law, was like a bird fastened with a spiral spring—it might wing its way aloft for a short time, but only to be again inevitably drawn back to where it ascended from (hear, hear, and cheers). What, then, is to be done? It seems that we have been deluding ourselves, when we thought that the government was going to do something. We, it seems, have not a government such as several continental nations enjoy. Are you not exceedingly gratified that you are not deemed worthy of as good treatment at the hands of your government as the Russians, Turks, and Dutch receive from theirs? When these governments find that there is likely to be a scarcity, they do that which common sense would dictate to any one; which any community, out of Bedlam, would do at once, if left to their own unbiassed judgment. Seeing that there was a prospect of an insufficient supply of food at home, they opened wide their ports, to admit the needed supply from any part of the world from which it might come (cheers). This was precisely what we expected from our rational government (hear, hear, hear). What have thirteen certain noblemen and gentlemen been lately meeting in Cabinet Council to discuss? I wish I had the names of the thirteen notables, for they would be historic curiosities to be handed down to posterity (hear, hear). What have they been deliberating upon? Was it whether they, from their own rents and revenues, should make a large purchase of grain or potatoes abroad, in order to supply the wants of the people at home (hear, hear)? Was it whether they should vote a subsidy out of the public taxes, with which to buy food for a starving people? It was none of these. The difficulty upon which they solemnly deliberated was this—whether they should allow the people of this country to feed themselves?—and it seems they have decided that they shan't (hear, hear). Rumours reach you—we cannot tell you how well founded—that there is in the cabinet a division on this matter. You are told that Sir Robert Peel and Sir James Graham have ranged themselves on the one side, and the Duke of Wellington and Lord Stanley on the other—that they are thus at variance with one another on this question, and that the duke and his party have decided that you, the people of England, shall not be allowed to feed yourselves (cheers). Now this is the question on which we are at issue with these mighty personages. If I mistake not, you have tried the metal of the noble warrior before in Birmingham (cheers and laughter). He is a man whom we all like to honour, as possessing those qualities which entitle men to our esteem wherever possessed—high courage, firmness of resolve, and indomitable perseverance. But let me remind the noble duke that notwithstanding his victories on the field, he never yet entered into a contest with Englishmen in which he was not beaten (loud and prolonged cheers). I say we shall feed ourselves (loud cheering). And now, that this battle must and shall be fought, I hope the veteran duke will live long enough to test the quality of his countymen again (renewed cheering). But, after all, it is not the duke who is the Government—it is Sir R. Peel. We hear in the House of Commons, in the rainy days of prosperity, when Peel brings forward his measures, and dictates to his servile colleagues what his policy shall be, the little word "I," repeated over and over again, reminding us that "I, as premier, act upon my own responsibility"—that "I" do this, and "I" do that. If he is the prime minister, we hold him responsible for his acts (cheers). Now, I see many attempts made to shirk that responsibility, and sometimes in a very shabby manner, by trying to make it appear that we who cry out against this responsibility mean to do him some personal violence (cheers and laughter). Was ever such a school-boy trick as that resorted to by a man in his situation (cheers)? He is fairly ashamed of it now, as are all who sit behind him, and who faithfully supported him in it. But we find the newspapers still dealing with this hypocritical and absurd argument. Why, for my own part, I would not touch a hair of his head, were he ever so much in my power (cheers.) But what is the meaning of this responsibility on the part of a minister? The Queen, with us, is not responsible. If we were governed by a Czar, or by a Grand Turk, we would then hold the sovereign responsible. In a system of constitutional government like ours, however, it is the minister alone who is responsible (hear, hear). None but the Queen can issue an order in council for the opening of the ports, and the Queen would have done this long ago but that she has to wait until Sir Robert Peel chooses to inform her that the cabinet have consented to her doing so (hear.) We, then, as loyal subjects, are only pursuing a constitutional course when we bring him to the bar of public opinion, and declare him responsible for the acts of the government (hear, hear, hear). We are told, to be sure, by those who still put forth their daily nonsense in defence of monopoly, that to admit foreign corn is not to hit the right way, by which the present difficulties can be surmounted. Instead of enlarging the supply of food, we are told that certain great public works are to be undertaken. Railroads are to be constructed, and lands to be drained in Ireland, and the fisheries are to be promoted, and all these devices are to be carried through by the instrumentality of the public purse. Any thing will be done but the right thing (cheers.) That reminds me of the old story of the man who had a horse, which was in the last stage of decline, for want of sufficient nourishment, and who told his friend that the horse would not thrive, although he had given him old shoes, chips, and even oyster shells (laughter.) His friend replied to him, "Suppose you try corn" (cheers and laughter.) Now we say to those gentlemen who want to feed the people with pickaxes, shovels, fishing nets, and draining tiles, "Suppose you try a little corn" (renewed cheers and laughter.) You, who do not sit in the House of Commons, would be astonished how reluctantly we bring our opponents' noses to the corn crib (cheers and laughter). Now mark me. Be prepared in the present emergency, and constantly on your guard. There will be an effort made to extract some enormous jobbery out of the anticipated famine (hear, hear.) The landlords in Ireland have not cultivated their lands, their bogs, and wastes as they should have done, and now they will get the government to do it for them out of the public taxes, of all which, of course, they will reap the benefit (hear, hear.) Now, be on your guard. I have no objection, after everything else which should first be resorted to has been done—after the ports have been thrown open, without let or hindrance, if charity is to be administered to the Irish people, that it should rather be bestowed in the shape of payment of wages than as eleemosynary grants (hear, hear). I read in the papers of to-day the speech of the King of Belgium to the Chambers in that country, in which he congratulated them that they have opened the ports for the admission of foreign corn, and that being done, they are enabled, by a vote of public money, to execute certain public works, to make up for the deficiency in employment, and thereby supply the people with food. In Belgium, you see, they do not expect to feed their people with mere pickaxes and shovels. They first let in the needed supply, of foreign corn, and then, by supplying funds for the execution of public works, provide the people with the means of feeding themselves without resorting to charity (hear, hear.) Was ever a people so insulted as are the English people by the arguments of the monopolists? What is our present dilemma? It is neither more nor less than the want of food. Now what do people work for? Not for work itself certainly, but for the food which they are enabled to procure by it (hear, hear). The monopolist writers think, or so pretend, that it is work that is wanted at present. Now work is never wanted but as a means of getting something out of it (hear, hear). We have the highest authority—that of sacred writ itself, for considering work a curse, but a curse which is mercifully sweetened by the rewards of labour. (Hear, hear.) But where are the rewards to come from if there is an insufficient supply of food to meet the wants of the people. The Irish are about to suffer from a famine. It will not confine its effects to those who can work upon railroads, but will also, in all probability, affect every man, woman, and child scattered over the face of that country, and with the exception of the wealthy portion of the population, the mass of the inhabitants of towns. Those able to work, and those not able, will equally suffer. (Hear, hear.) Are these the people into whose hands, with your supply of food manifestly deficient, you can put pick-axes and shovels, and expect them to work, without holding out to them the prospect of receiving the ample and legitimate reward of labour? (Hear, hear.) What happened in the spring of 1822, I am afraid, is very likely to happen again. Mark my words, and I speak them in sorrow, that next spring will develop the calamitous result of our present suicidal policy. It was only in the spring after the harvest of 1821 that the evil, to which I have just alluded, was felt. In the spring of 1822, when the country people had eaten up the potatoes which were left them, they flocked in crowds to the towns for subsistence, for it is in towns that you find ample supplies of food generally accumulated, and in the towns the starving masses had to be fed from the charity of their fellow-countrymen. Depend upon it you will have to feed large masses of the people of Ireland, in a like manner, out of a public fund, before midsummer. But where is the subsistence to come from which you are to administer to them? It is not in this country, and must be procured elsewhere. (Hear, hear, hear.) But does it not behove the minister of the Crown to see, in the present emergency, that not a moment is lost in accumulating in this country such a stock of food, as may not be procurable next spring, when famine presses heavily upon us, for less than double the price which, some time ago, we would have been called upon to pay for it? (Hear, hear, and cheers?) Mark how our present rulers are tampering with the existing alarming condition of the country (hear, hear). You behold the organs of the government giving vent to statements, the object of which is to induce us to believe that the evil does not exist to the extent which has been assigned to it. Is there, then, a deep-laid conspiracy on the part of any one to lead us falsely into the anticipation of evils which there is no real ground to apprehend? That cannot be. Have we not seen that solemn masses have been offered up in Roman Catholic chapels, beseeching the Disposer of all Events that he would graciously avert the impending calamity. (Hear, hear)? Did we not see in yesterday's paper, that the Primate and bishops of Ireland had ordered prayers to be offered up, to arrest, if possible, the progress of the threatened evil? (Hear, hear, hear). Have we not had boards of guardians, on more occasions than one, memorialising government to do what they could to moderate the severity of the apprehended famine? (hear, hear). If all this be so, can it, then, be possible that any person or persons have harboured a wide and diabolical conspiracy, for the purpose of trifling with the most sacred feelings of humanity, or is the statement of the evil a lamentable and incontrovertible fact? (Hear, hear). That statement is unfortunately but too melancholy a truth, and yet the government is tampering with this most critical juncture of our national welfare, and leads us to infer that it is prepared to do nothing. (Hear, hear). Well, then, as Mr. Villiers and Earl Ducie have well advised you, it is high time for the people to speak out. There have been scarcely any demonstrations as yet in the country in favour of the immediate opening of the ports. And why? Because every one expected that every successive mail from London would carry to him the welcome decision of the Cabinet that the ports had been already opened. People did not choose to waste their strength and their energies in preparing for a demonstration, which was to take place at the end of a week's time, in favour of an object which they thought would be accomplished every twenty-four hours. (Hear, hear). It now behoves the people of every town to meet, as the people of Manchester are going to meet—(great cheering)—and throw upon the government the whole responsibility of the present state of things, and call upon them immediately to open the ports; and when once opened, they will never be shut again. (Cheering.) That is the true reason why the ports have not already been opened. If there had been no Anti-Corn-law League, they would have been opened a month ago. (Cheers.) It is because they know well in the Cabinet, and because the landlords also well know, that the question of total and immediate repeal of the corn-laws is at stake, that they will risk, like desperate gamblers all that may befall us during the next six months, rather than part with that law. Well, if they won't open the ports, somebody must make them. Why, you will be the laughing-stock of all Christendom if you do not make them; only think of the Dutchman—think of Mynheer whilst smoking his pipe, and seeing the ships coming in from America laden with corn for him. How he will laugh at your stupidity when he sees Englishmen starving, while Dutchmen are well fed. (Hear, hear, hear). We are not sunk quite so low as that yet. (Cheers.) But for Sir Robert Peel, what a critical moment in his fortune has now past. I say past, for let him do the act at the end of this month, which he ought to have done ten days ago, still he will not be the same man that he would have been had he done it then. There is not even a child in statesmanship that could not have then told Sir Robert Peel, "Now is the critical period of your political fortune—this is the tide of your political life; if you take it at its flood, you go on to such a fortune as no statesman ever attained in this country before; but if you miss it—if you allow the flood to pass by you—you will prove to the world that you have been all your life a pretender and a mere hoax on the credulity of your countrymen. (Great cheering). We have all been thinking for some time past that Peel was the man—not the coming man—but the come man. (A laugh). Everybody began to say, Peel is the man for a practical statesman, to govern a practical people, and I have no hesitation in saying, that if Sir R. Peel had taken the course I have suggested, of boldly hearing the Iron Duke (a laugh), and at once dismissing him and his tail from the Cabinet—I have no hesitation in saying, so far as Lancashire and Yorkshire are concerned, he would have rallied around him the whole of the mighty population of those counties as one man in his support. We should have buried Whig or Tory from the moment we found Sir Robert Peel had abolished the corn-laws. (Hear, hear). There would have been a union of all men and all classes in those districts in support of the man who had the courage and the honesty to put an end to this atrocious and long-continued injustice. But he has not done it, and I venture to prophesy that he won't do it. Somebody else will have to do it, and we are not yet so badly off in England but that we may find somebody willing and able to do the will of the country whenever it is unmistakingly expressed. (Cheers). We are told that it would be useless to pass a law to admit foreign corn, for there is none to come in. Then, what was the Cabinet been deliberating about so long? (Hear, and a laugh). If there was no corn to come in, why did the Government hold four or five Cabinet councils to decide whether it should come in or not? (Hear). Some of the protectionists tell us, that even if our supply is deficient, the remedy is not to look to foreign countries, but to our native products. But that is not the rule they follow in anything else but corn. I heard not long ago Mr. Gladstone expound, most eloquently, the great importance of permitting the free admission of foreign lard, flax, hides, and many other things, as being necessary as the raw materials for our manufactures. Though flax is grown in England, though we produce hides and make lard, these are admitted from abroad, but with regard to corn, the argument is, that we are not to look to foreign countries for an increased or supplementary supply of that article. (Shame, shame). And so it is. It is the corn question upon which the mighty struggle will be after all. And I will whisper in your ear the reason why;—corn is the article upon which rents are fixed, and by which tithes are regulated. Do not deceive yourselves and suppose you will get a free admission of foreign corn—that is, wheat—except after a considerable struggle. They do not mind so much about Indian corn. Lord Sandon the other day wrote from Liverpool that he has no objection to Indian corn coming in. And why? It does not regulate tithes or operate on fixed rents in this country. My noble friend (Lord Ducie) was quite right when he said that the landowner might do as well without corn-laws as with them, and the farmer and farm labourer much better. But, unfortunately, everybody in the same position is not up to the light of my noble friend. The squire and landowner in general think differently from my noble friend, and they actually hiss him at their agricultural meetings. (Cries of "shame, shame.") I tell this as a specimen of their intelligence. But they only act according to their own convictions and their own ignorant prejudice. (Hear, hear.) And here let me remind you, that this country is governed by the ignorance of the country. And I do not say this without proof; for amongst those members of the majority of the House of Commons who uphold the corn-law protective principle, there is not a man of anything like average intellect who dares to speak in their favour. You cannot appeal to a single statesman that deserves a moment's regard as such, who has uttered anything like an authoritative dictum in their favour. (Hear, hear.) There is no single writer of eminence who has not repudiated the doctrines of the monopolists. They are condemned alike by all the intelligence of this and of past ages (hear, hear), and yet they rule this country at this time with more tyranny than even the Grand Turk himself governs with. (Cheers.) These people, though possessing no intelligence themselves, yet find people to do their work for them. They will find Sir R. Peel to do it, and that against his own conscientious convictions; for there can be no doubt that Sir R. Peel is at heart as good a free-trader as I am myself. He has told us so in the House of Commons again and again; nor do I doubt that Sir R. Peel has in his inmost heart the desire to be the man who shall carry out the principles of free trade in this country. (Hear, hear). But he has been tampering with the question in order to adapt his policy to the ignorance of his party, and we see the state into which the country has been brought the while. (Hear, hear.) We have, however, one consolation, we have run the fox to earth at last, and know he cannot double on us again. (Much cheering.) The question cannot be dealt with in another session, as it has been when the country has been blessed with her abundant crops, and when trade was good, and the people all employed. If you had seen the jaunty airs Sir Robert Peel gave himself when we talked of free trade in past sessions, you would have been amused if not astonished. (Hear, and laughter.) But that is all at an end now, and next session we shall have him fairly pinned (cheers and renewed laughter), and he knows it too. And I can tell you that if there is one man who will go up to Parliament next session with a heavier heart than another, that man is Sir Robert Peel. (Hear, hear.) It is my belief that if in the meantime he does not take the step of throwing open the ports, he will not dare to face us at all next session. (Hear.) Of this I am quite sure, that if the leading members of the opposition, in another session, take the position they ought to take—in the van of the people (hear); and, having the people at their back, stand boldly forth as the advocates of those sound principles we are met here to support—and will show themselves ready and determined to apply them as fairly, as effectually, and as permanently as my honourable friend, Mr. Villiers would, and Sir Robert Peel takes his place in Parliament without first opening the ports, I undertake to say that they will shake him out of office in a week (general cheering). But I do not like, altogether, the idea of giving Peel up. He is a Lancashire man (hear, hear)—and in my part of the country we are proud of Lancashire men. We used to think that Sir Robert cast a sheep's eye on the tall chimneys, and that he had something of a lingering kindness for Lancashire; and I can tell him it would have been a proud day for the Lancashire men, when they saw a Lancashire man, and the son of a Lancashire manufacturer, stand forward to rescue the commerce of the country from the shackles of that feudal and senseless oppression it has so long laboured under (cheers). I must not forget that I am charged with a message from Lancashire to you. You have already heard what we have done by our twelve months' labour at the registration. We have secured that county for the free-traders; and you have also heard what we have done in the neighbouring northern counties with their constituencies of 70,000 or 80,000—constituencies greater than those of all the counties south of Middlesex put together. We sent Mr. Hickin to Staffordshire to attend the last revision—he followed the barrister to every court; and the result is we have gained between 1000 and 2000 votes (cheers). The expense of this proceeding has been paid by the League out of its funds, and when we asked you to contribute your money to the League, it was with the view of spending it in the same way for your benefit. I believe South Staffordshire is safe at the next election for two free traders. But we must not rest there—we must do the same in other counties. In South Lancashire we have put such a majority of free traders on the registry, that, unless I am much mistaken, our opponents will not dare to contest another election with us (loud cheers). I say every man in Birmingham who can afford it must buy a 40s. freehold, and so qualify himself to vote for South Staffordshire. In Manchester we say to every man who has a good coat on his back—"You must buy a freehold and qualify for the county." But you have a county nearer here—you are partly in North Warwickshire, as well as Coventry; and if you qualify, what is to prevent your returning two free traders for that place at the next election (hear, hear)? Shame on you if you doubt it (hear)! Think of the beauty of the 40s. freehold! Why, it is the best part of the Reform Bill—it is an inheritance handed down to us from our ancestors 500 years ago. A man for £50 can buy one of these freeholds, and place himself, as regards the county franchise, upon an equality with the squire who has an estate of £5000 a-year (hear, hear). The landowners have multiplied their £50 tenants-at-will, and, do what they will, they cannot stretch out their land like Indian rubber, but you can make every cobbler's stall, every butcher's shambles, every stable, the means of conferring the franchise, and placing its owner on an equality with the man who holds an estate of £50,000 a-year. I say, too, if you choose you can ensure the return of two free traders for Worcestershire. Worcester must also be won. There was a desultory effort made to gain North Warwickshire the other day, which ended disgracefully, and which showed the necessity of some local organisation. 'Tis votes, not meetings, that persuade Sir Robert Peel (hear, hear). In Staffordshire the revising barrister acknowledged that the League had purged the registry of an immense number of fictitious votes. The finger of scorn should be pointed at any of the middle classes in the northern towns who did not become co-electors. The man is not fit to be a freeman who, when he could afford it, refuses to pay £50 for the franchise (hear, hear, hear). Having qualified every man you can, you must proceed to a systematic purging of the registers. Many silly persons object to this as disfranchising the people; but if our opponents strike off our votes, are theirs to remain untouched (no, no)? We should be in such a position as to be able to tell the government, "You must give up the corn laws or give up a good deal more" (hear, hear, and cheers). The aristocracy of this country have the army, the navy, the colonies, and a large amount of expenditure at their disposal. 'Tis a perfect paradise for the aristocracy in this country, if they knew only how to behave themselves! (much laughter)—not as angels, but as decent, honest, rational men (renewed laughter). Whom have they to govern? Practical, industrious, intelligent men, whose thoughts centred in their business, and who would gladly leave to those above them the toil of government, if those were willing to allow commerce and industry fair play (hear, hear, and cheers). What a people for an aristocracy to govern! And yet they risk all for the sake of a miserable tax on bread, which is of no earthly benefit even to themselves (cheers). Be prepared for a crisis as to this law, which may come on even before the next dissolution. You will see by the swaying of parties, and the general agitation of the public mind in the next session, that some great change is approaching; and when you discover these symptoms, don't mind who goes out or in, but keep your eyes steadily fixed on this corn question; and when the crisis does come, let the multitudinous numbers of Lancashire, Yorkshire, and Staffordshire, be prepared to act with united strength against the vile fabric of monopoly, over which, when levelled with the earth, will be driven the ploughshare of peace, that prosperity may arise out of its ruins (loud and long continued cheering).

The CHAIRMAN next proposed Mr. Bright, who, as one of the people, had done good service to the people's cause in the House of Commons.

Mr. BRIGHT was received with most enthusiastic cheering, but the lateness of the hour rendered it impossible for the reporter to remain longer in the Hall, and we are consequently unable to give even an outline of his address.

We understand several very eloquent speeches were delivered in the course of the evening, by W. J. Fox, Esq., Colonel Thompson, W. Brown, Esq., of Liverpool, and other gentlemen; and that after a most enthusiastic meeting, the large assembly broke up at a late hour.

MEETING OF THE COUNTY OF LANARK POTATO DISEASE.

The Duke of Hamilton, as lord-lieutenant of the county of Lanark, called together the fresholders to take into consideration the alarming disease in the potato-crop, causing a deficiency of food for the labouring classes and the poor. This meeting was held on the 7th of November, and was attended not only by the gentlemen usually present at such meetings, but by a number of practical farmers. Circulars, requesting information on the subject, had been previously sent to the leading farmers in the county, and to the ministers of the several parishes. From the results of the returns to these queries, which had been carefully tabulated, it appeared:

"That, taking the entire county, the potatoes have been affected to the extent of about one half; and it was stated by Mr. Marr, that the statements given in as to whether the disease was progressing or not progressing, were 22 for progression against two or three for non-progression. As a specimen of the answers given by the farmers, we may observe that from the extensive parish of Avondale, there were returns from 13 farms, and that the estimates of the extent of the potato disease on each were respectively as follow:—One-half, one-fourth, three-fourths, one-half, one-third, one-half, one-third, one-half, one-half, one-half, one-half, three-fourths, one-half. From each of these farms the report was, that the disease was progressive; and generally speaking, no remedy was suggested. From Lord Douglas's farm, managed by Mr. Rutherford, the return was, that nearly three-fourths were affected; from the parish of Bothwell, the potatoes on two farms were one-half affected, and on one farm three-fourths. From the parish of Carluke, one-half were reported as affected."

Some discussion took place on the resolutions proposed for bringing these facts under the consideration of her Majesty's Government, in the course of which the Hon. Major Cochrane made some remarks, to which we beg leave to direct the attention of our readers as illustrations of protectionist policy and humanity:

"The Hon. Major Cochrane was opposed to opening the ports: the farmers had suffered already the loss of their potatoes; and it would be too much to throw wholly on them the burden of supporting the whole suffering population. There was no deficiency in the grain crop at home, though it might not be of superior quality; and the opening of the ports would lower the price, but do no good. The Irish had neither credit nor money to purchase grain, and the proper way was to supply them with provisions out of the revenue from grain imported. The resolution would lead the Government to believe that the county of Lanark wished the ports open. If they did so, their tenants ought then to be entitled to throw up their leases."

For the sufferings of the people of Scotland, from the apprehended scarcity, Major Cochrane expressed neither sympathy nor compassion. All his tenderness and charity were reserved for the Irish. In the system of humanity devised by the protectionists, "tis distance lends enchantment to the view." The opening of the ports he declares "would lower prices but do no good." Why, the evil of which the nation complains, is the great rise in prices, greater far in reality than it is in appearance. The extravagant price of sound prime wheat which is wanting to mix with the inferior grain of the present harvest, is the cause of the cry for opening the ports. We believe that such a measure would ultimately benefit the protectionists themselves by creating a regular demand for their inferior grain. But, having resolved that the opening of the ports should be resisted, the gallant major has a pet remedy of his own, which is simply that the people should be still taxed for the benefit of the monopolists, and that the fractional dribble of this tax derived from the admission of foreign corn should be given to the poor, that with this pittance they may further enhance the profits of the monopolists by buying their taxed bread. Here is a plain proposition for establishing a trade in scarcity and fixing profit by famine. CORN IS TO BE TAXED THAT MONOPOLISTS MAY OBTAIN FAMINE-PRICES, and pocket the amount of duty in addition to the high price of scarcity; and when the landlords are thus secured, THE PEOPLE ARE TO BE FED BY A TAX LEVIED ON THEIR OWN MISERY, the amount of which will be graduated precisely by the amount of distress. This is a most instructive revelation of monopolist policy; it is a declaration that the protectionists are resolved to grasp their own unhallowed gains at all hazards, no matter what may be the sufferings of the country, and that they will insist on the miserable raising from their distress means of succour for misery. The heartlessness of such a proposition is as revolting as its absurdity is palpable; it is stamped with condemnation the instant that it is named.

We have great pleasure in turning from this disgraceful exhibition of sordid selfishness to the manly and honourable reply of the chairman, Lord Belhaven:

"Lord Belhaven was afraid that if they went into the question of opening the ports, it would lead them into a lengthy discussion. He was one of those not in the least apprehensive about seeing the ports open at any time, or under any circumstances. (Hear.) And he might mention, for the comfort of his friend Major Cochrane, what had lately happened in his own (Lord Belhaven's) case. A deputation from his tenants waited on him and stated that they were quite willing to give up, as tenants, all protection of every kind. He asked them if they would in that case seek to be allowed to give up their leases, when they said "no," as they were satisfied that the corn and provision laws did more harm than good. (Hear.) This was just one instance showing that farmers were beginning to see that protection was valueless to them. He had to apologise for entering upon this subject, and he certainly would not have done it but for the remarks of his friend Major Cochrane. He thought it was better, seeing there was a great variety of opinion among them upon this point, and that there was no possible chance of agreeing in regard to it, that a discussion should be avoided; while they must be agreed upon this, that any thing was better than to see the people want food. (Hear, hear.) With respect to the potatoes, they must take into account that the first thing was to secure seed for another season. The quantity of potatoes going out of the country was immense; and he could state the demand for rice was so great that the price had been doubled within these three months, and the larger proportion of it taken to Belgium. He must say that he did not think it likely they would be inundated with grain from the Continent; but on this subject he did not wish to enter, as it was quite impossible they could all agree upon it. But, considering that in the county of Lanark the greatest mass of population in Scotland existed, and that they had no means within the county of feeding one-tenth part of that population, they should be the first to take steps for averting such a state of matters, by endeavouring to get food from other places. The county of Lanark was more deeply interested in this matter than any other; they were more dependent on foreign supply than any other part of Scotland; and they should, therefore, be the first to take measures for averting any calamity that might threaten them. No gentleman could deny that they ran great hazard of having a shortness of food. He admitted that the corn crop, in point of quantity, was a fair one, though inferior in quality, but the question arose, how far would the grain crops go to feed the people? He had seen calculations made in regard to the consumption of potatoes as an article of food; and from these it was ascertained, that in Ireland potatoes formed one-half of the food of the people, while in Scotland it was one-third. These calculations, it was well known, came from people who had the best sources of information; and, taking them as correct—for they could not be denied—he asked, what was to become of their grain food?"

It is honourable to the intelligence of Lord Belhaven's tenantry that they should thus denounce the delusion of protection; it is equally honourable to him that he met them with equal candour and sound sense. But we shall not now discuss the general question; it is of more importance to examine the monopolist remedy for the present crisis. The Hon. Major Cochrane gave a further exposition of his views.

"Major Cochrane said, perhaps her Majesty's ministers might not be inclined to open the ports—for that was what was pointed at in the resolution—but levy a small duty on grain. Now, if that grain produced a large revenue, it might be devoted to the feeding of the poor. The people of Ireland could not afford to purchase grain at any price, even though it were at a penny a peck; and of what use would it be to them to admit it free. He thought it would be more wise to prohibit the exportation of food than to let it in. The wages of labourers in this country were at present exceedingly good. Wheat was not higher than it had often been when wages were lower, and no one would say that at this moment people, with such wages as were going, were badly off."

The duty on grain to maintain the monopolist price is still his first object; not a fraction of the amount thus put into the pocket of the protectionist can be spared to stave off famine; it is only from the portion which accumulated distress may add to the revenue that this distress will be permitted to expect any relief. Further comment is superfluous; such a proclamation of heartless rapacity at such a prospective crisis as the report of the secretary and the speech of the noble chairman described, is a melancholy illustration of the great truth, that systematic selfishness stultifies the intellect, while it hardens the heart.

PARISH OF ST. PAUL, COVENT GARDEN.—On Tuesday night, a public meeting of the parishioners of St. Paul, Covent Garden, was held in the vestry-room, for the purpose of "taking into consideration the present high price of provisions, and to petition her Majesty to open the ports for the admission of foreign corn and provisions duty free."

Mr. TAPSTER, the senior churchwarden, in the chair.

Mr. WALKER said that he rose for the purpose of moving a resolution in accordance with the notice given to the churchwardens for calling the meeting, and if ever there was a time more than another which called upon them all to come forward and prevent a threatened evil, the present was that time. Day after day they saw accounts of the total failure of that article of human consumption by which a great number of their fellow-creatures solely lived, and it was deplorable to think of what would become of those poor creatures who were unable to obtain a better article of food than the potato. (Hear.) It was quite clear, therefore, that unless something was speedily done, thousands would die of starvation. It would be the same as it was a few years since, when thousands in the manufacturing districts died of sheer starvation. This was owing in a great measure to the Corn Laws for the protection of the landed aristocracy, who were bringing the country to a state of desolation and famine. Mr. Walker then moved the following resolution:—"That the appalling accounts daily rendered of the progress of disease in the potato crop imperatively call upon us, as men and as Christians, to endeavour by every means in our power to avert the coming danger of threatened famine, and consequent plague of typhus."

Mr. BURNETT, after some remarks, read the following extract from the evidence of Mr. McCulloch before the agricultural committee in 1831. Speaking of the failure of the potato crop, that gentleman says—"It is clear that when the crop of potatoes happens to be deficient in a country thus situated, the condition of its inhabitants must be in the last degree unfortunate. During a period of scarcity men cannot go from a low to a high level. If they would elude its pressure, they must leave the dearer and resort to cheaper species of food; but to those who subsist on potatoes this is not possible—they have already reached the lowest point in the descending scale. Their wages being determined by the price of the least expensive sort of food, they cannot, when it fails, buy that which is dearer, so that it is hardly possible for them to avoid falling a sacrifice to absolute want." It was a well-known fact that potatoes could not be stored like corn. There was no mode of preserving them; the whole crop is exhausted in the year. Therefore a scarcity, the pressure of which falls upon the lower orders, cannot be alleviated. He concluded by seconding the resolution.

Mr. TOLLEY moved the second resolution, to the effect, "That the meeting believed the most effective mode of averting the coming evil, and preventing the effects of such a scourge as the desolation of the land by famine, is immediately for her Majesty to instruct her Ministers to open the ports of the kingdom for all kinds of foreign grain and other provisions duty free."

Mr. BECK seconded the resolution, which, as well as the first, was carried unanimously.

It was then moved that a petition embodying the foregoing resolutions be drawn up and signed by the chairman, on behalf of the meeting, and presented to her Majesty by the Home Secretary.

This also having been carried, a vote of thanks was given the chairman, and the meeting separated.

FREE TRADE COUNTY QUALIFICATIONS

On Tuesday evening a meeting of the League County Registration Committee was held at the Offices, Newall's-buildings, Manchester, Mr. Wilson in the chair. A large number of members were present, including the following: Messrs. S. Lees, T. Simpson, J. Heywood, J. Barratt, B. Syddall, J. E. Royle, W. Shuttleworth, T. Chadwick, S. Lucas, S. P. Robinson, W. McCall, W. Macartney, W. Burton, C. Grundy, —Bunting, C. Duffield, J. D. Fernley, J. Hickin, &c., &c.

The Chairman, in opening the business of the meeting, entered into a detailed statement of what had been effected by the League and its agents during the past year. He reminded them of the plan which had emanated from that room at the close of the revision of 1844. In consequence of that recommendation many thousands of freeholds had been purchased, and county qualifications thereby obtained. Some doubts had been at first entertained by the timid as to whether these qualifications would be held good, and their opponents had called them faggot-votes; but the barristers had everywhere decided in their favour. During the recent registration, the number of new claims in South Lancashire was upwards of 2600, in the West Riding 3369, in North Lancashire 1162, North Cheshire 889, and in Middlesex 925. The meeting was aware that something had been done in other counties. The Council had sent Mr. Hickin into South Staffordshire, and there had been a gain in that division of 936. The gain in North Stafford was 942. In other counties they had succeeded in making considerable improvement; and they had now determined to extend their operations, and to call upon their friends in other parts of the kingdom for that assistance in working out the plan, which was essential to its success. Mr. Wilson then read a list of the counties which it was thought might be worked with success. He had no doubt the committee then assembled would as heretofore perform their share of the good work. The meeting was afterwards addressed by Mr. McCall, Mr. Simpson, Mr. R. Owen, Mr. Hickin, Mr. Duffield, Mr. Royle, Mr. S. P. Robinson, Mr. Syddall, and others. About 30 names were handed to the Secretary of persons who wished to purchase qualifications. A general canvass was resolved upon, and canvassing forms were taken by most of the gentlemen present. The following is the list of counties read by Mr. Wilson, grouped into districts for the convenience of working:

South Lancashire North Lancashire West Riding	I.	North Cheshire South Cheshire
East Cumberland West Cumberland	II.	North Durham South Northumberland
North Stafford South Stafford	III.	North Warwick East Worcester
North Notts North Derby South Derby	IV.	South Leicester Rutland
East Gloucester West Gloucester East Somerset	V.	West Somerset North Wilts
Middlesex East Surrey East Sussex South Essex	VI.	South Hants West Kent Herts
East Cornwall West Cornwall	VII.	East Norfolk West Norfolk

THE REGISTRATION.

LEICESTERSHIRE, SOUTHERN DIVISION.—The following is a return of the registration for the southern division of this county, and exhibits a loss to the Tory interest of 1600! What will Messrs. Halford and Packe say to this? Their "glorious majority" of 1400 and odd is annihilated at one blow; and by the aid of their party's agents, too!—Messrs. John Johnson, Adams, and Co. Such unprecedented success is indeed surprising, and well does Mr. L. Staines merit the thanks of the party in whose behalf he labours.

PERTH.—A meeting of the Town Council was held on Monday. Provost Sidney in the chair. Treasurer Halley proposed a resolution in favour of opening the ports, which was seconded by Bailie Dewar, and carried unanimously.

BRADFORD.—It is the intention of the Free Trade party in Bradford to get up a public meeting in a week or ten days, at which Messrs. Cobden and Bright will attend, and urge on the Free Traders to increase their numbers on the register by the purchase of small freeholds.

A memorial to Sir Robert Peel requesting him to open the ports of Great Britain and Ireland, for the admission of foreign grain, &c., duty free, is in course of signature at Crayford, Kent, and will be transmitted to the hon. Baronet in the course of a few days.

EVIDENCES OF PUBLIC OPINION.

We have taken some pains to collect from the metropolitan and provincial journals the tone of public opinion at the present alarming crisis, and we find that through the length and breadth of the land there is a universal feeling of alarm at the prospects of supply for the coming winter and summer, and that there is a general concurrence as to the nature of the precautions that ought to be adopted. On all hands the deficiency of supply is admitted: on all sides the opening of the ports is demanded. If the Minister is resolved to maintain prohibition in the face of famine, it is well that the nation should be aware where the responsibility rests. We hope that the evidences of public opinion which we have collected will stimulate all friends of their country and their kind to speedy exertion; they have before them proofs that their labours will be supported by general co-operation, and their remonstrances seconded by the voice of the country.

(From the Morning Chronicle of Friday.)

The proceedings at the dinner given last night to Mr. Villiers by the Free Traders of Birmingham, of which we give a report, by express, in another page, will be read with deep and delighted interest in every part of the country. As an expression of respect for the public character of the hon. Member for Wolverhampton, and an acknowledgment of the eminent services which he has rendered to the Free Trade cause, during a long series of years, by an able, earnest, and consistent advocacy—begin at a time when all mention of the Corn Law seemed dolefully out of season, and perseveringly continued until, aided by public discussion and the course of national experience, the question has made all seasons its own—never was a better earned tribute of honour rendered to a public man. As a demonstration of feeling and opinion on the part of a large industrial and trading community, with respect to the Corn Law monopoly, it was most effective and unmistakable. The prompt intelligence, the sturdy determination, the enthusiastic unanimity that pervaded the vast assemblage gathered last night within the walls of the Town Hall of Birmingham, give the earnest of a national movement which will speedily teach Sir Robert Peel to regard his neglect of recent and present opportunities—his “loss of the tide”—as the most enormous blunder of his political life-time. We rejoice to see Birmingham once more taking its old place in the front ranks of the cause of rational and practical reform. The town which bore so large and influential a part in the struggle for the Reform Act ought to be something more than a neutral spectator of the conflict for the rights of industry. We trust we may now look to Birmingham to do that for commercial which it has heretofore done for political reform. The spirit evinced last night gives a cheering assurance that the blunder which for the present has virtually disfranchised Birmingham, and doomed the capital of a great commercial, manufacturing, and railway district to a parliamentary neutrality on the first industrial question of the time, will be corrected on the earliest opportunity.

There never was a crisis in the affairs of this country more loudly calling for that energetic and united public protest against the mad folly of its rulers which, last night, went forth from the metropolis of the Midland Counties. Just now we are “prosperous,” or seem so; but the dry rot has begun eating into our prosperity. Those symptoms which a bitter and recent experience has so well taught us to interpret, are daily becoming more formidable. Already, as Mr. Villiers warns us, in a speech deserving to be read, and read again, by all who would understand the real significance of the phenomena of our present national condition, the signs have appeared that heralded those years of distress which the youngest man living will never forget. The price of bread is now what it was when starving men rilled bakers' shops for food—when Paisley and Stockport exhibited misery and horrors, which the premier prays God he may never live to see again—when the rising flood of pauperism threatened to efface all distinction between rate payer and rate-eater—and when the fearful increase of crime and mortality attested, in facts and figures, the prevalence of a disstress past all power of moral and physical endurance. The country has already made the first step in that course, of which a distress like that of the years from 1839 to 1842 is the natural consummation. If there be truth in experience—if law and causation have power in the affairs of men—that which happened then will, without a prompt and total change of our present ruinous policy, happen again now, point by point, with those special aggravations resulting from a potato famine in one-third of the United Kingdom.

If the people will not help themselves, there is now no help for them. The delusion of those who, like ourselves, expected that Sir Robert Peel would for once act the statesman, is thoroughly dissipated. The “hoax on the credulity of the country” can hoax us no longer. We have no doubt but that the country will show itself equal to the emergency created by the Government's abdication of the first function of Government. The Premier will find that he misinterpreted the recent quiescence of the public mind. That there has, until this week, been little popular agitation on the subject of the present crisis was justly referred by Mr. Cobden to the general tacit conviction which the people felt, that agitation was needless, and that the next London Gazette would settle the question by Order in Council. Sir Robert Peel has now, once for all, thrown the people on their own resources; he will, we expect, find the people fully equal to the occasion.

In Mr. Cobden's remarkably vigorous and telling speech of last night, the moral relation in which Sir Robert Peel has now placed himself to the country, was expounded with a truth and force which the Premier's own conscience can scarcely fail of recognising. We know not whether the Ministerial organs will deem it discreet, by quarrelling with the doctrine of the responsibility of public men for public measures, further to revive the recollection of a certain well known and singularly discreditable incident of Sir Robert Peel's parliamentary life. But the Premier may rest assured that he will hear again and again of that “responsibility,” the mention of which once seemed so odious to him. The plain, common sense view of the case, so powerfully put by Mr. Cobden, is that which the country will take. When Sir Robert Peel undertakes to “regulate,” the people's supply of food, he is responsible if the supply turn out to be ill-regulated; certainly he has never shown himself backward to claim any credit that may seem due for good regulation. By maintaining his Corn Law under circumstances so imperiously demanding its instant abrogation—by refusing to counsel his Royal Mistress to perform an act of the commonest prudence and humanity, which has already been done, on a far less pinching necessity, by half the Governments of Europe, the Czar of Russia, and the Grand Turk included—Sir Robert Peel does, most distinctly, make himself responsible for all that may follow. Whether it be agreeable or not to him and his supporters, he will certainly be held to this responsibility. There is nothing to divide it with him. “Over-production,” “machinery,” “joint-stock banks,” Chinese war, and United States currency—all are unavailable this time. He cannot even throw it on “railway speculation.” It was but yesterday that he turned navigator himself, and, spade in hand, gave the most emphatic sanction to that investment of vast masses of capital in long-dated enterprises, requiring for their successful issue the stability and progressive prosperity of all national interests, which derives its chief dangers from his own anti-commercial policy. Of “colleagues” there can, of course, be nothing said. In matters of first-class national and imperial magnitude, a Prime Minister has no colleagues. The act of consenting to continue the Government of a country on principles disapproved by a Minister's own deliberate judgment, is an “individual and personal” act, of which no co-partnership can alter the character, or diminish the culpability.

(From the Times of Thursday.)

The recent decision, or rather indecision of the Cabinet is as inexplicable as it is unfortunate. No one pretends to say that things can remain as they are. Sooner or later a suspension of the duties on imported grain must take place. For this every man who has attended to the state of Ireland and Scotland is prepared; and so evident is this, that most people are astonished at the procrastination which ministers have interposed between popular expectation and an inevitable necessity. The reasons advanced to defend their inactivity neither explain nor justify it. It remains inexplicable and inexcusable.

Surely within the last fortnight no means of inquiry into the state of the harvest have been withheld from them. They know by this time that there is a deficiency of good corn in England, a dearth of potatoes in Ireland, a scarcity impending over Scotland. No further inquiry can add to their present information. No further delay can change the aspect of affairs, or diminish the final necessity for exertion. And yet they stand with their hands folded, inert and expectant, bidding men take heart, because as yet there is no famine in the land!

The consequences of such a policy are as dangerous as its selection is unaccountably foolhardy. Whatever is likely to be the extent of the privation which a scarcity of food may impose upon individuals during the ensuing year, whatever its duration may be, whether for one month or two months, or more, it is the duty of a Minister to seek every method for abbreviating its length and mitigating its rigours. The Minister who, foreknowing the approach of such a calamity, forbears to provide against it, or masks his indecision under the guise of deliberation, is virtually adding to the intensity of the evil which is about to burst upon the country. If there were a probability of our being always able to purchase food from abroad at the same rate as we have lately procured it, a delay of a few weeks would be of little consequence; it would not signify whether we laid in our stock in November or in January, provided the quantity imported kept pace with our own deficiency at home. But there exists no such probability in the present case. Already some of the Continental Governments are taking precautions which evince a dread of the same scarcity that threatens ourselves; and it was only the other day that we quoted the sentiments of no inconsiderable portion among our French neighbours—sentiments which, if followed up in practice, would effectually preclude any relief being extended to us by the only country in Europe now capable of affording it with ease. If such be the case now, what will it be in a few weeks, not to say months, hence? What may be our facilities for buying after the next Cabinet Council? The paternal governments of the Northern States are no less anxious than the constitutional ministries of France and Belgium to secure to their subjects a cheap supply of food. Nor is it unlikely that all the European Governments, absolute and constitutional, will unite to prevent what they will call the ill-timed and unnatural rapacity of British gold and British hunger from raising their markets and starving their people. It is all very well to say that where there is a demand there will also be a supply; that if money is offered in exchange for corn, corn will be given for money; that the same laws govern the market of food and every other market; and that it is only fair that he who bids the most should buy the most. But foreign Governments are on great emergencies very well disposed to contravene the ordinary laws of commercial intercourse, and by no means indisposed to check the influence of British gold. The foreign dealer may be anxious to supply our demands; but if his negotiations are thwarted by his Government, he will find it no easy matter to profit by our offers, and he will also find the arm of the executive supported by the popular voice. It is easy, at all times and in all countries, to raise a clamour against the dealers in the staple article of food. It is only within a few years that our statute book has been purged of certain provisions conceived in a spirit of the most narrow-minded, but once the most widely-extended, jealousy against this class of men; but this feeling still exists, and is capable of being fanned into a flame amongst an ignorant populace, and in seasons of unusual dearth. How great a facility would be given to such attempts when directed against the relief of English wants, or the operations of English money, will easily suggest itself to all who are aware of the envy with which the greatness of this country is regarded abroad, and of the cordial wishes often expressed for its humiliation. Nor could a more desirable opportunity ever present itself to the malignity of professed foes or jealous friends than that of England seeking for her people in the granaries of Europe the food which she had for so many years obstinately rejected, and being herself in turn sent away empty. But to such a strait we may be driven by the tardiness of a Minister who is too wary not to know that something must be done, but too timid to set about doing it at once.

(From the Globe.)

Sir R. Peel does not seem to be conscious that in losing time he is losing what is just now of more importance to himself and to the country than anything else. We are now in the actual presence of a national emergency, such as has perhaps never before tried the ability and energy of a Prime Minister. Upon the most moderate estimate it amounts to this—that several millions of the very poorest people of the United Kingdom are entirely unprovided with food for the next year. They are equally destitute of any means whatever of supplying the deficiency. They must either be fed by the Government or their fellow-subjects, or they must die of starvation. For some weeks this necessity has been gradually making itself apparent; and now it stands forth in all its hideous reality, supported by evidence which carries conviction wherever it is heard. The food which has been destroyed was of the most inferior description used for human sustenance. It has been similarly destroyed throughout Europe and America. For the coming year at least, therefore, it may be considered not to form part of the world's stock of food. Those who have hitherto lived upon potatoes must now, to escape starvation, ascend in the scale of diet. But the superior descriptions of food are also unusually scarce. Wheat grown in the United Kingdom this year is generally so inferior in quality and in its yield of flour as to be intrinsically worth 3s. or 4s. per quarter less than it has been on an average of several years. So much for natural obstacles. Then we have the artificial ones growing out of the Corn Laws. Not only can foreign wheat not be taken into consumption in this country until our own poor wheat has risen to a famine price, but, what is at the present juncture of infinitely more importance, no regular corn trade is established between this and other corn-growing countries. Our demand is a sudden one, made upon a supply not raised with any view to its occurrence, and therefore necessarily deranges the relation of supply and demand abroad, and creates inconveniences there which we must pay a compensation for in the price of our imported corn. Nothing can be done with regularity or facility, consequently nothing is done well. We are now told that prices of wheat in the Baltic ports have risen so rapidly, that few of the orders from hence to purchase wheat have been executed, higher rates having been paid by speculators than the limits of the British orders have admitted. We still exclude corn, because, after some half-dozen Cabinet Councils, Ministers cannot make up their minds to do at once what they will shortly be compelled to do, though every day's delay makes the doing of it of less value—open the ports. Meanwhile other countries, similarly situated, are taking off the scanty stocks of wheat yet lying in the northern ports; and, by the aid of speculators, making provision for the coming pressure. Never was delay more fraught with danger than it is at this moment. In Great Britain, the resources of private benevolence are likely to be pressed hard enough in providing for the potato-fed and now destitute peasantry of the south and west counties. In Ireland no such resources can be of the smallest avail. The wretched beings to be provided for—whose daily food must for months together be meted out to them or they die—are millions in number, and are scattered over thousands of square miles. To victual the largest army that has ever been collected, through the most arduous campaign such an army has ever made is a task not to be compared with that of supplying the deficit of the Irish potato crop. The number to be fed—the bulkiness of the emergency—the total want of any arrangement, either for collecting, for storing, or for distributing the food—for ascertaining where want exists, and its extent, and for duly and adequately supplying it—together with the physical impossibility of making such arrangements on the scale required, and bringing them into effective operation within any short period of time—combine to surround Sir R. Peel with difficulties such as have, perhaps, never hitherto encumbered the path of a statesman. We put out of sight for the moment the question of how a sufficient quantity of food is to be got together, and paid for. No mean obstacle may be looked for in the solution of this question, for it includes a new demand on the markets of Europe for means of subsistence during the greater part of a year for several millions of our population, and upon the national Exchequer for the price of it, be that what it may. But what this question to be solved—say the money is sure to be had for asking, and the corn or other provision to be had on our paying enough for it; are we not, in the loss of every day, not directed to organising the means of providing and applying the required relief, throwing away what no subsequent effort can retrieve; the time, already short enough, allowed necessary for making those arrangements with which it will be impossible, with all the gnomies of Europe at our command, to rescue the utterly destitute, scattered, and improvident peasantry of Ireland from the famine and disease which have already begun their ravages amongst them?

(From the Sun.)

Rating the morale of the Premier's government at no higher value than this, and thereby not taking up any hypothesis calculated to betray our judgment into any disparaging estimate of his sagacity, we yet cannot comprehend the delusion under which he must be labouring if he imagines that he can with impunity attempt to obviate, by procrastinating, the opening of the ports. He who is so ready to school others about their inability to read the "sign of the times," must be seized with a chronic blindness—a defective perception pro hac vice—if he cannot recognise in the condition of the country the imperious and paramount necessity for such a measure—in the quiet but emphatic bearing of the public upon it—the decree which must compel its prompt concession. The potato crop failure now shares, with Ireland, the fatal distinction of proving "his greatest difficulty." His tenure of power is staked upon the single cast of solving that difficulty. The opening of the ports is the only card which can save the trimming and difficult game he has hitherto had to play against adversaries who have become more formidable as antagonists from the very successes he has achieved against them, and with partners who are incapable of playing up to him.

But why should Sir Robert hesitate to obey the wish of the vast majority, by virtue of whose past confidence or approval he retains the first place in her Majesty's Councils? Is it because he would compromise his popularity with his own party, the Conservatives? Why he has over and over again relinquished and repudiated them on other questions, when he could command adequate support for his purpose from their opponents. Is it that he dreads a combination of the landed interest? In how many instances has he already thwarted and resisted them? Does any man imagine that he is afraid to appease the alarms of the empire, and to satisfy the clamour of the famishing, out of some delicacy for the trammels of those views and prejudices which the political associations of his earlier official and Parliamentary career respected and upheld as identified with the principles of a sound and sagacious policy? Such a man needs only to be reminded that Sir Robert Peel has thrown them overboard, from time to time, with as little ceremony as he knocked some hundreds of items out of the tariff of Customs' Duties retained by his predecessors. Besides, who among our modern ministers has ever bidden higher, or more largely for the favour of the people than Sir Robert, in his measures for the relief of civil and religious disabilities—the extension of education—the relaxation of imposts on raw materials of manufactures, &c., &c. In a word, it seems difficult, if not impossible, to ascribe his dogged refusal to open the ports at once, under exigencies so fearful as those of the present time, to any other motive than personal deference or consideration for some colleagues in office, the prestige of whose continued and close alliance he is rash enough to set before the cordial and firm support of a great and determined people. If this be the fact, the career of the Prime Minister draws as near to its termination as the past reputation of the statesman.

The accounts which have been received from Ireland within the last few days are in no degree calculated to lessen the alarm which has been lately felt regarding the failure in the potato crop throughout that island. Many of the poor farmers, who, a week or two since, were confidently calculating upon the preservation of two-thirds or one-half of the crop, now state that they have no hope of being able to save more than one-third of it; and there is much reason to fear that even the small portion which they have saved will, in many instances, become partly unfit for consumption before long. What the consequence will be to the famishing peasantry, unless prompt measures of relief are adopted, may be easily anticipated. As to the course which ministers intend to take, nothing has yet transpired from which the slightest clue can be obtained. The Dublin Evening Mail of Friday announces, that "it is the intention of Government to appoint a commission of intelligent and experienced persons, to consider the measures which it may be proper to take, with a view to provide against the expected scarcity of provisions from the failure of the potato crop;" but we have not seen anything further on the subject; and what the ministry will do, remains as doubtful as ever. What they will not do, however, becomes tolerably clear. Since Thursday last, no more cabinet councils have been held; and as most of the members of the cabinet have left London for their country seats, it is to be presumed that a majority of them must have at last come to the conclusion that there is nothing in the present aspect of the food market which requires their immediate interference. Rumours are abundant respecting divisions in the cabinet. Lord Stanley and the Duke of Wellington are said to be opposed to the opening of the ports; while the premier and Sir James Graham, it is asserted, are favourable to that mode of averting the dearth with which we are threatened. We question whether there is much better than mere conjecture for these reports; and yet the obvious indecision of the cabinet would almost seem to indicate some important differences of opinion.

By way of consolation, however, the Standard and the Morning Herald are both most assiduous in announcing to the impatient public, that food is not dear, and that there is not the slightest ground for apprehending any scarcity of grain during the next ten months. So long as it was thought probable that ministers would open the ports, the twin ministerial journals were loud in their lamentations regarding the failure of the potato crop, and equally so in their admiration of the boldness of Sir Robert Peel, who was just the man, we were told, that ought to be at the head of affairs during an emergency like the present. But no sooner do they find that the premier cannot carry his point, than they instantly turn round and tell us, that since Sir Robert Peel has not opened the ports it must necessarily be assumed that there was no need for his doing so.

In contradiction to the assertions of the Standard, regarding our supplies of food, we find the Dublin papers announcing that "the prayer appointed to be used in time of famine has been ordered by the primate and several bishops to be offered in their churches during the present month." In reference to the statement of the Downing-street organ, that "wheat is cheap," we call the attention of our readers to the following article on the sliding scale, from the Scotsman of Saturday.

"In Haddington market (the most important in Scotland) on 31st October we have the following very striking variety of prices:—

	Old Wheat.	New Wheat.
First quality ..	84s.	73s.
Second do. ..	72s. 7d.	57s. 11d.
Third do. ..	64s.	41s.

"Thus, between the best old wheat in the market, and the best new, there is a difference of 11s.; between the second qualities the difference is 14s. 8d.; and between the third or lowest qualities the difference is no less than 20s. What is called the second quality is the mean or average of the whole sales, and may be taken to represent the comparative value of the last and the present crop. Mark, then, what follows.

"If the quality of the present crop had been equal to that of the last, the average at Haddington on the 31st ult. would have been 72s. 7d. And as the Haddington average for the week merely exceeds by one penny that for the kingdom, the difference on the six weeks' average regulating importation, may be assumed as nearly the same, namely, 14s. 8d. Now, the six weeks' average, which was 56s. 2d., would thus be raised to 70s. 10d., and foreign wheat should at this moment have been admissible at 3s. instead of 16s. But prices have not yet reached their limit; and let it be observed, that a further rise of 2s. 2d., which will bring down the duty only to 13s., would have opened the ports, if the grain had not been of inferior quality.

"Thus the sliding-scale cheats the consumers, as it cheats the farmers, by promising each a protection which it does not give. It promised the farmer 50s., and for the last two years it has given about 40s. A year of real scarcity has come, and now it cheats the consumer, by making the admission of foreign corn dependent on a fictitious average 14s. above the real average. The difference in price between the best and the worst quality in Haddington market was no less than 40s. In the corresponding week of 1844 it was only 22s. The low price which so large a portion of the present crop brings is owing to deficiency of yield, quite as much as to deficiency of quality. A given quantity of the inferior grain will yield 30 to 35 per cent. less flour than the same quantity of the superior. The result is, that the real rise is much greater than the apparent; and while the Gazette tells us that the price of wheat is 56s. we are paying at the rate of 70s. for our bread. In the Edinburgh market, on Wednesday, the extremes of price were still greater. Wheat ranged from 34s. to 86s., and in weight from 52lbs. the bushel to 66."

No man can read these statements without coming to the same conclusion as the writer of them has done—that, but for the deceptive working of the sliding scale, prices have already risen to a point at which the grain ought to be admitted at a merely nominal rate of duty. What can be more monstrous than the fact, that the best wheat is 84s., and yet that the import duty on foreign wheat is no less than 15s. per quarter?

(From the Manchester Times.)

There never was a period in which there was so eager a desire to see the London papers than has been manifested in this district for the last ten days. Every morning and every afternoon the first question has been—"ARE THE PORTS OPEN?" And every morning and every evening has witnessed the deep disappointment of thousands upon thousands who have been hopeful enough to believe that what was right to be done would be done. In the prospect of starvation to one-half of Ireland and great distress in England, there are as yet no indications of the ministerial policy. Cabinet meetings have followed Cabinet meetings, and yet there is no sign of relief. The corn-markets throughout the kingdom are in a state of confusion; merchants and manufacturers are waiting in deep anxiety, not knowing what they may safely do; and millions of working men, who are now convinced that full employment and good wages can never be had while there is a scarcity of food, are almost breathlessly looking to the result of all these deliberations; and yet nothing is done, and no hope is given that any thing will be done. The Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, in reply to a deputation from the citizens of Dublin, has indeed said that ministers are inquiring. Yes, no doubt they are inquiring—inquiring how far scarcity may be permitted to prevail without the risk of tumult—inquiring whether one-fourth or one-half of the potato is rotten—inquiring whether the people can be made to believe that because the average price of wheat is not high, in consequence of the general inferiority of its quality, good bread is not and will not be dear—inquiring, in short, how infinitesimally small the homœopathic dose of relief may be made!

(From the Leeds Mercury.)

The Cabinet has met four times within the week, but no result of its deliberations has appeared. Yesterday week, on Saturday, on Monday, and again on Thursday, have the Ministers assembled, but without being able to arrive at a decision on the great question of permitting a people threatened with death to buy themselves food. It is stated that Ministers are divided on the question. That the opening of the ports has been proposed, is beyond doubt. That it is resisted by a portion of the Cabinet, may be inferred with equal certainty. According to the Globe and the Morning Chronicle, the Duke of Wellington opposes the opening of the ports by Order in Council, and insists that if anything is to be done, Parliament shall be summoned. According to the Standard, the ports ought not to be and will not be opened, at least for some considerable time. It is better, in the opinion of that journal, to put the people on every possible effort to save their own food at home, especially the potatoes, than to lead them to look abroad for relief. No doubt, every thing that skill can suggest, or patient industry accomplish, to save the potato crop, ought to be done. But such precautionary measures would not be prevented by opening the ports. We shall require every relief that can be obtained from abroad, as well as every appliance that can be used at home. The sooner our ports are opened, the more likely we are to obtain supplies. By that step, other countries would be put upon sending us all the food they can spare, and economising their own consumption that they may obtain the profit of the sale. At such a time, when the grain crops are indifferent and the potato crops a failure in the greater part of Europe, we shall have to draw our supplies from very distant countries, from the United States, where much of the corn must be brought from the interior and from the Western States to Atlantic cities, which cannot be done after winter has set in,—from Canada, where winter equally obstructs the navigation,—and from the Black Sea, where we shall find many competitors among the merchants and governments of other countries. The opening of the British ports would put all the world on scraping together and shipping corn for our markets: whilst the delay of that measure leaves all the world in doubt whether it will be taken, and of course paralyses their enterprise.

We feel, therefore, that a very heavy responsibility rests on the Cabinet for the course now taken. If the people should be prevented from obtaining food, and if the health and lives of many should in consequence be endangered, Ministers will have to answer for it in foro conscientie, and at a higher bar, if not before Parliament and the country.

The sliding scale now shows its treacherous operation. Food is dear, but the ports do not open, because the bad quality of much of our English corn keeps down the averages. The very circumstance which necessitates an importation of foreign corn, is thus made the means of preventing it! It is plain that no device of man can pollute the evil of a monopoly of the supply of food? What is the true and only remedy?—TO SWEEP AWAY ALL RESTRICTION, NOW AND FOR EVER!

(From the Liverpool Mercury.)

That which is done now, must be done once for all. No patching up of the sliding scale, no fixed injustice and absurdity of a fixed duty, no gimcrack of a vanishing scale will now satisfy the country. Whatever temporary concessions may be made to meet a temporary need—whatever legislative compromise may be afforded, by way of truce between right and wrong—nothing will now stay the national demand for justice. The war will go on until the last rag and shred of monopoly shall be torn from the statute-book.

That Sir Robert Peel should deem it expedient to leave this question outstanding against him at the next general election, is perfectly incredible. We cannot but believe that he will be well pleased to be driven from a position at once dangerous and humiliating, by the force of an overwhelming necessity, which visibly releases him from all further obligations to Hansard and "consistency." Nay, Hansard and "consistency" will, three months hence, be on the side of total and immediate repeal. With the ports once open, it would be a piece of gross inconsistency in Sir Robert Peel to close them again. No man has insisted oftener, or more emphatically, than the Premier, on the impossibility of re-imposing a temporarily abandoned corn duty. It was always his grand argument against the Whig scheme of a fixed duty, that such a tax could not stand the stress of famine prices, and that, once off, it could never again be laid on. Consistency itself will require him to recognise practically an impossibility which he has so repeatedly urged hypothetically. With the Corn Law repealed de facto, by order in Council, nothing will remain but to make the repeal legislative and permanent.

(From the Liverpool Albion.)

The ministerial mountain has for some days past been heaving before the eyes of anxious multitudes, as if big with some mighty project that should appease the apprehensions of prudent men, and exhibit our rulers as perfect specimens of sagacious statesmen. The world has been looking on in wistful expectancy, doomed, alas! to be baffled by less than the usual product of such a labour; for the mountain, in the instance under consideration, has not even brought forth a mouse. Ministers have scattered hope amongst the people, but the yield is nothing. There is through the length and breadth of the land a cry of apprehension; and the monster that has caused the nations to fear, and forced even despots to take wise precautions, is nothing less than gaunt famine, the shadow of whose coming even now darkens our islands. There is one universal cry from all quarters for our rulers to unlock the gates which shut out the supplies that might yet be obtained from other nations. So certain were all that the request would be complied with, so strong was the feeling that none but madmen could resist the appeal or risk the responsibility of refusal, that people already hailed the promised blessing, and were thankful by anticipation. There was Cabinet meeting after Cabinet meeting, and the most minute movements of those who held, as it were, the keys of fate were industriously chronicled. Those who took the trouble to suggest, to advise, to prognosticate, might have spared their labour, for the whole of the ministerial doings may be summed up thus:—They have met, they have consulted, and gone back to their shooting. Even the ministerial journals cherished the hopes which were so naturally indulged, and the Gazette of Friday was eagerly scanned for a response to the important question, What are the ministers going to do? The answer was, "Nothing."

If we are to pass through a period of privation, while those who have power to relieve us, benefited by the scarcity and unpunished by its effects, look unmoved on our sufferings, it is some consolation to think that the ordeal will lead us to a result so desirable. To see the Peel Ministry and the Corn Laws fall together would compensate for much misery, while the pleasant reflection that future generations were released from the risk of similar affliction would, perhaps, even make us look back with satisfaction to the means whereby so desirable an end had been accomplished.

(From the Liverpool Times.)

If it is true, as is generally reported, that her Majesty's Ministers have determined to leave the country to the mercy of the sliding scale during the present winter, without either opening the ports for the immediate admission of foreign grain, or in any way explaining their plans for the future regulation of the corn trade, the following will in all probability be the working of that ingenious instrument of starvation for the next three months.

There is at present in the country about a million quarters of foreign grain or flour; a quantity sufficient for the comfortable support of a million of persons for 12 months, or of twelve millions for one month. This supply of food, if at once admitted in the market, would have a considerable effect in diminishing the price of grain, and with it the sufferings of the poor, during the time when work is least plentiful, and poverty most intolerable. Under the sliding-scale, however, there is not the slightest reason to hope that any part of it will be liberated until after Christmas, at least for the purposes of food, although a few samples suited for the purposes of seed may possibly be liberated before the seed time is ended.

The present position of the corn market is such as to render it certain that the mass of it will be withheld, for though increasingly unfavourable reports of the wheat crop have at last forced the duty on wheat below the first of those rates which are the peculiar glory of Sir Robert Peel's scale, the duty is still 15s. per quarter. It will continue to decline steadily for some time, but it is very doubtful whether it will reach the point at which the holders of foreign grain will liberate their supplies until January or February in next year. That it will reach the lowest point—the shilling duty—some time in one or other of these months, does not appear to us at all doubtful, and at all events the conviction that it will do so is so strong with the holders of bonded grain that none of them will part with their supplies until the experiment has been fairly tried. At present all the probabilities are in their favour. The present average price of wheat, according to the last six weeks' returns, is 7s., and the duty is 15s. The general return for the last week, of which any account is made up, is 60s., which gives a duty of 12s., and makes a difference to the holders, including decrease of duty and increase of price, of upwards of 5s. per quarter; and the London average for the week ending on Thursday last is 65s., which gives a duty of 7s. or 8s. per quarter, and makes a difference (again including duty and price) of about 16s. per quarter. This is the increase of profit which is now within prospect of the holders of foreign grain, and we believe there is not one of them, and scarcely one of the public, who doubts that the average price will go up to at least 70s. per quarter, and the duty down to 1s. The latter price is nothing more than that which is paying at the present time for the finest samples of wheat, and as the mere rubbish is swept from the market, and the quality of all sorts of grain improved by the winter's frost, this will be the regular price, and the one declared by the averages. The effect, therefore, of leaving the law as it is will be to keep about a million quarters of wheat locked up in bond during the worst months of winter, and gradually to force up prices to the starvation point.

It would be well, however, if the mere withholding of this quantity of food for two or three months was the extent of the evil, but this is very far from being the case, for, as prices rise in this country, they will rise abroad, so that if it should be found that when this fortnight's supply of food now in bond (and it is no more for the whole population), is admitted into the market, that it is totally inadequate to the wants of the people, then the further supply will have to be purchased at most exorbitant rates. We have already seen the price of good wheat rise in the Baltic ports from about 30s. per quarter to 55s. or 57s.; and if the English markets should advance to 70s. per quarter, we shall see the foreign markets advance to the same point—less, the freight, insurance, and other charges of conveying the grain from the Baltic to this country, and a small profit or commission to the importers. In this manner the Government is not only deliberately cutting off supplies which are urgently wanted at the present moment, but is, by so doing, forcing up prices abroad as well as at home to a point which will compel us to pay from 15 to 20 per cent. more than the present exorbitant prices for any supplies which we may require for the future. If the result of this course of madness should be to produce a monetary panic, in addition to the miseries of starvation, the whole guilt of having produced it will rest on their heads. They have been warned in time, but seem to be determined to leave the country to all the dangers and sufferings of dearth and scarcity, rather than to make a confession of their own errors.

(From the Preston Guardian.)

Cabinet Council meetings were held on Friday, Saturday, Monday, and Thursday, from each of which the country, waiting in almost breathless suspense, expected the welcome news of open ports. Not one word, up to last night, had transpired. Rumour as usual is quite active; and it is said, though upon no clear evidence, that the Wellington and Stanley party, stand out against relaxing the law which regulates the supply of food; and indeed the tone of the ministerial papers within these few days gives but slender hopes of a free admission of grain. It seems probable that if any alteration is decided upon, Parliament will be summoned, so as to throw the responsibility from Ministers. We confess we do not so much dislike these repeated meetings, because we think they prove that the Premier will be tough upon the hands of his opponents. Meanwhile the state of Ireland is alarming, and unless food be cheapened in England, we shall have a depressed trade and a gloomy winter. Memorials are being forwarded to Government from numerous bodies; and if ever there was a crisis when a simultaneous movement should be made to compel ministers to feel the force of pressure from without, now is the time.

(From the Preston Chronicle.)

Three Cabinet Councils, the deliberations of which are generally believed to have been upon the great question which is now more than ever agitating the minds of all classes of the community, have "passed away, and given no sign." Yesterday week the ministers met, and having decided nothing, they adjourned again till Monday; when, the result still being the same, they agreed to repose till Thursday last. Meanwhile, the newspaper organs of the Government have been feeling the public pulse slyly, and dropping hints and innuendoes, to try the effect of a statu quo policy upon the temper of the people. It may be thence inferred, that the Cabinet would prefer to let famine and the population take their chance in a contest for mastery during the ensuing winter—provided there should be no decided indication of general restiveness under such an infliction. If there should seem a disposition, on the part of her Majesty's subjects, to starve quietly—starve they may, and welcome, for her Majesty's Ministry. But if, on the contrary, they should evince symptoms of angry discontent, they may possibly gain from the fears what they are not likely to obtain from the wisdom or justice of their rulers.

That there must be a modification of the Corn Laws, before the expiration of another year, is almost universally admitted. The corn crops and the potato crops are alike defective; and yet the sliding scale, which was designed to meet and remedy such an emergency, has failed even to point out its existence. The very landlords themselves are ashamed of a thing which has proved so inert; and, through the agency of the Agricultural Protection Society—which has suddenly started from its long slumber into dreamy and agonised vitality, awakened by the rumbling of an approaching crisis—they are pointing, one and all, to the refuge of a fixed duty,—the remedy which they erst repudiated with scorn and indignation. It now remains to be seen whether the public will submit to accept, as a settlement, the terms which formerly they would have gratefully consented to receive as an instalment; or, whether they will not insist upon the payment of principal and interest at once and for ever.

(From the Birmingham Journal.)

Some anxiety is felt respecting the course likely to be taken by the people of Birmingham at this juncture. Besides the general interest which our townsmen must take in the national question of providing for the maintenance of the community, the effect of the Corn Laws on the American trade is a portion of the subject by which the iron districts are more directly touched than any other portion of the United Kingdom. Now, there is a very general belief in America, resting it must be confessed on plausible grounds, that the sliding-scale was specially directed against the agricultural produce of the states; and this is the chief source of the strength of the tariff and war party beyond the Atlantic.

The free admission of American produce at this moment would do more to check the apprehensions of war than the squadron which has been sent with sealed orders into the Northern Pacific. The check given to railway speculations by the rising price of food has already cast a shade of gloom over the iron markets. The shadow is not yet so dark as to produce positive depression, but it seems to herald the advance of some pending calamity. We shall soon see an assembly of the friends of Free Trade gathered in our town to do honour to its great advocate, the Hon. C. P. Villiers. But we must not look upon this as an ordinary gathering. At other times we may meet to drink toasts, and to make speeches, but at this crisis there is momentous business to be done. On every great national occasion Birmingham has given a bright example to the country, by taking a lead in pointing out the path of safety, and evincing a firm resolution to obtain those measures by which the perils of the country might be averted, and its prosperity insured. When we despair of Birmingham, we shall have abandoned our last hope of Britain. We trust, and confidently believe, that on the coming occasion our townsmen will evince the same political foresight and the same persevering resolution which have more than once contributed to the salvation of the entire country.

The intelligence from Ireland becomes more alarming every day. Farmers, believing that potatoes have become a perishable stock, are anxious to get rid of them at any price, and at all hazards. They are forcing consumption, in order to empty their stores; and thus, with admitted scarcity, we have the unavoidable evil of positive waste. The most feasible recommendation yet made is, to extract the farinaceous matter from the potato, and mix it with ordinary flour; but in order that this expedient should be adopted, the peasants must have the means of obtaining the flour, which they cannot do while the ports are closed by what are virtually prohibitory duties. To act upon the recommendation now, would lead to a sad aggravation of the scarcity, for the potato starch by itself is not suited to human sustenance.

The Cabinet hesitates. Had any course been resolved upon, we should have found some intimation of it in the last Gazette; but ministers are manifestly irresolute, and will sit still to watch the course of events. But "the stars in their courses fight against Siera;" the minister has raised artificial restrictions to limit the operation of the laws of God and nature; but retributive Providence asserts its supremacy, and menaces sad consequences for such a course of impiety. We must confess that our hopes are not so high as they were a week since. We have lost precious time, and every day's delay aggravates our peril. A further diminution of the stock in bond, by export to neighbouring countries, is menaced; and if high duties send the corn abroad, it will require very high prices to bring it back. Still we do not despair; men of all parties agree that the Corn Laws cannot be maintained. Let voice be given to this common sentiment, and the doom of these iniquitous laws, pronounced by the nation, must be ratified by its rulers.

(From the Birmingham Pilot.)

The semi-official information which appeared in the Globe of Thursday week, and on which we assumed that the Corn Laws were practically abolished, turns out to have been premature. There is every reason to believe that the scale of nominal duties thus announced was submitted by Sir Robert Peel to other members of the Cabinet Council; but it is understood that while the majority were prepared to concede them for a very limited time, a serious difference of opinion arose as to the propriety of limiting the "order" to corn actually in bond, in the first place, leaving ulterior proceedings to the judgment of Parliament. It has been stated, also, in well-informed circles, that Sir Robert Peel was in favour of an order being issued for the unconditional opening of the ports, and that the project of a four shilling duty is Lord Stanley's, backed by Sir James Graham. The Duke of Wellington, it appears, takes his stand on the official information obtained in answer to circulars addressed by the executive to various parties in the United Kingdom, with a view to ascertain the extent of the potato famine, and deficiency in quality of the wheat crop, contending that these returns show that the real facts of the case have been greatly exaggerated, and that there is abundance in the land for man and beast. With his usual stubbornness, it is said he won't yield an inch; and being strengthened in this position by one or two other obstructives, Peel is unable to carry his point. Whether all these rumours be founded in fact or not, one thing is clear—there is division in the camp; and unless the fourth meeting of the Council end in unity, the Government will speedily realise the truth that "a house divided against itself cannot stand."

While Government is thus distracted in its official councils, all is uncertainty and anxiety out of doors. The monopolist landlords are working the "Royal Agricultural Society" with the utmost vigour and zeal—holding meetings, passing threatening and stringent resolutions, and proclaiming, in language the most violent and vindictive, their unmitigated hostility to Sir Robert Peel. Other "great interests," whose existence is bound up in monopoly, are busy making friends with other "mammon of unrighteousness;" and, ere long, there will be a phalanx of monopoly, the power of which might well make the strongest Free Trade minister for the moment quail. But while the monopolists are thus rallying in opposition to the supposed intentions of ministers, the friends of commercial freedom, on the other hand, are neither inactive nor supine. The League has come out at Manchester in fresh vigour; its registration statistics may well startle the holders of monopolist seats; and the earnest and determined tone of their proceedings, and more especially the speeches of Mr. Cobden, go to show how vain it is to think of stopping short of total repeal. The time has gone by when the country would rest satisfied with even a four shilling duty; and whether the Cabinet Council decide for Wellington or Peel matters but little, as regards the ultimate result, for the days of monopoly will soon be numbered among the things that were.

(From the Carlisle Journal.)

The Corn Laws have not yet been knocked down with the rotten potatoes; but their doom is sealed—although the "Iron Duke" persists in upholding the scale which it is now discovered cannot be made to slide even when the necessity of its movement has become absolute. Long, and it is said, very stormy debates have taken place almost daily in the Cabinet since our last. All the ministers were summoned to London to consider what was to be done, with Ireland on the verge of famine, and England threatened with a scarcity, from the failure of the potato crop, to save the country from a crisis such as has scarcely been witnessed within the memory of the present generation. From four to six hours have been spent daily in deliberation upon this momentous question; but neither Order in Council for opening the ports, nor proclamation for the immediate assembling of Parliament—one or other of which was confidently expected by those who are supposed to possess the best information—has yet made its appearance. On Friday, after the first meeting of the Cabinet, it was announced that Sir Robert Peel had proposed to admit wheat at a fixed duty of 4s., barley 2s., and oats 1s. But the next rumour knocked this on the head, and informed us that there was great dissension in the Cabinet, and that the Duke would not yield an inch. The Globe of Wednesday last, in reference to this subject, says:

"The non-appearance of any Order in Council might excite an impression in the minds of many that the information communicated under this head last Friday was not founded upon any sound basis, or that, in fact, Government never contemplated the opening of the ports. Such an impression, however, we believe we may confidently affirm, would be erroneous; and furthermore we are prepared to go to the length of stating our belief that the duties given on Friday last in the Globe were really those which Sir Robert Peel was willing to try. On the other hand, however, difficulties have arisen since then among the members of the Cabinet; and the Duke of Wellington is said to be the most opposed to the introduction of grain—on the ground, we presume, which we stated on Monday, viz., that the duty under the present system is sure to come down to 8s. So this, we suppose, must satisfy the people, who, with a deficient supply, have a good prospect of very 'short commons' during the winter, for the consumption this year shows already an increase of two million quarters!"

Another Cabinet Council was to be held on Thursday, when in all probability a final decision would be come to on the subject.

(From the Nottingham Review.)

It was reported in Nottingham yesterday that Sir Robert Peel had resigned. Such report, though false in point of fact, was not without some foundation. Sir Robert is in danger—he stands on ground most delicate—his position is actually between two fires—a people maddened by the prospect of famine on the one hand, monopolists grown desperate amid increasing danger on the other. There is a division in the Ministerial camp—some would do things by halves—others would go to work like men, and would do full justice to a panic-stricken population. The Premier begins to find his brethren in arms but shaky, and wavering supporters in his hour of need. He needs aid and sympathy—he invokes public opinion to the rescue. His competency to stand out the storm, and win the victory for justice over landlordism, to a very great extent depends on the people themselves. If he retains the reins of Government, it is for them to strengthen his hands, and hail him on to the final blow at the Corn Laws; if he resigns, it is still for them to bring him back to power again, as the acknowledged vindicator of Free Trade and liberator of industry. We repeat it, the matter rests with them. The moment is a golden one, and must not, should not be lost. Meetings should be called, resolutions passed, petitions to the throne prepared, and full vent given to the feelings, wishes, and hopes of the population. Let the nation rise in its might and majesty, and in a voice of thunder bid the Minister give the death-stroke to this monstrous, unnatural, and irreligious system. Free Traders of Nottingham, now is the time for action. Procrastination were treason to yourselves, to your principles, to your age. We call upon you in the name of truth, justice, and humanity, to arouse yourselves. Meet—speak—resolve—petition! Let not another week elapse without such a demonstration of your feelings as shall give increased power and influence to your principles. To work then in earnest—raise another, and as we think it will be a FINAL, protest against that system which is the foe alike of all—which forbids the free course of the Creator's bounty—which fattens the few, whilst it starves the many—and which bases the fancied prosperity of England's nobles on England's pauperism, misery, and discontent.

(From the Leicester Mercury.)

At present the rumoured and much looked for Order in Council for suspending the Corn Laws and opening the ports for the admission of foreign grain, has not been issued. Cabinet Councils have been held from day to day, and fierce discussions, it is said, have marked their deliberations, but hitherto no result has transpired. The Duke of Wellington and Lord Stanley, it is reported, hold out strongly against the Premier, and are the cause of this criminal delay on his momentous question. In the meantime, the nation become more dissatisfied at the pusillanimity and indecision of ministers and more importunate for decisive measures. The Council of the Manchester Chamber of Commerce, and several municipal bodies, have agreed to addresses, urging upon Government the instant opening of the ports. The more general and unanimous this expression of opinion, the better; and if a public meeting of the inhabitants is not to be convened in this town for the purpose, we think the Town Council of Leicester would only be fulfilling its duties for the public welfare by adopting an address for the suspension and total repeal of the Corn Laws—the subject which now agitates the length and breadth of the land.

(From the Whitehaven Herald.)

Little is heard, now-a-days, from one end of Ireland to the other, but speculations on the probabilities of dying with hunger in consequence of the partial failure of the potato crop, and the various means of averting the threatened calamity.

The Irish peasants may exercise patience under oppression and political degradation—they have done so; but it is madness to expect them to wait for food. The claims of hunger are imperative—they must and will be heard. Let the Government see to it. "Delays are as dangerous" as opening the sea-gates for the admission of food for a season only is a phantom. This was done in 1826, and in 1828 the deplorable sliding-scale was enacted. What is wanted, and what must, in the very nature of things, sooner or later, come to pass is a mutual and uniform foreign trade—one which is not subject to the mere accidents of ice and rain, but which is unfettered and free from restrictive imposts, and subject to no scale but that of nature and common justice. It is not enough that the ports should be opened, but that they should be kept open.

(From the Sunderland Herald.)

The one great emergency subject of public agitation is the contemplated Order in Council for the admission of foreign corn. Towards the close of last week a rumour extensively prevailed that such an Order would be immediately issued, and grain and flour admitted at the following scale of duties:

Wheat, 4s.; barley, 2s.; oats, 1s.; beans and peas, 2s. per quarter; and flour 2s. per sack. The Cabinet Council, however, met at Sir Robert Peel's on Friday, and broke up, after an unusually long sitting, apparently without having arrived at any decision on the subject. On Monday and Tuesday they again met, and yesterday (Thursday) afternoon another meeting was to take place at the Premier's residence in Whitehall Gardens. What their decision may be is extremely doubtful. It is obvious that there is a great difference of opinion prevailing in the Cabinet, and it is difficult to ascertain what would be the effect of the measure. No doubt a very extensive reduction would follow in the prices of all kinds of provisions, and it is probable that there would be an increased exportation of manufactured goods to the Continent; but a large and sudden drain of bullion in payment for foreign corn might seriously derange the monetary interests of the country, arrest every description of speculation, and bring distress and ruin in its train. The necessities of the people now, however, imperiously demand that the Corn Laws shall be virtually repealed. Last year the Government might have established Free Trade, and conferred upon the nation an incalculable boon: now they must carry out League principles, eat their own past words, and disgrace their political character, or permit famine to stalk through Ireland, and scarcity to prey upon the vitals of England. Memorials have been presented to Government from the Hull Town Council, the Manchester Chamber of Commerce, the Trades of Glasgow, the Edinburgh Town Council, and other public bodies in the country, urging the propriety of immediately opening the ports to foreign corn; and we trust that their example will be followed by the Corporation of Sunderland at its ensuing quarterly meeting. No man with a wise head and benevolent heart will advocate the continued action of a law which will speedily bring upon our fellow-countrymen in Ireland the horrors of a famine. It is stated to be the intention of Government to assemble Parliament this month.

(From the Tyne Mercury.)

It is not known that various Cabinet Councils have been held to consider of means for mitigating the enormous sufferings of the people during the scarcity of food which is now impending over the whole empire. It is now known that these Councils have led to no result—that, as far as the Government is concerned, famine may march unchecked over unfortunate Ireland, and in a less degree over England herself. Whilst in all other European countries steps are taken to counteract the failure of the potato crop, and the bad condition of the wheat crop, in Great Britain and Ireland, which need interference most, nothing is done. The aristocracy's feasts and games go on, whilst the poor perish. The excuse for this heartless cruelty is, we know, that the average prices of grain are not high; and that any opening of ports would be perilous in the existing state of public feeling, inasmuch as the landlords might find themselves in the predicament of Milton's Satan, who opened the "infernal gates," but—

"To shut excelled his power!"

This is the true reason of the repugnance of the Cabinet to do their duty in this crisis, for the excuse of the prices of grain is (as they well know) hollow. The "sliding-scale" system confounds high prices with dearth; but this is a gross fallacy. When crops are deficient, but good in quality, the scale has some justice, or, at least, some common sense in it; but when the mischief is in quality rather than in quantity, the whole is a cruel delusion. The prices of grain are low because the bulk in the market is so wretched as to yield, and condition as to be dear at almost any price. Hence wheat, though really dear, is nominally cheap, a fact which any one may satisfy himself by marking the prices at which fine old wheat is selling. And here we have another proof of the cruelty of these laws. It is known that there are in bond about 300,000 quarters of fine old wheat, for which fair prices might at once be had, were it at the market. But, alas! the averages are such as to keep the duty at 17s. the quarter. With such a duty as this, the importers cannot sell it in bond, and the consequence is that it is now going over to Belgium, free of duty, whilst Ireland and England are rapidly approaching a state of famine. No words of ours can aggravate the view which these statements give of the system prevailing here. Our consolation is, that a state of things so monstrous cannot last. A few weeks will bring Sir Robert Peel to a full sense of the position in which he stands. There can be no doubt of the dreadful failure of the potato crop all over the kingdoms; and this being so, no one who knows the actual state of these kingdoms need be at a loss what to expect before the first day of January, 1846.

(From the Durham Chronicle.)

The atrocious laws which have inflicted so much injury on this country by crippling and fettering its trade and commerce, and produced so much misery to the population by limiting their supplies of food, seem at length to have their doom sealed both by God and man. Year after year our leading statesmen have admitted that the question of Corn Law repeal was one of time only, and was deferred merely in compliment to existing prejudices, and in tenderness to interests that had grown up and been fostered and nurtured under legislative protection. While statesmen thus faltered and paused in their career of justice to the community, and monopolists lingered over their darling privilege of starving the people to promote their own aggrandizement, Divine Providence has interposed, in a manner so marked and terrible, as to preclude the possibility of misconception, and to enforce the speedy granting of an act of justice already too long withheld from an injured and oppressed people. The first notes of warning were sounded when the heavens rained repeal, and the harvest was proved to be deficient in quantity and inferior in quality. Another alarming intimation was the fact that the harvest throughout Europe was in like manner a failure, and that no relief could be hoped for from that quarter. To complete the alarm, the potato crop in Ireland, on which the people of that country almost wholly depend for subsistence, is threatened with destruction. These combined causes of dismay have at length roused the attention of our slumbering Government, and a Cabinet Council was summoned to meet on Friday last, to consult what was to be done to meet the threatened emergency. It was generally anticipated that an Order in Council would be forthwith issued to throw open the ports to the free admission of grain, as has been done by several of the Continental governments. Much disappointment was felt when Friday's Gazette came out without any such order; but it appears that the discussions in the Cabinet have been prolonged much more than was anticipated. Ministers resumed their sitting on Saturday, and have continued to meet every day, and were still sitting yesterday (Thursday) afternoon. There can be no doubt that the Premier, and many of his colleagues, clearly see the justice, and feel the imperative necessity of availing themselves of the present necessity, and abolishing at once and for ever the abominable laws which limit the supply and enhance the price of the people's food. But it is understood that the Iron Duke, and two or three of his colleagues, are not willing to consent to this act of plain and evident justice; and the utmost they will consent to is a further modification of the iniquitous Corn Laws. We cannot for a moment doubt that Peel and his friends will prevail. No man having the slightest reputation as a statesman will hesitate as to the course to be pursued; and with the moral force of the country to sustain him, the head of the Government may easily and safely set at defiance the military dictator and his confederates. Not a day passes but testimonies of the all but universal feeling against the Corn Laws pour in upon us. One of the latest, and from the judicial station (so far removed from politics) and high position of the party, one of the most important of these testimonies, is that of Mr. Justice Coleridge, who, at a recent agricultural meeting, at which he presided, declared in effect that the Corn Laws could not stand any longer; that the increasing population of the country must be fed; and that the abolition of monopoly need not be looked upon with the slightest alarm, for while the manufacturing interests of the country prospered the British corn-grower would always find customers at remunerative prices.

The condemnation of the Corn Laws being now pronounced by men of all classes—echoed by the representatives of the agriculturists, and admitted to be inevitable by monopolists themselves—we hold it to be an absolute impossibility for any minister, any government, or any legislature to maintain them any longer.

(From the Blackburn Mercury.)

The food question continues, and will be till settled, the question of the day. No other topic challenges the right of this one to occupy the chief place in the public mind; for the nonce, however great their merits, and strong their claims, they are content to remain in abeyance. Till it is settled, we may not be unprofitably employed in noting the varied phases this all-important question may assume.

The past week has been one of intense anxiety to the country. Eight days ago hope was in the ascendant. The notorious Free Trade convictions of Sir Robert Peel—the imperative necessity of the case—the peril to which the commercial interests of the country, and the prosperity and comfort of the masses were exposed, the justice of the abrogation of the Corn Laws, and the apparent recognition on the part of Ministers of the necessity for prompt action, indicated by the summoning of a Privy Council, all conspired to incite the fond hope that deliverance from present difficulties and threatened calamities was at hand. But the prospects of the country, though sufficiently gloomy to fill everybody else with painful apprehension, do not yet seem sufficiently dark to move Ministers to action. Already famine prices are telling on the community. Trade is daily worsening; but the people can stand a great deal more ere they are dangerous. There are yet no symptoms of rioting or rick-burning, and Ministers take the matter coolly. A week ago there was little or no fear expressed or felt that the Cabinet Council would at once, and without hesitation, release the country from the pernicious influence of the famine laws—whose menace alarmed everybody—whose continuance was defended or urged by nobody. But the country has been disappointed. No good reason (or bad either) was conceived or expressed why the Ministry should hesitate. The highest monopolist authorities imperiously dictated the propriety and necessity of applying the "anomalous remedy" of opening the ports to the "anomalous" evil of scarcity of food. Government has as yet heeded not. "Providence" Himself, whose dictation to apply the desired remedy is admitted by the monopolist organs—vainly essays to teach Ministers their duty. They have met, and met, and met again; but nothing has been authoritatively announced as the result of their deliberations. Why do they hesitate? Their credulous dupes, the tenant farmers, are completely unhooded, the trickery is fully disclosed—the landlords are resigned, and declare "the game up"—the patient enduring John Bull may well be considered on the verge of dangerous—humanity imperatively demands prompt action. But in thick blindness to their own interests, utterly reckless of the public weal, the vultures will not be scared from their prey. They have the opportunity of voluntarily rising from it—they can do so with grace—they must do so, or speedily be driven from it in disgrace, covered with shame, their public characters overwhelmed in ruin—their memories to be pickled in endless infamy.

(From the Coventry Herald and Observer.)

The Times has more than once dubbed the present administration, the "do-nothing ministry." The description is now more apt than ever; for with a necessity for promptitude and energy of action so pressing, that all parties in the country are compelled to see it, her Majesty's ministers

"Soundly sleep the night away,
And just do nothing all the day."

And it is plain that nothing but the angry and ominous rumblings of discontent throughout the kingdom—the symptoms of the rebellion of the belly, will move them from this state of inaction.

The barren termination of three long Cabinet meetings has naturally given rise to the speculative inquiry as to who is responsible? Is Sir Robert Peel quailing under the frowns of the obstructives in the Cabinet?—is he performing a monody over his pet bantling, the sliding-scale, previous to preparing its elegy?—or is the disastrous state of suspense in which he has left things meant to convey to the country the hint, that he merely waits for the pressure from without to furnish him with a pretext for once more avowing his own "individual responsibility" for the policy of the state, taking as the common phrase is, "the bull by the horns," and at once getting rid of one of his greatest "difficulties" by putting in the plea of necessity for its excision.

Whatever may be the cause of this stand still in the Cabinet—whether it be that one part of her Majesty's horses are pulling one way, and the other in a contrary direction, while the fore-horse is laying down his ears and inclining to kick over the traces or upset the state waggon altogether, the course which the people ought to adopt is self-evident. They have waited in the hope, that with Ireland already almost in a state of mutiny for food, and the other parts of the empire with a not very distant prospect of the same condition before them; with prices of almost every article of common consumption rising; trade and employment waning, and a money panic not impossible, these facts alone were enough to impress ministers with the conviction that the letting such things alone—the do-nothing policy would suffice no longer. The Cabinet, however, has shown itself infatuated enough to believe that all these evil symptoms may pass on without an effort at amelioration. Her Majesty's advisers have met, and met, and met again, and separated on the resolve to do nothing at present; and it therefore remains now for the people to enforce their own case, and awaken Peel and his associates from the lethargy in which they seem inclined to indulge too long. There ought to be no delay in memorialising for an instant opening of the ports for the admission of foreign grain, while a chance remains of enlarging the supply of food by such an expedient; and as example is always influential, we trust that the town council of our own city will not hesitate to represent the claims of its inhabitants. We are glad to perceive that the movement has already commenced in some quarters; but although Coventry cannot be first, it would be a wise and commendable course if one of the earliest steps of the corporation at its first quarterly meeting, were to adopt a memorial for the making such an Order in Council, as it had been thought would issue from the late Cabinet meetings, but which meetings from some cause or other have ended in inaction.

(From the Kendal Mercury.)

Three Cabinet Councils have been held since our last, each of which has broken up without the ministers coming to any conclusion on the important question whether the ports are to be opened. A fourth was summoned for Thursday, but the result has not, of course, yet reached us. It is said that the Duke of Wellington continues obstinate on the subject of the Corn Laws, and we fear that the rumour is correct, from the difficulty that the Cabinet have experienced in their deliberations. A law that requires to be suspended must be a bad law; and with grain at the present high price, and the prospect of a very limited supply, we cannot see what ground of hesitation can exist. The thought of scarcity recalls all the horrors of the winter two years ago, and inasmuch as the self-regulating power of the sliding-scale seems to have come to an end, it is the imperative duty of our ministers to step in with a bold and decided measure of relief. The Dublin correspondent of the Morning Chronicle says, that the Duke of Leinster had formally stated to the Lord Mayor that Parliament would be called together immediately. We should have been well satisfied with an Order in Council, but if the Cabinet are not agreed, or if the Premier shrinks from the responsibility, he is bound to submit the matter to Parliament without delay.

(From the Hull Advertiser.)

The agriculturists' organ, the Mark Lane Express, unites with THE LEAGUE, the Times, and the Morning Chronicle, in ringing the knell of the Corn Laws. All attempts to cajole and deceive the farmers are now at an end, even in Mark Lane. "Protection," cries the farmers' oracle of Monday, "is gone for ever: the Corn Laws are doomed. [Our very words!] Those laws have done their work of deception: the farmer pays double, treble, quadruple his former rents. The peasants have been deprived of their rights of common and pasture. The wages of labour have been squeezed to the lowest point. All the objects of the law makers have been carried out—why continue the "bubble" or the "trickery" any longer? The political Pecksniff may gain credit by becoming suddenly compassionate to the poor Irish, deprived of their potatoes. No doubt the repeal will be asked for as a temporary expedient, like the income tax; but, when once granted, it will be as permanent. If the ports are ever opened by law, free of duty, they will never be shut again. No more protection will ever be given. High rents have been obtained under the pretext of protection, and they will be continued when that pretext is given up. To be sure, this has a queer aspect, and may be called by an awkward name, something like "obtaining money under false pretences: but what will legislators care for that? They have effected their objects. Rents are secured, and Government influence in the hands of their very good friends. As to tenant-farmers, who care for them? They may bark; they cannot bite." Moderate men have frequently complained of the serious charges preferred against the landlords by the members of the Anti-Corn-Law League, and it was only this week that we heard a most respectable clergyman of the Church of England express his belief that the repeal of the Corn Laws was retarded by the violence of the Free Traders. But on what occasion did even Mr. Bright charge the landlords with acts so immoral as are here advanced against them by the accredited organ of the agriculturists? Files of THE LEAGUE newspaper are to be found in every village and hamlet in the north of England, but we defy the most careful reader of it to discover a passage bearing so hardly upon the landlord-legislators of Great Britain and Ireland as the one which we have quoted above from the last number of the Mark Lane Express. For what is the purpose of it? Simply that the Corn Laws were never intended for any other purpose than to defraud the tenant-farmer, plunder the labourer, and establish a Government known to the landlords themselves to be an organised hypocrisy! We have never said anything half so bad as this of the supporters of the Corn Laws. Some of them we knew to be dishonest, but the majority we held to be labouring under a delusion, which time and increased information would not fail to dissipate. The Corn Laws are doomed; but their doom is not the result of any treason on the part of the Legislature, but of increased knowledge of the real tendency and effect of these laws. It is not that the Premier and his supporters are more dishonest, but that the people of England are better informed upon the merits of the corn question than they were seven years ago. The League undertook the national enlightenment with respect to the policy of Free Trade, and the doom of the Corn Laws is a legislative attestation of the success of the great Manchester Confederacy. The triumph is that of truth, and not of hypocrisy. In opposing the League, the Tory members of the Legislature found themselves compelled to study the Free Trade question. It would not do to meet such men as Cobden, Villiers, Bright, and Thompson, with a parrot-like recitation of current commonplaces, unsupported by facts or figures; and, consequently, a full inquiry became essential. This settled the business. Truth was elicited by such inquiry. Honest men, like Captain Rous and Mr. Bickham Escott, became convinced that the maintenance of the Corn Laws involved the starvation of the people, and they shrank from the moral responsibility of any longer supporting such a system. They yielded to increased knowledge, and to a paramount sense of public duty. We admit that no such apology can be offered for the Premier. Sir Robert Peel understood the Corn Law question seven years ago just as well as he does now, and he accepted office with a full knowledge that their repeal was sooner or later inevitable. Still, as he has not deceived us, we are not called upon to join the Mark Lane Express in exposing the tor-tuosity of his proceedings. We leave the Premier to be dealt with according to the good pleasure of those Tory friends who shouted so lustily for him at the last general election.

(From the Bath Journal.)

The people, under the fearful apprehension of a famine in Ireland, and a near approach to it in England, are calling on Government to open the ports. This only remedy which the menaced danger suggests has been readily adopted by other Governments from their own foresight; but in this country of laudocratic thralldom, where the Government has no will of its own, Sir Robert Peel holds meeting after meeting of the Privy Council, as though he tried to solicit from his inflexible masters a concession to some degree or other. The meetings of the Cabinet have thrown no light on the subject as yet. If they terminate not in freely opening the ports, under circumstances of deficiency, not only at home but abroad, when the earliest advantage should be taken of the rapidly rising markets of Europe, Sir Robert Peel will prove himself, in moral courage, inadequate to the present emergency, or unperceptive of the national exigencies. We were in hopes that we should last week be enabled to congratulate our readers on a termination to the present fears and dreadful suspense of the people; but we have yet to wait another week, and for perhaps an equally fruitless result. Were we to prophesy for a wager, it would be that the Privy Council meetings will come to nothing; and if so, the League will obtain its triumph by a fearful penalty of privation, disease, and death, and the people goaded by hunger to rebellion.

(From the Dover Chronicle.)

The rumour respecting an Order in Council for the opening of the ports for foreign grain is not yet realised. It is generally understood, however, that the subject has been most earnestly deliberated on in Council, the difference of opinion being not so much the expediency of issuing the order, which for the most part was admitted, but the conditions which should be attached to the order. The fixed duty which was talked about, viz., 4s. on wheat, 2s. on barley, we take to be, under the emergencies of the case, excessive and harsh. The peculiar position in which we are placed, with regard to our supply of home grown food, while demanding the immediate suspension of the Corn Law of 1842, demands also what alone will make that suspension available—the adoption of every measure that will facilitate the importation of corn from foreign countries. The transfer of food from the granaries of the world to the bellies of our population should be expedited by all possible means and contrivances, and every impediment and obstacle scrupulously removed.

This is no time for paltering policy, evasive tricks, or Peel temporising. Scarcity is beginning to make itself felt in this portion of the realm; while Ireland, that devoted country, is strongly menaced with all the calamities gaunt famine brings in its train. Now, if ever, are vigorous measures called for, and public opinion must prick the sides of the Premier's intent. The enactment of a 4s. duty under the prospects before us would be a monstrous piece of cruelty, and the Order in Council a horrid mockery; and if it were once established by Government, and acknowledged (as doubtless it would, as that body is constituted at present) by the Legislature, it would procrastinate to an indefinite period the final settlement of the great question. The voice of the country must ding back into the Premier's ears his own grand argument against a fixed duty—that it never can be maintained in seasons of scarcity; and warn him against its adoption at the present time.

It ought to be a source of congratulation to Sir Robert Peel, that Providence, in its wise designs, has given him an opportunity of getting rid of that patched up and blundering piece of legislation, his Corn Bill of 1842. Its first operation was to injure the farmers, without benefiting the community. The bounteous harvest of that year, and those of the two years succeeding—which spread plenty over the land, and gladdened the home of the artisan and operative with abundant labour and generous wages—were, of course, independent of its enactment; while, in assuming the power of establishing a minimum price of wheat, on which the farmer's rent was founded, but which exceeded by 35 per cent. the price he got for it, it has crippled his resources and wasted his substance. And now the year of scarcity, against which it was to guard us most effectively, has arrived, and finds us totally unprepared to meet its rigours. The new sliding-scale has failed in every one of its objects; it has impoverished the farmer; it has endangered, it is still endangering, the prosperity of the whole country: it has encouraged the gambler and speculator; and now, in our time of need, has established a prohibitory duty of 16s. per quarter. Arguments, which have been urged over and over again by Corn Law repealers, are now substantiated by the most stubborn and glaring facts; and minds which would not open themselves to the former have been taken unwilling captives by the latter—to what end is not yet seen.

(From the Kent Herald.)

The great point then is not to open the ports—but to keep them open, to "set our backs against the gates," as Mr. Cobden forcibly expresses it, "to prevent them ever being shut again." With the ports permanently open, the corn-growing countries would cultivate for our market, commerce would increase, the home market thrive as it always does when commercial activity prevails, and the people would be exempt from the casualties of seasons, and rendered independent of the vicissitudes of our proverbially fickle climate. To restrict trade is manifestly to thwart the intentions of Providence.

(From the Devonport Independent.)

An adjourned Cabinet Council has been held, but no Order in Council has yet appeared on the subject of foreign corn. When it was reported that the duty was about to be suspended, a very general impression was created that it was news "too good to be true," and so we fear it will prove. The step is too wise to be made by the ministry of monopoly; the measure is too bold for Peel. At the present time its value would be more for the principle it would establish, than as a remedy for scarcity. Other nations by all accounts are as short in their supply as ourselves. It is the peculiar felicity of the sliding scale that it keeps out corn when other countries have it to sell, and ensures our having none when we want to buy. The utmost that can be expected is a reduction of the duty on American grain, such as Indian corn, for Irish consumption, and even this seems doubtful.

Sir Robert Peel has been suffering from an attack of gout, but is said to be recovering. We trust his health will soon be perfectly re-established, for the crisis will require all the energy that can be found in the Cabinet to meet it. The day of Wellington is past, and neither Graham nor Stanley is equal to a great emergency; in a case in which he can coerce his own party there is much to be expected from the Premier, but nothing when his party can coerce him.

(From the Western Times.)

The hopes which were formed last week of Cabinet interference with the baneful sliding scale, have proved to have been most painfully fallacious. The Council has assembled three times at the house of Sir Robert Peel, who is confined with the gout; the deliberations have been protracted, for the meetings are reported to have lasted several hours, but of what may be the result nothing is yet known. Whether Sir Robert Peel will suspend the operation of the sliding scale, which won't slide at the very time he wants it, by opening the ports and going to Parliament for a bill of indemnity, or whether he will assemble Parliament instantly and ask for a legislative enactment on the subject, was, up to the last post, a matter of uncertainty. He cannot be unconcerned or indifferent at the condition of the country, or the prospect of the coming winter; bread is rising to a famine price, and yet such is the effect of the sliding-scale that the duty does not fall in any proportion to the increase in the price of bread, for a great quantity of the wheat which is brought into the market cannot be made into bread without a large mixture of valuable wheat, which has the effect of keeping down the returns of prices, and consequently keeping up the amount of duty. Ireland, which depends so mainly on the potato crop, is bordering upon a state of absolute famine, and the same evil threatens England—and yet the minister does nothing. In the meantime foreign Governments, more alive to the awful state of the crisis, have promptly invited supplies of food for their people, and corn actually in bond on our own shores, driven away by the sliding-scale, has been taken to our more fortunate neighbours. The minister, tied up by his pledges, cannot act—but what will the people do? We hope they will assemble in every town, and, by strong memorials, remonstrate with, and quicken on the hesitating steps of an incompetent Government. We trust that Exeter will take her usual post in the van in a crisis like this, and that some vigorous steps will be immediately adopted to further that appeal on behalf of the nation, which is going up from other places.

(From the Ipswich Express.)

We adhere to our opinion, that Sir Robert Peel will not, by his own act, put the coup de grace to the Corn Laws by an Order in Council, without the sanction of Parliament; unless, indeed, circumstances should render such a course absolutely irresistible.

Sir Robert Peel does not like to take so important a step without the justification of high prices; and the moment wheat obtains a famine price, the duty will descend to one shilling! Sir Robert says that there is nothing in the price of food to call for such a desperate measure as an Order in Council; but the fear is, that by the time prices attain such a height as to cause the duty to slide down to 1s. per quarter, there will be no corn left for us to purchase. Now or never; if the duty were now 3s. or 4s. we should receive a tolerably large supply of food; but if we refuse to admit it at the present juncture, the probability is, that a few weeks' hence it will be futile to lower the duty; there will be no food in the market. We must not forget that for some months past the ports of Belgium have been open, and that exportation has been prohibited; the crops have partially failed in several countries on the Continent; and many states which have heretofore exported grain will require more than their own growth to supply their wants.

As an offset to this, however, it must be stated that the wheat crops in Canada have been peculiarly abundant this year, and large supplies can be drawn from that colony. The United States also are capable of supplying us to almost any extent we may require with Indian corn or maize, next to wheat the most nutritious kind of grain. It would be highly desirable to introduce Indian corn into general consumption in Ireland, in order that the wretched peasantry should no longer be exclusively dependant upon potatoes. Sir Robert Peel's attention has recently been called, by the Chamber of Commerce, Manchester, to the utility of this valuable esculent. Lord Heytesbury, the lord-lieutenant of Ireland, is actively employed in disseminating advice relative to the preservation of the potato-crop, and acquiring accurate information respecting the amount of food for the people. We think we may infer from the hints thrown out by this shrewd diplomatist, that Parliament will certainly be called upon to legislate upon this subject. The recent declarations of Captain Rous, Mr. Escott, Lord Ashley, and Mr. Justice Coleridge, all indicate a change which is gradually taking place in the feelings of the nation on the subject of protective duties. We should deceive our readers if we affected to disbelieve the words of Lord Ashley, "Their destiny is fixed." Whether we shall come at once to a total and unconditional repeal, or to a very low fixed duty, is perhaps uncertain; but we look upon it as a matter beyond all doubt and question, that the present Corn Law is irrevocably ruined. Too long has the great food question been made a party cry—a mere political squabble. It is for the interest of the nation that it should be speedily and finally settled. We trust to the providence of God to mitigate the perils of a scarcity of food; but should want come upon us, should our provision fail, and the horrors of famine visit any portion of the kingdom, it must not be forgotten that Sir Robert Peel had the opportunity of obtaining supplies at moderate prices in the beginning of the month of November, by issuing an Order in Council for opening the ports.

(From the Bristol Gazette.)

Although each succeeding day's advices afford the most distressing corroboratory intelligence of the spread of the potato murrain, and although the fact is pressed strongly upon the attention of the Executive (particularly in Ireland) by the scientific men employed by themselves to investigate the nature and extent of the injury, the Government remains in a state of helpless imbecility and inactivity, apparently bewildered and confounded by the magnitude of the impending calamity. After the vacillation, doubt, and timidity displayed during the past week, it would be idle for the public to expect decision and energy at the hands of our rulers. The public, then, must trust to their own exertions. There is an old proverb, "The woman who hesitates is lost." The truth of the saying is equally applicable to a Cabinet. The time for deliberation is past: the time for action is come. To dally further with a catastrophe of so frightful a character as that of famine—famine, too, in the dark inclement season of winter—is worse than folly; it is a crime of the deepest dye. We have received letters from numerous correspondents, pressing the matter on the immediate attention of the Town Council to make such representations as may spur ministers to exertions. Our correspondents have but limited means of knowing, till our publication of this evening, that the subject was mooted at the meeting on Monday. They will see, and seeing will not be surprised, that there was a squeamish delicacy in approaching a subject which appears to involve (though in reality it does not) "party" or "political" considerations; and this at a moment when all the energies of party, or rather of the two contending factions of one party, were prepared to contest for the baubles of office. Whether the motion was or was not brought on judiciously as respects time and preparation is not the question. This is not an occasion to stand on points of punctilio and etiquette. Other corporations have already moved. At Gateshead, so strong was the imperative necessity of the case felt, that the standing orders were suspended, and a memorial petitioning for throwing open the ports, unanimously agreed to. At Newcastle, a similar affected opposition to that of Bristol was overborne, and the petition agreed to. Even Sunderland, with all the prestige of Mr. Hudson's return fresh upon it, has taken the same course. Other places also are rapidly moving. Bristol, which ought to have led, must now, as usual, follow; but we do hope it will follow speedily. Let there be a special meeting called, due notice given, and let the discussion take place on the merits of the case, and not on any trumpety points of precedence or party.

(From the Norwich Mercury.)

The current of the national thought has never been directed with deeper intensity, nor with greater anxiety to any one subject, than it has been towards the decision of the Cabinet upon opening the ports. Of course in proportion as the decision has been delayed, the hopes and fears of the most anxious of either party have risen above temperate or fallen towards zero. In the meanwhile the moderates, who after all are the barometers regulating and directing the great bulk of the community, continue in the steadfast belief either that the Cabinet intend to await the result of further inquiries before they decide on any step, or that it has determined to summon Parliament and leave the decision of so important a question in the hands of the National Council—while those who take the higher and better ground, consider that Sir Robert Peel ought to make the question a sine qua non, and if he be beaten, either dissolve and obtain the national will through an election, or place his resignation in the hands of Her Majesty. A Minister of a high mind would take one of these latter courses. It would be the very acme of madness to suppose that any Minister, however inclined to uphold his own plans, however strongly wedded to party or to place—much more Sir Robert Peel, would, in the present admitted state of the national food, risk the danger with which a much higher price would threaten, not only England, but the United Kingdom. Are they, who in the warmth of their delight at the non-appearance of the anticipated Order in Council, exclaimed, "He dare not open the ports"—are they, we ask, prepared to jeopardise not only that present manufacturing prosperity, in whose advantages they have largely participated, but the internal peace of the entire kingdom, by upholding such a course? It is in vain to exclaim, "Corn is not yet at famine price"—"it is not more than remunerative." The question is not whether it be either the one or the other; but whether, with an admitted under-average crop at home—an admitted very short crop, if not worse in those countries from whose resources we have been accustomed to draw our needful supplies—with the daily increasing knowledge of the almost total destruction of the potato-crop, not only in Ireland, but both in England, Scotland, and on the Continent, with the additional information now obtained from Sweden and other countries, that the harvest is an almost total failure, delay is not hourly adding to the danger? Would these gentlemen have Government wait, with stern winter fast approaching, before we husband those resources which are within our grasp. It is not a matter of a few more or a few less shillings per quarter in the pockets of the landlord or the farmer, but whether a nation is or is not to be placed within the very verge of starvation. It is not whether a Corn Law or an Anti-Corn Law party is to be in the ascendant—whether a Peel, a Russell, or a Richmond is to be Prime Minister of England—but whether the national welfare and the national peace is to be hazarded by the adherence to a plan which has failed to fulfil its object, which the bounty of Providence has hitherto rendered powerless for good, but which, when earth has failed in her customary fertility, threatens to add to the evil. No one will venture to deny, that any present danger of an excessive importation would be at this moment incurred by a Free Trade in corn. On the contrary, is it not the universal exclamation, "Corn cannot be cheap this next year." Wherefore then the justice of opposing a proposal which, if carried out to the extent, has only a tendency to prevent a fearful crisis, not even to create a sufficiency, but to avoid a famine?

To trifle with the time is, if not to add to the danger, at least only to put off the evil day until too late for that effective succour of which energetic minds desire to avail themselves. Carpe diem must be the motto of the Minister who would meet such an emergency. He must be bold, undaunted, resolute. Temporising policy, however it may as yet have "served his turn," will not avail Sir Robert Peel in the present exigency. That the state of the nation is imminent, the repeated, long, and apparently inconclusive deliberations of the Cabinet demonstrate. We fear the mighty and commanding mind is wanting which, while it meets the immediate danger, will adopt for English and Irish industry the path which leads to healthy employment, and with it to commercial, manufacturing, and agricultural prosperity.

No measure can be exclusively applied to Ireland. Any plan to be useful must be general. If therefore Sir Robert Peel cannot overcome the reluctance of his colleagues, which rumour asserts to be the Premier's position, the course is plain, and the retention of his present power depends upon the issue. That course is either dissolution or resignation. There is no middle path for any statesman, who in such a crisis would desire to continue the Prime Minister of Great Britain.

(From the Dorset Reporter.)

Meanwhile, the alarm in Ireland occasioned by the failure of the potato crop bears a serious aspect. Meetings have been held, and deputations have waited upon the Lord Lieutenant, but nothing satisfactory has yet been done on the part of Government. Are ministers bent upon trifling with the country at this alarming crisis? We fear, indeed, there is reason to apprehend that they have no intention of suspending the Corn Laws, as the following remarks of the Morning Chronicle too clearly indicate: "The ministerial 'organ,' it will have been seen, is already apologising, by anticipation, for the inaction on which the Government would appear to have resolved. That journal of yesterday gives us pretty clearly to understand that the sliding-scale is to work its will of us. Our contemporary's discoveries that 'corn' is not now 'becoming in England a matter of great anxiety'—that 'the Corn Law of 1842' has not 'been found to be either inoperative or injurious'—that there is no particular connexion between corn in England and potatoes in Ireland; and that Irish cottiers can live on 'employment and wages,' without troubling the English food market—how ever amusing in the abstract, assume a very serious importance when viewed as suggestive of the Government policy which they are put forward as justifying. It is now for the merchants, bankers, railway proprietors, manufacturers, traders, and other industrious classes of the people of this country, to consider whether they are satisfied to wait and see what British scarcity, Irish famine, and the sliding-scale may conjointly bring forth. If they are satisfied, we counsel them to speak plainly, strongly, and at once."

(From the Brighton Guardian.)

Let the Legislature depend upon it, as that master cheat by law-making (Sir Robert Peel) continually says, it cannot meddle with this subject without causing mischief. It has done mischief by its former meddling; and the so-called benevolent attempts now making to remedy the mischief will only add to it. The only cure for the Government to take its rough hand from the delicate machinery of the supply of food—more delicate than the work of any watch-maker, for it is not made by mortal hand. Men are the wheels and pinions on which and by which it works. Far less mischief, therefore, will ensue from an instant abolition of the Corn Laws than from the proposed suspension of their horrible fix. Sir Robert Peel, who made a Corn Law in the year 1842, with all the light of the age, has brought the people into a horrible fix, so that he can neither continue his law, nor alter it, without causing vast mischief. He cannot remedy his own monstrous iniquity. This is a lesson which both law-makers and people ought never to forget, and it ought to make both turn away with scorn and indignation from any and every proposition for legislating about the national subsistence.

(From the Edinburgh Weekly Chronicle.)

There is again something like a panic in the money market—not in railway shares alone, for stock investments of all kinds are affected—the national funds as well as joint-stock shares. The causes alleged are various, but the most apparent are the apprehensions of a scarcity, and the probability that the currency will be contracted by an immediate resort to Free Trade, and large exportations of gold for grain. There is perhaps some ground for this apprehension, but we are mistaken if there is not much more reason to fear the effects of continued restriction. If the ports are not opened promptly, the danger of a derangement of the currency will be tremendously augmented; for the sliding-scale, after it has prevented imports of grain when they might be had at reasonable prices, must slide at last when the average mounts to the famine pitch. The importations then, though perhaps too scanty to supply our wants, will be very effective in draining gold out of the country, and making the crisis more severe than it would be now.

(From the Glasgow Examiner.)

Great excitement prevails regarding the rumoured opening of the ports for the admission of foreign grain. No fewer than three long Cabinet meetings were held last week on the subject; at least the general opinion is that the Council sat on that question. The result is still undivided, and conjecture is various and discrepant on the subject. No one will be the least surprised should the results of the meeting be the entire removal of the duty for a limited period. Sir Robert has influence and daring to accomplish this, and he has now neither party nor political character to lose. Under circumstances less urgent the ports have been temporarily thrown open, and we believe the only cause of hesitancy at present is the consciousness that, if they are once opened, public opinion will prevent them from ever being shut again. Though the removal of duty will not reduce the price to the extent some anticipated, that is no reason for the perpetuity of a tax false in principle, and destructive in practice to the happiness of millions. Should delay take place, the credit Sir Robert would have gained by an immediate and bold step, will be at once ascribed to an urgent necessity.

(From the Glasgow Argus.)

It is the great question of the opening of the ports and the indecision of the Ministry that have combined with the proceedings of the Banks to put a check upon the enterprise of the country, and to fill the timid with alarms for our prospects during the ensuing winter. Let but the ports be opened—let us but know, by that act, that all hesitation has ceased on the part of Sir Robert Peel, and that he will repeal the Corn Laws in the ensuing session of Parliament—and confidence will revive. This great country, left to its own energies and resources, is able to steer a clear course through difficulties fifty-fold greater than any that menace us by the failure of the potato-crop. The bank directors have, we think, done well, not only for their own interests, but for those of the public; and though a check has been put upon speculation for a time, none but the very timid or very roguish speculator will be hurt by it. Let the timid gain courage, and hold what they have got, and no evil will accrue to them; and as for the rogues, if they suffer, it will be so much the better for honest men. To show how absolutely necessary it was for the Bank of England, and the Scottish banks to act as they have done, and that it is ministerial indecision and the Corn Law question which have caused the depression in the funds, we borrow the following from the Morning Chronicle of Friday.

(From the Dundee Advertiser.)

We have yet nothing stronger than conjecture regarding the deliberations or intentions of the Cabinet concerning the state of the country and the Corn Law. Although every day's delay adds to the evil, and to the responsibility of the Prime Minister; yet day after day is the only measure delayed by which there is any chance of a great threatened calamity being mitigated. We would have thought that the past would have established sufficient responsibility without its being increased by that of the future; and that there would have been safety to the minister as well as satisfaction to the country generally in the suspension of a law, which at no time could be so naturally and so gracefully effected as at the present. But up to this time the minister has refused to speak. He acknowledges the receipt of memorials from all quarters, in the shortest possible terms, but by no phrase or word does he deign to signify his opinion of them. It is suggested that he has his difficulties, and that they are of no trifling nature. Political connexions of many years' standing are threatened to be dissolved; and it requires no little decision of character to pronounce the sentence of their instant dissolution. Decision is certainly not the characteristic of the Premier's mind; and we can easily understand his wish to stave off, as long as he can, the hour of disruption among his colleagues; but he has had time to consider all consequences,—to estimate his own risk and that of the country, and it is almost impossible that he has not made up his mind. The people await his decision quietly and confidently. However the members of the Cabinet may act with regard to one another, there is but one measure which will be accepted of by the country.

(From the Stirling Observer.)

We had fondly hoped to have been able this week to announce the opening of the ports for the admission of foreign corn, free of duty, as the Cabinet Council was to meet on Friday last for this purpose; they did meet, but broke up without coming to any conclusion. The Standard announced on Saturday morning that the Council would meet again that night, which they did; but it was quite as futile as that on Friday; the morning papers of Monday contain no account of anything that was done. The Council was to meet again on Monday; but of this we have heard nothing; and thus the fond anticipations of the whole nation, excited to the keenest intensity, are trifled with as if it were a matter of child's play they were debating about, and not the very life of the community, particularly in Ireland. But our space forbids comments. We have no expectation that opening the ports will lower the price of provisions, as so little can be got from the Continent, there being a scarcity there as well as here; and so we have nowhere to look for assistance but Canada and the United States, the former of which will be frozen up before much can be got. One good thing will be effected, however—the very idea that the ports are open, and that English enterprise, industry, and capital are in the market of the world for food, will keep prices down, and at all events prevent them from rising so high as present appearances would indicate.

(From the Ayr Advertiser.)

The all-engrossing topic of conversation and inquiry now has reference to the intentions of the Ministry on the subject of opening the ports for the admission of corn. The food of the people has fallen short. The usual supply which our soil affords has received one of those checks which history teaches us have, in all ages, now and then thrown nations into difficulties, and where the arrangements of the State were defective, have brought down upon them the terrible destruction of famine. Amongst savages a failure of the usual sources of food mows down whole tribes, and even whole nations, in one year. As the aboriginal man rises in the scale of improvement, we see his sources of sustenance become more certain, and less dependant upon the accidental changes of season or climate. It is the triumph of civilisation to secure for every citizen a plentiful supply of all the requisites of life, in food, clothing, and abode; and until that supply is perfect and continual, the arrangements of the country cannot be regarded as having achieved the point which an enlightened people should not rest till they secure.

Our time of trial has come. We are in the condition which has often afflicted this and other countries before, but we are a thousand years in advance of the Heptarchy, and a partial failure of the food of the country is not likely to destroy half the population. Yet the failure of the potato crop, and the insufficient supply of our corn to make up the deficiency, already threatens to cast millions—aye millions—of our countrymen upon the brink, if not into the agonies, of starvation, and what is the moral of this fearful fact? It teaches us that our civilisation, if great, is far from complete. It proves there is "something rotten in the State of Denmark." It calls with a loud voice for national attention, and the nation should not be satisfied until the mischief is probed to its source, and until every human effort is made to lift a rich and populous, and powerful country like Great Britain, as far as human foresight can lift it, beyond the reach of famine.

Can there be two opinions as to the wisdom and justice of such an attempt? Certainly not. The means of effecting it, therefore, become the question. Throw another glance over the world. See the wide-spread fields that supply the ships of the Baltic—see the boundless prairies that invite cultivation in America. In those two directions alone, behold a food factory for treble the whole present population of Europe. If this be doubted, take figures, and be convinced that we have only to adopt our laws to the necessities of our position to ensure a constant, cheap, and ample extra supply of grain. Let capital, industry, and chemistry increase our home supplies as much as possible. The more we grow in our own fields the better; but, as our population has outgrown our present internal supply, should we not obtain what we must purchase as cheaply and plentifully as possible? That is the question which agitated the Cabinet Council held on Friday last. Sir Robert Peel has the gout, and the ministers met at his house in Spring-gardens, and the Duke of Wellington has a great objection to Free Trade, and so nothing came out of the meeting. The decision was postponed. The papers have been full of rumours, the favourite one being that a fixed duty of 4s. is the favourite plan of the Premier, and that the ports are to be open at this duty for six months. We shall see what comes of it; but it is now unhappily notorious that the corn supply of Europe and America is scanty, and, as they do not grow a supply for open ports in England, the prices are likely to be high everywhere. Grain is wanted in Belgium and Holland, and both those countries have been importing free of duty for some time past; Canada has little in store, and that store is said to have been bought up upon the chance of a scarcity. If, therefore, the Ministry, with a starving population, agree to open the ports, and to those ports only high-priced food should come, it will but be one other melancholy proof of the folly and wickedness of not adapting our laws to our real condition—not allowing the corn countries of the world to feed the manufacturing population of Great Britain.

(From the Fife Herald.)

The practical answer to the question—What will Sir Robert Peel do under these circumstances? is meanwhile waited for with "profound and breathless interest." The result of the meetings of the Privy Council, and the question whether or not the ports will be opened, are creating as much anxiety as if on the issue were suspended the question of peace or war. It is confidently believed by many of the thorough Free Traders—who, by the-by, are willing to give the Prime Minister at least as much credit as he deserves for good intentions—that he will see his duty, under the exigencies of the country, to act a decisive and liberal part. Various guesses are afloat as to what he will do. Some parties opine that he will order the ports to be immediately opened, and that grain will be admitted duty free; others, that he will agree in the meantime to a small fixed duty; while some think it probable, that to avoid taking upon himself the responsibility of such a measure as the state of the country would seem to demand, he will order an early meeting of Parliament to take up the question. Whichever of these assumptions is the true one must soon transpire; and the anxiety on the matter will then be set at rest.

In the meantime there is no doubt that Sir Robert Peel and his colleagues are watching with intense concern the current of public opinion on this question; and though we are not so sanguine as to predict the certainty that Ministers will act upon a preponderance of this opinion, yet we are not without hope that the issue may be favourable to our wishes, and that all duty on grain will be abolished. Let us at the least believe so. The eloquent and stirring speeches delivered at the Free Trade Hall, Manchester, by Mr. Cobden and others, are admirably fitted to inspire the Premier with a confident reliance on the support of the country, even if he should have to encounter the heartless opposition and disaffection of the less intelligent and less principled portion of his own friends.

That the Premier will consent to enforce a fixed duty of 4s., 2s., or 1s. on corn, there is not the least ground to surmise. He has all along strenuously opposed a fixed duty; and from his public acts and speeches, it is clear that of the two he has a decided preference for the Free Trade principle. Then is there any danger that he will go "botching and patching" the sliding-scale again—that he will "higgle and langle" and "go tinkering" after his old habits? We should hope not. The sliding-scale is highly unpopular; and though that of itself is not sufficient to condemn it, yet it is proved to be baneful in its effects, and as such must be abandoned. Agitation in favour of Free Trade, however, must by all means be kept up. Now is the time to strike a decisive blow for sound principle. If allowed to pass by unimproved, such an opportunity may not soon occur again. If it should not be determined by the Privy Council to open the ports, it is requisite that such representations of the necessity of this measure should be forwarded as cannot with safety be resisted. Even if the duty on grain should in the meantime be suspended, it is necessary to set vigorously to work in order to prevent its re-imposition. The door of Free Trade once fairly opened, it must be the fault of the people if it be not kept open in all time coming; and to effect this end, it is manifestly necessary that a strong expression of the opinion of all intelligent men should be made on the subject.

(From the Scotch Reformers' Gazette.)

Three Cabinet Councils have been held, at which no doubt the question as to the opening of the ports has been gravely discussed. One of these Councils was summoned on Sunday last, for Monday, which circumstance of itself almost makes it obvious to the country that the Premier considers this as a question of necessity and mercy.

We rather suspect that Sir Robert Peel is now encompassed with difficulties for the first time by some of his own colleagues. Another Cabinet Council (being the fourth) was summoned for Thursday; and probably its decision is disclosed by this time in London, and we may have it in our second edition.

As has been well observed, we hope that the Premier, like Oliver Twist, will at last "pluck up a spirit," and without heeding the depreciation of timidity on the one hand, or the remonstrance of interested selfishness on the other, meet with firmness and courage the exigency of the moment, and immediately and decisively adopt full measures for averting the calamity which impends over us from the conjunction of an injurious policy with hostile skies. Lord John Russell, in the course of last session, urged on the Premier with much earnestness and force of argument the propriety of considering the Corn Laws, with a view to the adoption of a low fixed duty on the foreign product. The time was particularly favourable for the discussion of the subject. Prosperity and tranquillity reigned throughout the country. Heaven had blessed our store, and the means of subsistence were cheap and easy. The noble lord warned his hearers that then was the suitable time to make provision against the day of adversity by amending laws which nature, and reason, and humanity unite to condemn, because they restrict and diminish the supply of the first necessary of life, obstruct the profitable pursuit of trade and commerce, foster ill-feeling between neighbouring states, and tend to controvert the benevolent design of Providence, that the scarcity of one country should be relieved from the abundance of another. The motion was slighted—the Ministry refused to consider the Corn Law. Now it is forced on their consideration by the dire necessity of the strait to which it has reduced us—a result which had been all along foreseen by wiser statesmen. From this we can only now be extricated by a prompt and vigorous coup, and what should have been the work of reflection must now be done out of hand. Had measures been taken last session for the admission of foreign corn, free or at a low fixed duty, Sir Robert Peel would have escaped a difficulty perhaps worse than Ireland, and the public mind would have been spared the alarm and excitement which the prospect of a deficiency in the supply of food for the people has created in all classes.

We trust that these may be speedily allayed by the only reparation it is now possible to make, for opportunities neglected and warnings unheeded, that the ports may be immediately opened for the relief of our impending necessities; and one thing more, let us take care, having got them once opened, to put our backs resolutely against them, so that they may never be closed again.

(From the Kelso Chronicle.)

The country is at present watching the course of public events with nervous anxiety. They see that in the failure of the potato crop and the high price of corn, an opportunity is afforded to Sir Robert Peel of enacting in reference to the Protection Laws that policy which the Whigs announced, and he himself has so far at least adapted on commercial questions. Scarcity threatens our sister island, and bread bids fair in this country to reach a price which will be beyond the power of the poor to pay. The Premier, it is rationally assumed, must yield to the public voice and wants by a temporary suspension of the Corn Laws; and the people have resolved that such relaxation shall be permanent—that industry shall no longer be shackled and bound up in swaddling-clothes, but send round the globe the results of their toil to gladden the hearts of thousands, who will in return supply our necessities, and provide us with the luxurious bounties of nature; in short, that we shall henceforth be permitted to buy in the cheapest and sell in the dearest markets we can find.

The meeting of the League at Manchester last week came most opportunely; and it is gratifying to observe that the Town Council of Edinburgh have memorialised her Majesty to suspend the operation of the Corn Laws, in consequence of the distress at present existing in the country. Nor are other parts of Scotland and England apathetic. We trust that our own neighbourhood will take part in such a trying crisis. If any feel disinclined to bestir themselves from personal interest, they will surely be alive to the gaunt spectre of misery, starvation, and even death, that may be the portion of millions of our fellow-countrymen in Ireland.

What is the remedy? It is simple and natural. Open wide the ports, and admit the bread of the whole world to feed the people! "That," said Mr. Cobden, at Manchester, "is the obvious and natural remedy; that is the remedy which an unenlightened despot would at once fly to. Witness Russia, witness Prussia, witness Germany, Holland, and Belgium; these Governments have not waited, but when their people have been threatened with want they have at once thrown open their ports, and in some cases stopped exportation, in order to supply their people with abundance of the first necessities of life. Why has not our Government taken a similar course? Why have they waited to learn Christianity from the Turk, or humanity from the Russian? Is it because our Government is less merciful than that of the Mahometan Sultan? Is it that our boasted constitutional power is less humane than that of the despot of Russia?"

(From the Kilmarnock Herald.)

The English agricultural mind has been in a dreadful state of perturbation for the last ten days—and no wonder. The fact that they were in hourly expectation of learning that the very ministry who were raised to power specially to uphold the Corn Laws, had swept away the whole system at one blow, renders it no wonder that the "agricultural party" should be somewhat dumfounded and enraged. The shock, however, is so sudden and so severe as apparently to deprive them of the power of resistance or even of utterance. The "Protection Societies," which were to "unmake" the Peel Ministry, and annihilate the League, are mum as mice. A few of what were once the agricultural leaders believe, or pretend to believe, that Sir Robert Peel has no such wicked intention as everybody imputes to him, and are still content to feed upon his promises.

"Alas! unmindful of their doom,

The silly victims play,

No thought have they of ills to come,

No cares beyond to-day."

All those, however, having ordinary shrewdness or common honesty, see things in a different light, and hold a different language. There is excellent sense and truth in the following lamentations in the Mark Lane Express, a pertinacious protectionist and "farmer's friend":

"We doubt not that the fate of the Corn Laws is sealed and certain. It may be postponed till the meeting of Parliament, in order to avoid unnecessary responsibility. Sir Robert Peel is a man of plausibilities, and likes to have a majority of his supporters at his back; who, being returned apparently by the people, and especially by the farmers in their unsuspecting confidence, can help to bear the burden of his derelictions. No doubt the repeal will be asked for as a temporary expedient, like the income-tax; but, when once granted, it will be as permanent. If the ports are ever opened by law, free of duty, they will never be shut again. No more protection will ever be given. The force will be at an end, though not the tragedy. The high rents have been obtained under the pretext of protection, and they will be continued when that pretext is given up. To be sure, this has a queer aspect, and may be called by an awkward name, something like 'obtaining money under false pretences;' but what will the Legislature care for that? They have effected their objects. Rents are secured, and Government influence in the hands of their very good friends. As to tenant farmers, who cares for them? They may bark; they cannot bite. They have placed this very Ministry in office; they have returned as their representatives the very men who are creatures of this Ministry, and who prefer party infinitely beyond consistency or the public good. What, therefore, can the tenant farmers do? Nothing."

"Protection is gone for ever; the Corn Laws are doomed. Those laws have done their work of deception; the farmer pays double, treble, quadruple his former rents. The peasants have been deprived of their rights of common and pasture. The wages of labour have been squeezed to the lowest point. All the objects of the law-makers have been carried out—why continue the 'bubble' or the 'trickery' any longer? The political Pecksniff may gain credit by becoming suddenly compassionate to the poor Irish, deprived of their potatoes. He may give up his sliding-scale, and all protection along with it, as a great sacrifice of a favourite system. He will take credit, doubtless, for it, as well as for repeal; nothing comes amiss to the Joseph Surface of our times. Protection gets him power, and the sacrifice of it keeps him in power. He is equally prepared for both. The leader of the 'farmers' friends' to-day, the advocate of Free Trade to-morrow; consistent to nothing, he makes use of everything. We shall speedily have the changes rung upon the necessity of providing for the poor Irish, as we formerly had upon the necessity of protecting the poor farmers. The same solemnity, the same sincerity."

All this is welcome, though it has been long of coming. Do not those who swear by such papers as the Mark Lane Express remember that, all along the Free Traders have been telling the farmers that the only objects and the effects of the Corn Laws were those very two things announced in the above extract—the raising of rents and the lowering of wages? And when this is confessed by their own organ as the only result of the doomed and departing Corn Law, why, in the name of common sense, should the farmers be called on to lament the blessing of its abolition or attempt the impossibility of its restoration?

(From the Scotsman.)

We are still without the slightest information as to the intentions of the Ministry regarding the Corn Laws and the threatened dearth. The meeting of the Cabinet on Friday was of long duration, and was succeeded by another next day, which lasted for the unusual period of four hours and a half. Nothing whatever has transpired as to the proceedings at these meetings, and it is certain that if any decision has been come to, it would, before this time, have been announced in some form more or less authoritative. On Sunday, summonses were issued for another meeting of the Cabinet on Monday afternoon, the result of which, if any transpired, cannot reach us in time for to-day's paper. When the next post may bring the result, speculation is vain, nor indeed has anything transpired affording data for conjecture. It may, however, be considered certain that the subject regarding which the Cabinet have been summoned, and which has afforded them employment during their three sittings, is the question of meeting the impending national scarcity by a suspension of the Corn Laws. There is no other known question that can be imagined to require such urgent attention, and the fact of all the London press—Tory and Liberal—assuming day after day, without contradiction, that such is the matter under deliberation, is of itself sufficient evidence. It may also be inferred, though not on such clear grounds, that a difference of opinion among the members of the Cabinet is the cause of their lengthened deliberations and repeated adjournments. At the meetings both of Friday and Saturday, all the members of the Cabinet were present, with the exception of one or two of the most insignificant, so that a desire to postpone decision till the opinions of the absent were obtained, could not be the cause of the delay. Neither is the conjecture probable that the delay is made in order to obtain further information regarding the state of the potato crop and the supply of food, seeing that it was impossible that anything like full or decisive information could be procured on Saturday, if it could not be procured on Friday. The most feasible conjecture, therefore, that can yet be formed as to the cause of the long deliberations and the adjournments from day to day, is, that there are dissensions in the Cabinet as to a question which is not only of the highest importance, but the settlement of which hardly admits of a day's delay.

(From the Dumfries Advertiser.)

This is hardly the time to discuss the theory of the Corn Laws. The present crisis calls upon us to determine not whether they should, but whether they can exist. Storm necessity threatens to step in and cut short all argument. The frantic cry of millions in want may soon drown the voices that still speak of protective duties. To this complexion the question of the Corn Law will probably soon come, as we always thought it would come at last. If not given up as a mischief and a wrong, it must be surrendered as an impossibility. So difficult, so impossible, in the end, is it to withstand those great natural laws which God hath given to regulate supply and demand in the articles of human food.

In writing this, we cherish no hostility to the great agricultural interest of this country, in many respects the most precious and important of all. That interest would have been in a more flourishing state had no Corn Law ever existed; and it will flourish more than ever it has done when the Corn Law shall be no more. Fixed and regular, not high and fluctuating, prices are what the British farmer requires to enable him to calculate the proper rent, and derive a permanent profit from the cultivation of the soil. And as to foreign competition, there is a science and an enterprise ready now to be infused into agriculture, were the Corn Law only settled, which would enable him to set all such competition at defiance. A lowering of prices also would lead to an increased consumption and a brisk demand, which could not fail to stimulate his energies, and remunerate him for all new improvements of the soil. This is what farmers generally are now beginning to feel, and they are already as a body more than half resigned to the abolition of a law made to protect, but operating only to tantalize and distract them.

Landlords, we are aware, especially those in embarrassed circumstances, dread the alteration of a system which keeps up, as they think, their present rent-roll. Their fears even if to some extent well-founded, can only entitle them to our pity, mingled with some degree of blame. Such apprehensions cannot be allowed to influence our opinions on a great public question, involving principles of the first importance, and affecting the most urgent interests of the people of these realms. Let the proprietors of land only act as becomes them on such an emergency, as wise and brave men preparing for a storm which may try, but need not overpower their energies, and their interests will not eventually suffer: they will be delivered from much fear, and much odium; and they will benefit themselves and the public, by adding to the food of the country.

NEWCASTLE-ON-TYNE, Nov. 10.—The council of this borough, at their meeting to-day, had their attention called to the apprehended scarcity of food in this country by Sir John Fife, who moved the suspension of the standing orders of the body, to allow the adoption of a memorial to the Privy Council on the subject. The motion was agreed to; and, after an animated discussion, the council adopted the following memorial by a large majority:—

"TO THE RIGHT HON. THE LORDS COMMISSIONERS OF HER MAJESTY'S TREASURY.

"The Memorial of the Council of the Borough of Newcastle-upon-Tyne,

"Sheweth—That, with the prospect of distress amongst the humbler classes of society in the United Kingdom, more especially in Ireland, from the result of the late harvest, your memorialists are convinced of the expediency of opening the ports of the United Kingdom to the free importation of grain.

"Your memorialists, therefore, entreat your lordships to take the necessary steps for opening the ports."

The Gateshead council also met to-day, and adopted a similar memorial to Sir Robert Peel.

SUNDERLAND, TUESDAY, Nov. 11.—Yesterday the annual meeting of the corporation of this borough was held at the police court. There was an unusually numerous attendance. After electing Mr. Robert Brown, solicitor, mayor for the ensuing year, and transacting other business,

Mr. R. FRENCH called the attention of the council to the desirability of presenting a memorial to her Majesty's Government, requesting them to issue an order in council, authorising the free importation of grain and other provisions. (Applause.) This was a duty which they owed to themselves, to the town, and the community at large, for the deficiency of the late harvest, and the disease in the potato crop rendered such a step essentially necessary for the continued welfare and safety of the country. He therefore moved that such a memorial be forthwith prepared by the town-clerk, and forwarded to the Government.

Alderman GREGORY seconded the motion, which was supported by Mr. Moody, Alderman Brown, Messrs. A. J. Moore and Featherstonhaugh, and carried unanimously amidst loud cheers.

PRECEPT AND PRACTICE.

(From the Gateshead Observer.)

Sir James Graham, ever ready to profit by political changes, is preparing to "turn a penny" by the repeal of the Corn Laws. Six years ago, when he was bidding for office as a Monoplist-minister, he delivered in the House of Commons his famous "incense-breathing" oration. His heart bled at the prospect of a peasant transformed into an operative, and summoned to his daily toils, not by the larks and the linnets, but by the factory bell.

"Talk no more to me (said he to callous Cobdens and Bluebeard Brights) of the cruelty of the transfer of the Poles to Siberia, or of the export of the Hill Coolies from Coromandel to the Mauritius. You contemplate a cruelty far more unnatural, far more heart-rending, in the bosom of our native land! You wish to make this country the vast workshop of the world, dependent on distant foreign lands for the supply of daily bread."

This was in 1839. In 1845, he is plotting with the Premier the reduction of England to a "dependence on distant foreign lands for the supply of her daily bread," and concocting with his steward the conversion of Longtown into a branch of "the vast workshop of the world." Yes! in a lithographed circular, bearing date the 1st ult., "the Right Honourable Sir James Graham, of Netherby, Baronet, M.P.," makes known his "desire to encourage the establishment of manufactures, &c., upon his estate, at the market town of Longtown, in the county of Cumberland," and holds out "inducements" to "capitalists" to "embark in the undertaking." "The town," says our Ministerial George Robins, "is pleasantly situated," "remarkably healthy," and "can supply a numerous set of useful labourers at moderate wages." To Sir James, therefore, as to the men of Manchester, the poetic appeal may now be made, which the versatile Baronet pathetically addressed to the Free Traders on the 14th of March, 1839:—

"You talk glibly of the transfer to manufacturing employment; but what cruelty, what suffering, lie hid under the surface of these gentle-flowing words! A change from agricultural to manufacturing labour! What a change to him! A change of home, of habits, of manners, of nature, of life itself—a change from the breezy call of incense-breathing morn, to the sad sound of the factory bell—from the balmy air of heaven and the voice of earliest birds, to the foetid atmosphere of the workshop, and the perpetual clack of the spinning-jenny and the shuttle—from the thatched cottage, the blooming garden, and the village green, to the dark cellar or wretched garret, in some noisome alley of the crowded city—from the rural work, the innocent enjoyment of the rustic Sabbath, to the pestilence, the vice, the temptations, and the sorrows of congregated multitudes! This is the change which you contemplate—this is the change which you ask us deliberately to sanction."

And "this is the change" which Sir James Graham, "the Cumberland landowner," is now "desirous to encourage upon his estate at Longtown!" He sees that the Corn Laws are doomed—that power is passing from the hands of the landed interest to those of the manufacturers—and he is eager to improve his fortunes by the revolutionary event.

The Courier Francais may well be astonished by the revolution—a "social transformation," not "by the armed struggle of parties in the field," not by "a victorious army," nor by "a popular revolt like that which threw down the Bastille," but (we quote our Paris contemporary) "by a pacific association of manufacturers of all professions, by conspirators who plot in the face of day on innumerable platforms, and in innumerable journals." Thus it is "that a powerful aristocracy, an oligarchy disposing of the government and fortune of one of the two most civilized nations of the earth, is overthrown without striking a blow." But the vanquished oligarchs have the mortification to know, that the platforms and the journals have not the undivided honour of the victory. A double renegade—the Cumberland Delator—is among the forces by whom they are overthrown!

POSTSCRIPT.

LONDON, Saturday Morning, November 15, 1845.

We have been obliged to omit our reviews and a great portion of original and selected matter, to make room for a report of the very important meeting in Birmingham. It is with great regret that we find ourselves compelled to postpone our account of the scarcely less important meeting at Huddersfield, but we shall make place for it next week. The accounts which we continue to receive from various parts of the empire, show that these meetings are symptomatic of well-grounded fears. The alarm for the potato-crop in Ireland is on the increase; the Catholic Hierarchy have ordered prayers to be offered up in the several chapels beseeching Divine Providence to avert the horrors of famine; and the same course has been pursued by the Primate and Bishops of the Establishment. Subscriptions for the relief of the poor have been commenced in several counties, and John O'Connell, of Greenva, the brother of D. O'Connell, has contributed 500*l.* to the subscription in Kerry. The late rains are said to have added greatly to the evil, but the extent of the mischief done has not yet been ascertained. We have before us most alarming accounts of the failure of potatoes in Scotland, particularly from the Lothians, Lanarkshire, Fife, Perthshire, Ayrshire, and the Western Highlands. In England, too, the ravages of this pestilence are on the increase, particularly in Lancashire, Yorkshire, and the eastern and southern counties. In this period of general alarm, we find our rulers so daunted by the monopolists, that the Corn Laws are allowed to run their destructive course, and "restrictions are maintained in the face of famine." We shall not add more, but refer our readers to the speeches of Messrs. Villiers and Cobden for an accurate portraiture of the perilous position of the country.

GATESHEAD TOWN COUNCIL.—This body met on Monday. On the motion of Alderman Brockett, the standing orders were suspended in order that he might propose a memorial to Sir Robert Peel for the opening of the ports. He would not trouble the council with any observations further than to say, that as the matter was urgent, if the memorial was adopted, it would be forwarded that evening. The memorial was then read, and it briefly stated that the corn harvest was most unfavourable, both as to quantity and quality, and that the potato crop in Ireland had been a complete failure. In order to prevent the fearful consequences that would otherwise ensue, the memorial prayed that the British and Irish ports might be immediately opened. (Applause).—Mr. John Robson seconded the memorial, which was unanimously adopted, without any observations from the members of the council.—Tyne Mercury.

AUCHERMUCHTY.—FREE TRADE.—A public meeting was held in the Town Hall here on the evening of Saturday the 1st inst., the chief magistrate in the chair, when resolutions were unanimously adopted in favour of Free Trade, and of memorialising the Queen in Council to issue an order for the admission of foreign grain and other provisions duty free. The meeting also appointed a committee to see that a machine be provided for converting potatoes into starch, the disease being very prevalent in the district.

We received late last night, several letters requesting to know where the pamphlet of Messrs. Trimmer and Morton, mentioned by Lord Dacie, in his speech at Birmingham, was to be had. We believe the pamphlet has been published by Ridgway, of Piccadilly, and may be bought there.

MARKETS.

CORN MARKET.

MONDAY, Nov. 10.—At this morning's market we had a small show of samples from Essex, and a rather better one from Suffolk and Kent, but altogether the supply was only moderate; though prices were generally 1*s.* to 2*s.* lower than this day week, there was more firmness in the trade, and the bulk of the samples was cleared off before the close of market. In Bonded Wheat very little doing. There is a better supply of English Barley than we have had in any week since harvest, and 2*s.* less money is generally taken. Beans and Peas are also in better supply, and 1*s.* cheaper. There are fair but not large arrivals of Irish and English Oats; the supply is, however, quite equal to the demand, and prices must be noted 6*d.* to 1*s.* lower than Monday last, with not a very extensive sale.

RUPTURES.—BAILEY'S TRUSSES are declared by many eminent surgeons to be the best; they are light and easy to wear, and if a cure is to be obtained, they will effect it. The patients also carefully attended to by Mr. Bailey or his assistants during Twelve Months for the Gunner (this term included), by this means a proper adjustment being always preserved, the inexperienced will be enabled to effect their cure in the shortest time possible. Trusses may be had as low as 7s. 6d. and 10s. 6d. Ladies attended for by an experienced female assistant.

FREEHOLDERS' BUILDING SOCIETY,
Manchester. Shares, £50. Subscription, 10s. per Month.
John Brooks, Esq., President. Alderman Elkanah Armitage.
Alderman William Harvey. W. Rawson, Esq.
Alderman Charles J. S. Walker. W. Evans, Esq.
BANKERS—Messrs. Cunliffe, Brooks, and Co., Market-street.
Solicitors—Mr. John Hewitt, 47, King-street.
Secretary—Mr. William Jackson Keightley, 11, Prince-street, Manchester.
The object of this Society is to assist the middle and industrious classes to obtain Freehold Dwelling-houses of their own, and more especially to create a spirit of independence in the latter, and to induce habits of economy in all who have a surplus of income beyond providing for their current requirements.
2235 Shares have now been taken up. It is evident this Society will be very large, so as not only to afford a good profit to those who have savings to invest, but to supply ample funds to such as wish to borrow money.
The present amount of Shares the Trustees will have to receive £1117 before the end of the year, and according to the constitution of the Society every Calendar month, members of the Society on real or leasehold security, so that not only small shareholders but at once accommodated, but those whose circumstances render it desirable may take up £200 or £300 at once.
By another adjournment of the first meeting of the Society to the 3rd of December, 1845, other members have an opportunity of entering by paying the first month's subscription only—namely, 10s. on each Share.
A Sale of Shares will take place on the said 3rd of December, 1845.
Persons wishing to take up Shares will be informed by early application, as, in the event of adjournments being discontinued, the back subscriptions will be required.

One peculiar feature in this undertaking is the facility afforded to Builders to obtain the County Franchise in the first year, as, on all purchases, shares for building with, the monthly subscription may be reduced to 5s., thus leaving a surplus of rent beyond the encumbrance on mortgage sufficient to give a qualification.
Applications for Shares may be made to the Secretary, Mr. W. J. Keightley, 11, Prince-street, Manchester, or to the Solicitor, Mr. J. S. Walker, 47, King-street, Manchester, or to Mr. A. Burgess, printer, Victoria Arcade, and Mr. R.
Owen, 8, Moreton-street, Strangeways, Manchester, where Rules, price 6d., and Prospectuses may be had.

THE LEAGUE.

No. 113.—VOL. III.]

SATURDAY, NOVEMBER 22, 1845.

[3d.]

NOTICE TO THE PUBLIC.

LEAGUE FUND.

All Subscribers of £1 and upwards to the LEAGUE FUND will be entitled to, and receive, a copy weekly of this publication for twelve months from the date of the receipt of their subscription.

Subscribers of half-a-crown, and under £1, will have forwarded to them a copy of THE LEAGUE, containing an acknowledgment of their subscription; and it is requested that all subscribers will be kind enough to send their names and addresses to the offices of THE LEAGUE, Newall's-buildings, Manchester, or 67, Fleet-street, London.

N.B. As there is considerable risk in the transmission of gold and silver by post, parties wishing to forward small contributions to THE LEAGUE FUND are particularly requested to make their remittances by post-office orders.

The Council of the League would also suggest to their friends in the country the importance of transmitting their copies of THE LEAGUE newspaper, after perusal, to such parties (more especially farmers) as may be either hostile or indifferent to the question of Free Trade.

By order of the Council,
JOSEPH HICKIN, Secretary.

We beg to inform our subscribers that bound volumes of the LEAGUE newspaper, containing the whole of the first year's Numbers, may be had on application at the offices, either in London or Manchester.

OBSERVE!

Samples of good Wheat were sold in Mark Lane on Friday at 74s. per quarter.

The duty on Foreign Wheat is 14s. per qr.
The national expenditure for bread is NOW at the rate of 20 millions a-year, or FOUR HUNDRED THOUSAND pounds weekly MORE than during the whole of last winter and spring.

BIRMINGHAM AND ITS DUTY.

The eager and enthusiastic response made by the men of Birmingham last week, in cheers that are yet ringing in our ears, to the appeals of the Free Trade leaders, justifies us in looking to them for those active exertions by which—and by which alone—the success of the cause which they have now made their own can be ensured. It cannot be that the magnificent and heart-stirring scene which the Birmingham Town-hall exhibited on the evening of Thursday, the 13th inst., was a mere scene, as evanescent as the mimic splendours of theatrical art. It was quite real thunder that we heard that night. Birmingham enthusiasm, as we have always understood, means something. Birmingham men may be hard to move; but, when moved, they are wonderfully in earnest. Birmingham has a great reputation for that sort of business-like sincerity and thoroughness which one can trust. Birmingham "demonstrations" have a character for meaning all, and more than all, that they seem to say—a character which the future historian will have abundant occasion to recognise when the chronicles of 13 years ago come to be written, and which we are sure he will not find falsified in the annals of the closing years, or months, of the Free Trade struggle. Birmingham, and the great industrial district of which this metropolis of the Midland Counties is the centre, will, we are well convinced, follow up last week's emphatic and unmistakeable expression of opinion with as emphatic and unmistakeable deeds—with deeds worthy of the men who wrested schedule A from the proudest aristocracy on earth, when at the very top of its power. We now look to Birmingham to "schedule A" a worse tyranny than that of the boroughmongers, and a more nefarious and shameful fraud than that of Gatton and Old Sarum.

The way is simple. Simple and easy—that is, as easy as things worth doing are wont to be in this hard-working world. BIRMINGHAM MUST WIN COUNTIES. Birmingham must get legal and constitutional rights and powers in and over that great district which its own marvellous and many-handed industry has made what it is. Birmingham must work out the constitution of 1832—develop the latent and untried capabilities of its own Reform Bill; especially of that oldest and best part of the Reform Bill—that precious relic of the ancient democratic constitutional law of England—the 40s. freehold county franchise. Birmingham must put an extinguisher on the Gatton of North Warwickshire, and the Old Sarum of East Worcestershire.

We urge our friends, the Free Traders of Birmingham, immediately to make their town the headquarters of a great qualification and registration movement, having, for its object, to give to the industry and intelligence of the capital of the midland district of England that overwhelming electoral preponderance in the counties created by them and dependent on them, which the constitution offers on certain terms not very difficult of fulfilment, and to which they are naturally and rightfully entitled. The Free Traders of Birmingham have all the facilities of position and circumstance which have enabled Manchester to conquer—and not merely to conquer, but to silence and extinguish—monopoly in South Lancashire. They have a vast industrial town population, eager to possess the franchise, and every way fitted for its intelligent and independent exercise. They have a sufficient number of small freehold properties within easy reach to qualify an army of Free Trade voters. They have the singular advantage of a local position, which places them in convenient proximity to two counties besides their own. And they have powerful allies in all directions, only waiting to be incited and organised, to form one dense and overpowering force. Birmingham and Coventry can, with the most perfect ease, subdue and occupy North Warwickshire. Birmingham, and Dudley, with Stourbridge, Bromsgrove, and Kidderminster, can take possession of East Worcestershire. Birmingham, with Wolverhampton and Walsall, can seal and secure the victory just won in South Staffordshire, by making the Free Trade majority (as it already is in South Lancashire) such that no monopolist candidate would ever dream of raising a contest. We much mistake, too, if Birmingham has not arms long enough to reach as far as North Staffordshire on the one side, and South Warwickshire on the other. But, of the first two counties named, there cannot be a moment's doubt; they may and can—we look to Birmingham to say they MUST and SHALL—be put past all doubt. Between now and the 30th of January, NORTH WARWICKSHIRE and EAST WORCESTERSHIRE must have their thousands and thousands of 40s. freeholders, ready qualified for the registration of 1846, and the general election which will almost certainly take place not later than 1847.

Men of Birmingham! you have great powers—you cannot but be conscious, likewise, of great responsibilities. The name of your town is honourably inscribed on one of the most brilliant pages of English history—you have now an opportunity of showing that the spirit of 1832 is not extinct, that the power of 1832 has not exhausted itself with that single effort. Your country has not forgotten the days when Birmingham was the centre of national interest, expectation, and confidence—when the issue of one of the most memorable political conflicts that Great Britain has ever seen, awaited the decision of your town meetings. The marked attention which the metropolitan press has paid to your last week's proceedings shows how much is still expected from you—how closely your movements are still watched, and how powerfully they are felt throughout the empire. It is now, as it was 13 years since. The vote which you are about to give on this great national question will have very much the character and effect of a casting vote. Two or three counties won from monopoly by you will tell, in point of moral and political power, for two or three times—for five or ten times—the mere number of votes which those counties may reckon in the division lists of the House of Commons. When the word once goes forth, that Birmingham is in the field conquering counties, and garrisoning the strong holds of landlordism with an industrial and democratic landed interest, all men will feel that the end is indeed come. We leave this matter in your hands, with a firm and full assurance that BIRMINGHAM WILL DO ITS DUTY.

THE TIMES AND OURSELVES.

We are always happy to receive advice from parties competent to give it, and have no sort of objection to criticism, friendly or unfriendly, on our sayings and doings, provided only that it be tolerably fair and truthful. All men and bodies of men are the better for being criticised. It is salutary even, though not agreeable, to be shown one's faults and foibles, now and then, in the distorted proportions and exaggerated dimensions of caricature. So that the likeness be striking on the whole, minute fidelity to nature in the delineation of particular features is scarcely essential to its moral utility. The animus of the artist is a very subordinate consideration, if he have a good eye and a sure hand. But when a man daubs at random with any colours that happen to come to hand, and calls it portrait-painting, he cannot expect people to sit quietly. The airs of a critic, and the temper of a partisan, are a perfectly unendurable combination.

It was with much regret, and more surprise, that we observed in last Tuesday morning's Times an article on the subject of the recent Birmingham dinner in particular, and the Free Trade agitation in general, containing a larger amount of gross and glaring misrepresentations than we should have thought could have been crowded within the compass of a newspaper column. Under colour of a calm and dignified exhortation to temperance, moderation, rationality, and the rest of the cardinal virtues, our eccentric contemporary presents us and the world with a tissue both of vague insinuations and of specific statements, every one of which is not only not true, but is flatly contrary to the truth. We wish, and can well afford, to be civil; for, after all, the Times is in an odd crotchety way of its own coming round to the right side of the question. But such careless or, passionate perversions of notorious fact as those on which we have now to comment, cannot be suffered to pass unproved. Really, when a leading journalist sits down to criticise a public meeting, the least he can do is to read the speeches.

What will the public say, for example, to the following piece of free-and-easy criticism on Mr. Cobden's speech of Thursday week?—

"Mr. Cobden talked in a strain of puerile exaggeration about the redundancy of cheap bread which would result from a repeal of the Corn Laws, just as if the experience of this very year had not proved what all previous information had suggested—viz., that there is neither in Europe nor in America that abundant supply of food which can, in the most propitious times, overstock the markets of any one country. The great objection to the existing Corn Law is, that it prevents that equable distribution of food which the aggregate average of the corn harvests throughout the world is calculated to promote. A notion that its repeal would inundate us with a vast influx of foreign wheat is contrary both to all experience of foreign harvests, and, in a greater degree, to common sense. . . . The Corn Law contravenes the operation of a natural law, and embarrasses the mechanism of commerce. If it were repealed to-morrow, bread would not on an average be 2d. a loaf cheaper, nor the value of any tolerably good land be diminished even at first as much as ten per cent. in value. Mr. Cobden SHOULD BE CAUTIOUS OF MAKING THESE GROSSLY-COLOURED MISREPRESENTATIONS."

This takes away one's breath. One would think the Times was talking in its sleep. To charge Mr. Cobden with "talking in a strain of puerile exaggeration about the redundancy of cheap bread which would result from a repeal of the Corn Laws," is something more than a "grossly-coloured misrepresentation"—it is a bare, naked fiction, without any colouring at all. Mr. Cobden not only did not say one syllable at the Birmingham meeting tending, by the remotest construction, to sanction the expectation of a redundancy of cheap bread resulting from a repeal of the Corn Law—he never talked in this strain. Why, it was only at the last Covent Garden League meeting, held on the 18th of June, that Mr. Cobden talked, most explicitly and at considerable length, in the very opposite strain—quoted, with the strongest expressions of concurrence and approval, an admirable article from the Times, to the effect that "rivers of corn are as pure and impossible a fiction as rivers of gold," and that "there is not too much corn on earth, nor will there ever be till the saddest and awfulest words that ever were spoken are finally unsaid"—amplified on the Times' text—illustrated and confirmed it in the most striking manner, from the experience of former years, when our merchants were ransacking the granaries of the world for corn, "bribing the nations of the earth with the high price of 67s. a quarter," and could only bring in eight millions of quarters during a period of three years—and wound up his demonstration of the Times' own truth with asking, "If therefore you were not inundated with corn in those dear seasons, where is the corn to come from that is to inundate you now?" And now we have the Times begging Mr. Cobden to "be cautious of making these grossly-coloured misrepresentations!!!"

We need scarcely remark on the exquisite absurdity of the Times affecting to argue, as against Mr. Cobden, that, under the Free Trade régime, "the value of any tolerably good land would not be diminished, even at first, as much as 10 per cent. in value." The Times might as well plead the cause of monarchical institutions and standing armies, as against the Duke of Wellington—or remonstrate with Sir Robert Peel on the danger of advocating an inconvertible small-note currency—or lecture Colonel Sibthorpe on the mischiefs of railway speculation. Mr. Cobden, as all the world knows, has invariably contended that land would not suffer in value at all by the repeal of the Corn Law; and, so far from confining this to "tolerably good land," he has always maintained—and the best agriculturists and Free Traders, as Earl Ducie, for example, maintain with him—that poor land would be benefited more than any other by Free Trade in grain of all kinds. We suppose we shall next see the Times expostulating with Mr. Bright on the evils of game preserving and battues.

A little further on—after sagely rebuking the "monideal" doctrines of the Leaguers on the subject of naval establishments—the Times has the incredible carelessness to add:

"One other instance of this one-thoughted style of dealing with important matters: Mr. Cobden says 'Open the ports, and there will be no necessity for voting pecuniary relief to Ireland.'"

This is monstrous. Mr. Cobden did not say this—did not say anything resembling this, or that could be mistaken for this—he said, most distinctly, the direct contrary of this. Mr. Cobden's words (as given by the Morning Chronicle) were:

"I have no objection, after everything else which should first be resorted to has been done—after the ports have been thrown open, without let or hindrance, if charity is to be administered to the Irish people, that it should rather be bestowed in the shape of payment of wages than as eleemosynary grants. I read in the papers of to day the speech of the King of Belgium to the Chambers in that country, in which he congratulated them that they have opened the ports for the admission of foreign corn, and that being done, they are enabled, by a vote of public money, to execute certain public works, to make up for the deficiency in employment, and thereby supply the people with food. In Belgium, you see, they do not expect to feed their people with mere pickaxes and shovels. They first let in the needed supply of foreign corn, and then, by supplying funds for the execution of public works, provide the people with the means of feeding themselves without resorting to charity."

So that "the proposition, not to vote an indiscriminate sum of money to the Irish, but to vote a sum of money for the express purpose of giving them employment in some national works"—which, according to the Times, "the gentry of the League think entirely beneath their notice"—is a proposition which, as a subsidiary arrangement, the gentry of the League do most expressly notice, and notice favourably.

The admonitions, exhortations, and oburgations with which the Times favours us on the subject of our general goings-on, past, present, and future, are about as valuable as its representations of Mr. Cobden's Birmingham speech are authentic. The recommendation to the League, "to disclaim all party connections and obligations," would be extremely judicious, were the League Whig, Tory, or Radical;—as it happens to be neither, the Times might as well recommend the League to have nothing to do with the London and York Railway. The Times' objection to the "eminently sectarian" character of the League would have great force, and be quite apropos, were the League a high-church or low-church, a Calvinistic or Arminian, confederation;—as it happens to be none of these, one can only wonder what on earth the Times means. The well-meant advice to the League, to "carry out its professed intention of embodying the opinions and expressing the wishes of the most intelligent and the most moderate among the commercial classes," would have a good deal of point if the League ever had professed any such intention;—as it has always been the professed intention of the League, not to embody the opinions, or express the wishes, of the commercial class in particular, but to expand the principles, and realise the practice, of a policy perfectly just to ALL classes, the Times misses the mark again. The intelligent and moderate labourers of the country are as much our clients, as the most intelligent and most moderate among the capitalists; and the class whose rights and interests we have most at heart, is the very large and important class of bread-eaters. One would think our contemporary had been living in the moon these seven years past. Everything that the League is, and does, and says, and means, he interprets by the rule of contrary.

The Times' view of the present position of the League, and the Free Trade cause—"Free Trade opinions are gaining strength, the League is losing it"—is one which we feel no sort of anxiety to controvert. Our readers are perfectly well able to pronounce, without any prompting from us, on each branch of this statement. We can only say, that if the principles of the League are in the ascendant, it is of the least possible consequence how the world goes with the League itself. The process which the Times here describes is exactly that whose completion will be the consummation and crown of our labours. The extinction of the League in the triumph of its principles—the reabsorption of the special and separate organisation of the Free Trade party, into the general mass of a Free Trade people—is the goal of all our hopes, efforts, and aspirations. The day is now not distant when the "death" of the League, so impatiently anticipated, and so often prematurely announced, will be a "great fact"—a fact immeasurably greater than the League itself—and when friend and foe alike will write its epitaph: "Free Trade opinions are victorious in the statute book—the League is extinct."

WHAT IS OUR PRESENT CONDITION?

We are not surprised that some of the journals which are supposed to reflect the feelings of the Premier should object to any exhibition of the great responsibility which devolves upon him at this crisis. In all times of difficulty, Ministers are accountable to the nation for the measures of policy which they adopt to meet the exigency of circumstances; if they have neglected to man the navy when maritime war is threatened—if they have not called out the army when invasion is menaced—the rulers must answer for their improvidence and their negligence to Parliament and the nation. We are menaced by an enemy more formidable than the Armada of Spain or the hosts of Napoleon; one described by the Commissioners of the Government as an enemy whose history and habits are yet but imperfectly known; and inasmuch as "the pestilence that walketh in darkness" is infinitely more to be dreaded than "the arrow that flieth by noon-day," we look with anxiety for the precautions which our rulers have adopted to check the ravages of this insidious foe, and find that their final resolution is to do nothing, but to let devastation pursue its course. The last report issued by the Government Commissioners in Ireland is far the most alarming that has yet appeared. While it tacitly confirms the accounts of the failure of the present year, it intimates the probable chances of a worse and more disastrous crop in the ensuing year; and while it suggests remedies, throws out very strong doubts that any remedies would prove effectual should the season prove adverse.

A very short period has elapsed since the evening organ of the ministry, the Standard, sounded the note of alarm in its most menacing tone, and congratulated the country on possessing a minister adequate to the perilous crisis, which it declared to be imminent. Sir Robert Peel was ready, we were told, not only to open the ports in case of necessity, but to grant bounties on the importation of corn rather than suffer any of the Queen's subjects to be exposed to the horrors of starvation. But within the last few days a change has come over the spirit of the ministerial press. The Herald proclaims in the morning, and the Standard reiterates in the evening that the failure of the potatoes in Ireland has been exaggerated, and that there are no apprehensions for scarcity of food in England. They quote the low price of potatoes as a proof of abundance, though they know that it results from the dread of their perishing, which induces the farmers to force sales at every hazard. They refer to the low corn averages, though they know that this arises from the disproportionate amount of bad grain that is thrown upon the market. They justify the inactivity of the Cabinet by declaring that "there is no risk of want," and as this is the only justification that can be pleaded for the neglect of precautions, by its results the Cabinet must abide. The minister through his semi-official organs has declared that, having gauged the appetites of the people and measured the supply of food, he has assured himself that there is no deficiency, and has shaped his policy by his calculations. This is a responsibility which he has sought, and which he cannot evade. Should a deficiency appear, he stands inexcusable before the nation. Lord Cloncurry's letter, which we insert at full length, states our grounds for asserting that there is not enough of food to supply the people, and it is therefore a document which must stand as a historical record for future reference.

"Mansion House, Dawson-street, 7th Nov., 1845.

"SIR,—As chairman of a committee, consisting of highly respectable gentlemen of all classes of political and religious opinions, appointed at a recent public meeting of the citizens of Dublin, the right hon. the Lord Mayor in the chair, it devolves upon me as a public duty to address you as responsible adviser of our most gracious sovereign, and which I do with unfeigned respect, and in the most anxious manner to call for your fullest and most immediate consideration to the present afflicting and most dangerous state of the people of Ireland. We can assure you that our information is both accurate and extensive—that it reaches over all parts of Ireland, and is derived from sources altogether unaffected by any political party motive whatsoever. Be assured, sir, we tell you but the simple truth when we inform you that the danger of famine is immediate and pressing, and if not averted by the activity of man, and the blessing of a merciful Providence, must result in a pestilence of the most frightful nature.

"We do solemnly assure you of our perfect knowledge that the destruction of the potato crop is extremely extensive, with some slight mitigation in particular localities; but, as a general calamity, is extending to all the provinces and counties of Ireland. Nor does the evil rest here—for day after day the disease is extending. Quantities of potatoes apparently in the most healthy state one day, are found on the ensuing, partially, if not entirely unfit for human or even animal food; the disease is in its nature expansive, and is to our knowledge daily and hourly expanding; nor is there any rational evidence to show that this wide-spreading rottenness will find any other limit than in the destruction of the entire potato crop. We do not intend you any disrespect, quite the contrary; but we do wish to impress upon your mind the awful responsibility which, as her Majesty's principal adviser, you incur if your Government hesitates to adopt the most speedy and extensive possible modes of alleviating the impending calamity. Whilst you hesitate, if hesitate you shall, the people of Ireland are about to perish in countless numbers. May we respectfully refer you to Lord Devon's report of last session, where you will find, or indeed whence we take for granted you are already informed, that the Irish agricultural labourers and their families are calculated to amount to more than 4,000,000 of human beings, whose only food is the potato—whose only drink is water—whose houses are pervious to the rain—to whom a bed or blanket is a luxury almost unknown, and who are more wretched than any other people in Europe. We respectfully call your attention to the fact that the foregoing description of the state of the Irish peasantry was published long before there was or could be the least suspicion of the most afflicting visitation of Providence in the destruction of the present crop. If then such was the condition of a large portion of the Irish people even in favourable harvests, you will in your humanity easily judge what must be the horrors of their situation if the approaching famine be allowed to envelope the entire population.

"We implore of you, sir, not to allow yourself to be persuaded that we exaggerate the horrors of a certainty of the approaching famine; we have no motive under heaven for misleading or misinforming you, and even if we had, you may believe we are utterly incapable of acting on such a motive; our only object is to impress on your mind what we know to be the fact, that famine and pestilence are at our door, and can be averted only by the most extensive and active precautions. The season for receiving supplies of foreign food is rapidly terminating; the southern ports of Europe, as also the ports of the British American colonies, as well as of the Northern American States, will soon be closed, until it will be too late to receive supplies from these countries. Other foreign countries afflicted by a similar calamity have already been before us in the market, and are daily enhancing the price of those supplies, which our government might otherwise calculate on. The lives of the people of Ireland are in the hands of your government. If you determine not to take immediate precautions, we are unable to contemplate the extent of the horrible consequences resulting from the destruction of the people's food, and from the neglect of the protection of Government. We are incapable of using any language that could be construed into dictation; but we respectfully declare it to be our conviction that it is the imperative duty of the Government to adopt some or all of the following measures, together with such others as the Government may deem advisable to meet the impending evil:—

"1st—The opening of the ports of Ireland for all kinds of human food duty free.

"2nd—The closing of the ports of Ireland against the exportation of oats, either ground or whole.

"3rd—That the consumption of oats by cavalry regiments in Ireland be diminished as much as it possibly can with safety to the public service.

"4th—That the distillation from grain be suspended in Ireland, due precaution being taken to prevent illicit distillation.

"5th—That there be immediately raised money, by way of loan, to the extent of one million and a half at the least, and chargeable upon Irish resources—such as the department of Woods and Forests, &c., and that the amount of such loan be applied in the first instance to the increasing the quantity and decreasing the price of food in Ireland.

"6th—That we earnestly recommend the forming of granaries in each of the Poor Law Unions and other localities throughout Ireland, so as to bring food within the reach of all its inhabitants.

"7th—That we also earnestly recommend the setting the people to work without any delay, by urging on and assisting the construction of railways, and also in the works of drainage, as recommended by Government Commissioners, and other works of general or local utility.

"I have the honour to be, Sir, your obedient servant,
"CLONCURRY."

The daily reports of the Committee sitting at the Mansion House in Dublin, have become more and more gloomy since the date of this letter. On Tuesday last, it is stated that 72 letters were received, the tenor of which was still more discouraging than those of the preceding day. The information was mostly from clergymen of every denomination, those of the Establishment being the greater number. They state that more than one-third of the crop was lost or damaged, and that energetic measures should be speedily adopted to afford relief.

A Catholic clergyman, the Rev. Mr. Comyns, of Kilkee, county of Clare, attended the committee. He stated that having heard that a commission was appointed by the Government to take means to alleviate the present distress, he came up to town to represent the state of his parish. He said that in one case which came under his observation, five or six stone of potatoes were boiled for the food of a large family, and that there was not as much of them sound as would feed a single person. This gentleman also said that the people were becoming sick from the use of the bad potatoes, and that if prompt measures were not used, disease would certainly spread.

The ravages of "the imperfectly known enemy" are not confined to Ireland; deplorable accounts of destruction are received from the southern counties; potatoes which appeared quite sound when stored have suddenly exhibited signs of the mysterious taint, and those who not more than three weeks ago declared that the evil had been exaggerated, are now foremost in asserting that it has been grievously underrated. Here, then, is an exigency as novel and at least as alarming as a war or an invasion; and here, consequently, are circumstances which throw a vast amount of responsibility on our rulers.

But this responsibility is fearfully increased by the undeniable fact, that this "enemy whose history and habits are yet but imperfectly known," has derived its force and strength from the policy of the Premier himself; it is his system of Corn Laws that has furnished the potato pestilence with "hands to war and fingers to fight." Providence supplied granaries for our growing population in fertile and thinly-inhabited lands, where the cultivators were not only willing but eager to exchange their corn for our manufactured goods; the vast prairies watered by the Ohio and Mississippi would have teemed with food for the manufacturing operatives of England, had not the Peel ministry refused its admission into our markets. He denied the people provision from abroad, and thus voluntarily took the responsibility of supplying them from at home. The supply has failed in quantity, and still more lamentably in quality; there is a terrible and growing disproportion between the averages of corn and the price of bread; an inferior grain is forced on the people at an extravagantly high price, and this aggravation of the evils of his cruel system the minister takes the responsibility of leaving uncorrected.

The opening of the ports is now sought by all the most influential of the commercial communities throughout the empire. Every day's delay will render the concession less valuable; ice will soon fetter rivers, and the storms of winter sweep the seas; the Continental nations who have anticipated us in removing restrictions on the import of food, will soon collect the available surplus from foreign markets, and even compete with us at the doors of our own bonded warehouses. So notorious are these facts, that during the last three weeks there was a strong and general belief that ministers had resolved to suspend their restrictive laws and open the ports to food, rather than incur the responsibility of remaining inactive during three months of winter, with warnings of danger before them and around them, growing louder and deeper every moment. If during those three months any of our countrymen perish from famine, those who have excluded food from the country are morally and constitutionally responsible for their death. It may be that no coroner's jury will pronounce the sliding-scale or its author "guilty of murder," but what will and must be the verdict of the universal people?

It is perfectly monstrous to suppose that Ministers cannot be made responsible for the exercise of the power delegated to them in trust during the intervals between the sessions of Parliament. If they shrink from such responsibility, their only remedy is to call Parliament together in the shortest time possible. But it would of course be absurd to assemble the Legislature for the purpose of helping the Cabinet to do nothing. The Ministers have taken upon themselves the responsibility of maintaining prohibitory duties in the face of famine. Against this insane and criminal resolution there must be a prompt and firm protest through the length and breadth of the land. If, as is said, the Minister waits for the country, the country must not wait for the Minister, because events will wait for neither of them. The functions of the Legislature are suspended, and those of Administration virtually abandoned; the nation must look to itself; the somnolency of one, the obstinacy of another, and the flexibility of a third, may be pleaded to amuse the clubs, but they neither can nor will serve as excuses to the people. Let memorials and protests from public meetings be presented against the fatal ascendency which rules the councils of the realm. Scarcity is proclaimed; famine is acknowledged; and yet food is excluded. The opening of the ports is felt by the whole nation, with scarcely the exception of any but the most rabid monopolists, to be inevitable before another harvest can be reaped. Every one knows that our supply of food is insufficient, and that one great element of that supply is doomed to premature destruction. Delay is scarcely less dangerous than continued prohibition. We think that Ministers deserve impeachment for having allowed the last packet to sail for America without intelligence that our ports had been opened to the corn of the United States. If Sir Robert Peel shrinks from all allusion to responsibility as an outrage, he ought to have taken measures to diminish the amount of his accountability. The Corn Laws are his: he framed them, he maintains them, and he must answer for their results. But it will not do to wait until their operations have led to the dire consummation which the coming events that cast their dark shadows before seem to portend. Life and death are involved in such an experiment; the symptoms of the patient prognosticate too much of danger to wait the leisure of the physician. Let us, then, promptly and earnestly invoke the powers of the constitution to interpose between England and scarcity—between Ireland and famine; let us nerve ourselves to endurance, for some pressure of suffering is, we fear, inevitable; let us learn humanity from the Russian and Christianity from the Turk; and, while yet there is time, secure all possible means of sustenance for an industrious and famine-menaced people.

FREE TRADE IN AMERICA.

We are glad to see that the advocates of Free Trade in the United States are alive to the struggle which they will have to sustain in the ensuing session of Congress. A letter having been addressed to Mr. McDuffie, the South Carolina senator, by one of his constituents, asking for his opinion upon the present state of their prospects, has drawn from that distinguished champion of our principles an able exposition of his views. We are glad also to perceive that he entertains full confidence in the determination of President Polk's Administration to carry out the principles upon which he was elected in opposition to Mr. Clay.

"A brief exposition," he says, "of the true principles of a revenue tariff, and a reference to Mr. Polk's inaugural address, will be sufficient, I think, to banish your apprehensions. It is obvious to remark, that a revenue tariff is the lowest rate of duty upon every foreign import that will raise the required amount of revenue. The smallest addition to that rate upon any one article with a view to increase the price of its domestic rival, is 'plainly and intentionally' a protective, as contradistinguished from a revenue duty. But if the additional duty not only enhances the price of both the foreign and domestic article, but diminishes the revenue, it would be the most barefaced mockery—the most impudent and hypocritical disguise, by which a mercenary and merciless oppression ever attempted to conceal its deformity, to call this a revenue duty."

He boldly meets the cry for "incidental" protection by showing that it is an evil only to be borne when it cannot be avoided; and he points to the desirableness of a better system of taxation:

"If protection to particular classes at the expense of all others results from a revenue duty—as it does from all revenue duties—it is an unavoidable incident not to be desired but regretted. It is impossible to separate the protection given to the sugar planter, for example, by even a revenue duty of 20 per cent., from the twofold burthen imposed upon everybody else, not only by raising to the consumers the price of imported sugar which yields a revenue equal to the burthen, but the price of domestic sugar, which imposes an equal burthen, and yields no revenue. It is this last result, which unjustly transfers the money of the many to the pockets of the few, which constitutes the incidental protection of a revenue duty—a result which, so far from being desirable to the people at large, can only be regarded as a public evil unavoidably resulting from an unequal system of taxation."

He then deals with the class interests, the manufacturers, iron masters, &c., who, like our landed proprietors, make use of their power in the Legislature to tax their fellow citizens; and he goes to the root of the evil:

"Is it not apparent, therefore, that to permit those interests to control Congress, in the matter of taxation, would be to put the power of taxation, the most important of all political powers, in the hands of those who have a deep pecuniary interest in increasing the taxes? If the manufacturing nations of Europe would agree to supply the federal revenue by a perpetual tribute, would these monopolists consent to a total repeal of the duties on imports, and free the country from taxation? They certainly would not. They solemnly declare that these duties, which are surely taxes to the country, are essential to their prosperity; that to reduce them from 50 to 20 per cent. would be injurious to them; but to repeal them altogether would be absolutely ruinous. Here, then, is a confession of what is apparent without it, that those who receive the taxes, impudently claim the prerogative of prescribing to the Government what burthens shall be imposed on those who pay them! If we submit to these things, can we claim to live under a responsible, representative republic?"

To meet the old fallacy, common to both sides of the Atlantic, that by taxing foreign articles you protect the home produce, he points to the fact that the home producer has to pay his taxes before he can buy the foreign article :

"Now when we recollect that all foreign imports are as truly the productions of domestic industry, as their home made rivals—and that the industry which acquires the foreign article is as much entitled to be exempted from taxation as that which makes the domestic article; it will be seen that the very lowest rate of revenue duties upon sugar and iron, and upon all manufactures of iron, cotton, and wool, is an unjust discrimination in favour of one branch of domestic industry and against another. The true point of equality and justice, as I have always maintained, would be to impose the same rate of duty on the home made that we impose on the imported manufacture. The exemption, therefore, of our home made manufactures, from the duties imposed on those we import, is a most liberal concession, gratuitously made by the people to the manufacturers; and that they are not satisfied with this discrimination is a proof how feeble is the sense of gratitude and justice among masses of men, when their interests are in question."

The monopolists in America, who must have studied in the same school as the Duke of Richmond, ("we don't grow glass, but we do grow timber"), have put enormous protecting duties upon cotton manufactures, iron, and sugar, which are produced at home, whilst they have exempted from duties tea and coffee, which are not grown in America:

"But our system is as burthensome as it is unequal. It may be safely stated that it imposes a pecuniary burthen on the people three times as great as the amount of revenue it yields to the treasury. The duty on imported cotton manufactures, for example, may be assumed to average 40 per cent., and the amount imported set down at ten millions. This will yield a revenue of four millions. But the cotton manufactures annually produced in the United States and equally enhanced in price with the foreign, by the duty imposed on the latter, amount to thirty millions of dollars. Forty per cent. on this gives us twelve millions as the additional burthen imposed on the people, by the duty on cotton manufactures; so that the people are subjected to a burthen of sixteen millions to obtain a revenue of four, paying to the cotton manufacturers, who are now realising from 20 to 40 per cent. on their capital, three dollars for every one they pay to the Government!—Now let us compare this duty on cotton manufactures, with a like duty on tea and coffee, which the manufacturers artfully prevailed upon Congress to exempt from duty altogether by the act of 1832. Let us assume that we annually import tea and coffee to the amount of ten millions of dollars under a duty of 40 per cent. This will yield a revenue precisely equal to that derived from the duty on cotton manufactures, and will impose only one fourth of the burthen on the people. The money collected at the custom-house would be the full measure of the popular burthen. And yet it is one of the schemes of the manufacturers to let tea and coffee remain free of duty, in order to create a necessity for increasing the duties on sugar, iron, and the various manufactures embraced in the protective system. Of all foreign imports, tea and coffee are among the most proper subjects of a revenue duty, inasmuch as they yield the largest amount of revenue with the least burthen to the people, and that burthen is equally distributed among the consumers. But the manufacturers, who carry their manufactures to China to exchange them for tea, and to Brazil and Cuba to exchange them for coffee, understand perfectly well the benefit of Free Trade, if it be only confined to themselves."

Not content with high duties, the monopolists have contrived a scheme of arbitrary valuations at the Custom-house which often double the real duty upon low goods :

"In any scheme which the administration may present for adjusting the tariff, I feel confident that the leading feature will be the total abolition of minimum and specific duties. These are fraudulent contrivances that serve no other purposes but to deceive the people and disguise oppression. Let us have ad valorem duties that everybody can understand. Let the people see the full extent of their burdens, and if they must be oppressed let it be 'so nominated in the bond.' As these duties now stand, low priced articles consumed by the poor pay the highest rates of duty, while those of the highest price, consumed by the wealthy, pay the lowest rate. This is a fatal objection to all specific duties. A yard of calico, for example, which costs six cents in Manchester, pays nine cents duty, which is 150 per cent. on its cost; while a yard of the finest coloured muslin, which costs 30 cents., pays only nine cents., equal to 30 per cent. on its cost. These revolting deformities must be removed, and I feel assured that Mr. Polk will cordially co-operate in the patriotic labour."

Mr. McDuffie evidently understands his case, and is armed at all points against his insidious opponents. We trust he is sufficiently recovered in health to take his seat in the senate at its approaching opening. We leave the cause of Free Trade safely in his hands, heartily agreeing with him in the concluding reflections in his letter :

"It is apparent that the days of monopoly and commercial restriction are numbered in all the civilised nations of the earth. Even in Great Britain—so long held up to us by our monopolists as an example for imitation—all parties now concur in the principles of Free Trade, and differ only as to the time and manner of reforming ancient restrictions and abuses. And permit me to say, that the day that shall witness the downfall of commercial restrictions and the establishment of Free Trade among the nations of the earth, will be the greatest and most glorious era that ever marked the progress of improvement in the temporal affairs of man. It should be the ambition of our statesmen to take the lead in this great reform, which is destined, as I firmly believe, to contribute more to the liberty, prosperity, and peace of the nations than any event since the advent of our Saviour. In this view of the subject few men ever occupied a more responsible position than Mr. Polk, and I have every reason to believe he fully realises that responsibility, and will so far elevate his views above the miserable schemes of mercenary monopolists and factionists contending for office, as to be equal to the occasion, and fulfil the expectations of his country.—Yours, &c., GEO. McDUFFIE."

THE SUPPLY OF FOOD.

We copy from the Times a remarkable article on the supply of food in the principal countries with which we have commercial intercourse, and on the amount of assistance likely to be obtained from abroad, to meet the deficiency of production at home. Our cotemporary justly remarks, that "the annual supply of food in the world is determined by the laws of Providence, of nature, and of trade." Every restriction on trade is therefore a discouragement to the production of supplies, since men will not produce when they have no reasonable prospects of a market. Our Corn Laws compel our neighbours to stint production to little more than is sufficient for their annual supply, taken at its average; and hence the impolicy of one nation aggravates the distress of all in a season of general scarcity. The higher the standard of food is raised in any country, the greater will be its security from scarcity, because there will be a supply of inferior grain on which the people can fall back in seasons of scarcity. If Englishmen had been accustomed to use generally the finest kinds of wheat, the inferior grain would be used chiefly as subservient to the growth of the superior, and would therefore be an available resource at a crisis. But the effect of the Corn Laws is to stimulate the production of the inferior grains and of potatoes, beyond which there lies nothing but sheer destitution. While the corn trade was free in Holland, the storehouses of Amsterdam contained abundance of corn, from which other nations supplied themselves in seasons of dearth; and the Dutch themselves, for more than a century, never felt the pressure of scarcity, much less of famine. Europe does not appear to have profited much by this signal example of the blessings of Free Trade. The effects of exclusive policy, adopted in imitation of England, are shown in the following portraiture of its condition by our cotemporary :

"The principal countries of the west and south of Europe are at no time exporters of wheat. In France the export and import of corn is about equally balanced in ordinary years; but wheat is not the customary food of the French people, and the demand for it and for the lower kinds of grain must be increased beyond the average, if not beyond the supply, by the failure of the potato crop this year. The harvest in France is probably not much below the average, but it is insufficient to compensate for the destruction of other food. In Spain and in Italy the harvest has been indifferent, and very little, if any, corn can be exported from either country. The progress of population in the Spanish peninsula for the last century has been far more rapid than the extension of tillage or the improvement of agriculture. The consequence is that Spain has comparatively little agricultural produce to export; and her own colonies of Cuba and Porto Rico now draw their supplies of food from the United States. Throughout the Austrian dominions, with the exception of Hungary, great privations will inevitably be felt. The large stock of corn usually warehoused at Trieste for the purposes of foreign trade has never been known to be so much reduced as at the present moment. From Fiume we have received no recent accounts, but that place is the sole port of Hungary to the west; much of the corn grown upon the plains of the Danube is brought thither up the Save; and it is not unlikely that a supply might be obtained from thence by foreign vessels, if measures have not already been taken by the Austrian Government to appropriate it to the uses of the empire. But although the harvest of Hungary is abundant, the surplus of that country will certainly not suffice to satisfy the wants of all its neighbours. In the lower provinces of the Danube and in Moldavia the scarcity is already great, especially in those districts which are within reach of water communication; higher up the country the crops are reported to have been better, but the means of transport are wanting. The provinces of Russia and Poland, which are usually the most fertile wheat lands of Europe, are this year dependent on foreign importation; and as a necessary consequence, the Prussian ports of the Baltic, which commonly export the produce of the interior of Poland, of Western Russia, and in part of Silesia, will be unable to furnish any considerable amount of corn to the foreign market. Sweden and Norway do not once in five years grow their whole consumption; but it is a curious circumstance, that in the midst of this sweeping calamity, which has impoverished empires, and threatens to spread famine over so many parts of Europe, the little kingdom of Denmark has been blessed with a harvest of singular abundance, and may export a quantity of corn, large in proportion to its territory, though very small as a measure of relief to the necessities of other countries."

Our cotemporary does not mention the chances of supply from Odessa, Alexandria, and the ports of the Levant; but we have been informed that very limited assistance can be expected from these quarters. The distress in Turkey is already great, and is increasing, and the Pacha of Egypt has prohibited the export of provisions from his dominions. We therefore turn with some interest and anxiety to the United States:

"There at least it is admitted that the harvest has been excellent, and the crop of Indian corn especially abundant. The potato disease has, we fear, shown itself in New England and some of the northern states, as well as in some of the British North American colonies; but the consequences of this disaster are less formidable in America than in Europe. Let us, then, inquire what are, in a good year, the resources of the United States for the supply of food? The answer to such an inquiry is a matter of great interest, not only as it affects our present necessities, but with reference to the whole question of the corn duties; and we have no hesitation in replying, upon the authority of tables and statements of great minuteness and accuracy, which are now before us, that the agricultural produce of the United States available for the purposes of food in foreign markets has been greatly exaggerated by the hopes and fears of contending parties in this country. It is demonstrable that in the United States, as well as in most other countries, the consumers of agricultural produce increase more rapidly in numbers than the producers; and that the progress of the production of wheat has not been more rapid than that of the population. In 1790 the population of the Union was 3,929,328, the estimated produce of an average crop of the wheat lands was 17 millions of bushels of 60lb., and the quantity of wheat exported was 4,750,000 bushels, or 28 per cent. of the whole wheat crop. In 1840 (a year in which the export was unusually large) the population of the Union had risen to 17,068,666; the estimated produce of the wheat crop was 80,000,000 bushels; the export was 11,300,000 bushels, or 14 per cent. of the whole wheat crop. The states of New England, Maryland, and Virginia no longer produce wheat enough for their own consumption; and we are told by an able writer in the Philadelphia Commercial List for 1842, that—

"If we make a natural line of the Mississippi to the confluence of the Ohio, and up this river to Pittsburg, and thence draw an imaginary line north to Lake Erie, and continue it round the northern and eastern frontiers of the United States, it will be found that at this time the wheat raised in all this section of the United States is about equal to what is consumed in it, and that the whole surplus shipped from the United States to foreign countries, including Canada, is, in fact, produced in the States and territories north and west of the Ohio river."

"By calculations based upon the official returns made by the Marshals in the United States in 1840, and taking into consideration the constant progress of the population, it appears that the utmost amount of wheat and wheaten flour which may by possibility be exported from the United States from the present time to 1850, with average harvests, will not exceed 12 millions of bushels per annum.* The whole wheat produce of the country is considerably below 100 millions of bushels. The greatest quantity ever exported was in 1840, when it reached 1,720,860 bushels of wheat, and 1,897,501 barrels of flour; but in 1837, when the preceding harvest had been below the average, no less than 3,921,259 bushels were imported into the Union from foreign countries."

"If this be the whole available produce of the United States, it is evident that the proportion of it which will reach the English market is still more limited. The largest quantity ever exported to England direct was 615,972 bushels of wheat and 620,919 barrels of flour in the year 1840; but the effect of the Corn Laws has of course been to render this trade excessively variable; though for the last five years another branch of the same trade, by the export to the British North American colonies, has been regular and considerable. But it must be borne in mind, that under any circumstances almost all the West Indian islands draw a large portion of their supply of wheat, as well as of Indian corn, from the United States. Our own islands take about 250,000 barrels of wheaten flour per annum; the Danish, 50,000; Hayti, 40,000; and Brazil more than 200,000 barrels; and this is independent of a consumption of about 364,000 barrels of Indian corn meal in the West Indies alone. In short, wherever the population, whether of slaves or free men, is engaged in raising those agricultural products, such as cotton, tobacco, sugar, and coffee, which are not primary articles of food to themselves, they must of course draw their sustenance from other countries, more suited to the growth of bread stuffs; and the north-western territories of the United States are in every way adapted to supply the Southern States as well as the West Indian and South American markets with these commodities."

"It is certain that the production of any surplus wheat for the foreign market is confined to that portion of the United States which lies beyond the Ohio and is most remote from the maritime cities of the coast. The growth of the population in the manufacturing and non-corn-growing districts is sufficiently rapid to consume all the additional corn-produce of the country, supposing 130,000 acres of new land per annum to be put under wheat culture alone, and three times that quantity under other crops and pasturage. The extension of agriculture barely keeps pace with the population; and the whole supply of wheat is hardly more than one month's consumption ahead of the demand in the Union. Nor is there any prospect that this state of things will alter. It is true that we have here confined our observations to the American wheat crops, and that in computing the supply of food in the United States the enormous production of Indian corn is the most important element, and constitutes the bulk of the food of the people. But to the people of England in ordinary years the supply of wheat is the principal question. Indian corn is little known in this country; and it never will be known, except under a very extraordinary degree of pressure, as long as it is subjected to the same duties which are levied on foreign barley, and is therefore, for all practical purposes, a prohibited article."

When the supplies in Europe are so short, and the available surplus in America so limited, every hour's delay in opening the ports is fraught with peril. Whilst ministers consult and hesitate, the sources from which alone relief can be derived must be drained away, scarcity will be followed by dearness, and, as in the bargain of the Sibylline books, we shall have to purchase small quantities at the price for which we could now procure comparative abundance.

SIGNS OF NATIONAL OPINION.—THE PROVINCIAL PRESS.

Those "evidences of public opinion" on the great question now before the country, of which we gave our readers, last week, so gratifying and decisive a summary, in page after page of extracts from the provincial newspapers, continue multiplying on us daily. Extended quotation is now impracticable, on account of their voluminousness, and needless, because of their unanimity. Never was the public mind more thoroughly made up on any subject—never was it more energetically and emphatically declared through the press. Everywhere we find a profound and lively anxiety as to the prospects of the country for the next year; everywhere the opening of the ports to the free importation of food is proclaimed to be the one thing needful; and everywhere is the national voice clear, full, and strong on the subject of ministerial responsibility. The press is doing its duty.

We subjoin a list, as complete as we can make it from the materials at present in our hands, of upwards of 50 of the principal provincial organs of the public press of the United Kingdom, which have this week again occupied their leading columns with most able and earnest articles on this great national question.

NEW ORLEANS, 15TH OCTOBER.—The advices from Great Britain with respect to the harvest are of a very contradictory character; but, as some intimate a fear of a serious deficiency in the harvest there, we have been induced to put together such statistics as we could collect, to show what quantity of wheat and flour this country could supply, if suddenly called upon, and, from the tables given below of our exports hitherto, we fear the general expectation will be greatly disappointed. Under a regular trade, the result, doubtlessly, would be very different. The Brazils, Cuba, and the British West Indies look to and receive from the United States a certain supply; but England, which has the greatest power of consumption, limits that power by a cunningly-devised scheme, which tends to make the primary article of subsistence dear when scarce, and cheap when abundant. The small interest which the United States have in the trade is well illustrated in the tables below; and it further appears, that the average exports of Indian corn and meal to England during the past fourteen years have been only 24,515 dols., or about £5000. If, as some fear, these evils are now to be practically felt, we feel assured that any large demand from England will be unsatisfied by this country; and such limited portion of it as may be met, will have the effect of raising prices here materially, which speculators only will derive any benefit from, as they are the only parties who are willing, for probable large profits, to run the risk of a sliding-scale of duties. As a consequence, the trade generally will be disturbed by the contraction of credits and that want of confidence which an uncertain supply of food invariably produces. We are, therefore, most anxious for further advices from Great Britain, and the course of our trade for the coming season will much depend upon their character.—WYLLIE AND EGANA.

AN AWARD SPORTSMAN.—The worst battues are not those where the slaughter is confined to deer; the shooting of a serf or two, employed to chase the game, is often an inevitable accident. A royal or ducal chase took place, not many years since, not very far from that described in our journal of last week (at Reinhardtbrunn). A prince of the north was the personage in whose honour it was got up; but his highness was so very impatient with his gun, that his shot took effect not on the deer, but on their two-legged drivers. The noble host accordingly gave an eyer to his illustrious visitor, who took care to put no ball in his gun. The great personage was in consequence much mortified at finding that he hit nothing, and the battue was afterwards discontinued during the remainder of his visit.—Morning Chronicle.

OPENING OF THE PORTS.

THE OPERATIVE COTTON-SPINNERS.—

The operative cotton-spinners, and others employed in the mills of Lancashire, who are among the most intelligent of the working classes in the United Kingdom, have addressed a memorial to the Premier, praying for the opening of the ports. They have learned by experience that wages fall as the prices of provision rise; and alarmed by the signs of dearness which precede and are premonitory of scarcity, they have appealed to the Government to adopt the only measure by which a recurrence of past calamities may be averted. All other operatives, whether miners, machinists, farmers, masons, tailors, shoemakers, &c., are exposed to the same dangers; scarcity of food will infallibly narrow the field of employment, and lower wages by diminishing the demand for labour. Let, then, the operatives of the kingdom imitate the conduct of the cotton-spinners. The facts so perspicuously stated in their memorial, belong equally to all the working classes; it is a proof of the progress of sound principle that the operatives have discovered the identity of their interests with the abundant supply of food to the community. The document is highly creditable to the intelligence and feeling of the parties from whom it emanated:

"TO THE RIGHT HON. SIR ROBERT PEEL, BART., &c.

"The memorial of the Operative Cotton Spinners, Self-acting Minders, Rovers, and Twiners of Lancashire, Yorkshire, Cheshire, and Derbyshire, in delegate meeting assembled, representing the whole of the operatives engaged in the above-mentioned branches of the cotton trade, being upwards of 10,000 men, humbly sheweth,—That your memorialists view with painful feelings the consequences which threaten to ensue from the general and almost unprecedented failure in the potato crops, and the deficiency in the late harvest in Great Britain and Ireland. That your memorialists have but recently been relieved from a period of great suffering and privation—a period when the price of food was high, wages extremely low, and employment most difficult to be met with; that at that period, your memorialists suffered to a much greater extent than any other class of operatives, and they cannot contemplate a recurrence of similar evils without feelings of extreme fear and alarm. That your memorialists are of opinion that the present scarcity of food, leading, as it must, to a continued rise in prices, will, if not prevented, inevitably bring about calamities as great as those to which they have adverted. Your memorialists, therefore, entreat, that by an Order in Council, the ports of the United Kingdom may be immediately opened for the free admission of all kinds of food. And your memorialists will ever pray."

As another proof of the just views which the working classes take of the present crisis and its cause, we have to notice a meeting of the operatives of Kendal; they, too, have learned that low wages are the consequence of scarcity of food, and they are consequently alarmed at the menacing signs of coming dearth.

KENDAL.—MEETING OF THE WORKING CLASSES.—

On Thursday evening, a meeting of the working classes, convened by placard, was held in the Town Hall, kindly granted for the purpose by the mayor. The hour appointed was eight o'clock, and at that time the Hall was completely filled, and the proceedings seemed to create great interest. On the motion of Mr. William Thornborrow, seconded by Mr. John Rook, Mr. John Gill was called on to take the chair.

Mr. JOHN GILL, on taking the chair, said that the meeting had been got up by a class of men who had not had the advantages of education, and they must not, therefore, expect any lengthened display of speech-making; but he was sure that all would be agreed, that the object they had in view was a very important one. It was on that account that they had thought it necessary to call together the working-men, for the purpose of addressing her Majesty to take into consideration the necessity of opening the ports for the free admission of grain, and the other necessities of life. All agreed that something must be done in the present state of affairs. He had had an opportunity, during the last few weeks, of observing the potato crops belonging to different farmers, and scarcely one out of ten was free from injury. The farmers' produce was also, in other respects, defective. That being the case, a scarcity in that article which had become a necessary, must occasion a rise of price in other articles of food. In consequence of this rise in the price of other articles, trade, he was sorry to say, had begun to decline. It certainly was not so brisk as it had been a few months ago. He had heard, both in Lancaster and Preston, that some of the millowners were beginning to curtail the time of their workmen. This indicated a rise in the price of provisions, and a scarcity of trade. (Applause.) Their worthy mayor had stated that, in consequence of the public works going on, there existed general employment. To a certain extent that would be so, but with regard to those branches of trade which gave work to working-men, such as themselves, they must look for a depression. They were, therefore, called upon to memorialise her Majesty to interfere on the present occasion, and grant them relief by freely opening the ports to admit grain and other articles of food. The chairman concluded by reading the memorial.

Mr. HENRY HOUGHTON proposed the adoption of the memorial, which was seconded by Mr. RICHARD MUSGRAVE, and unanimously carried.

Thanks were then voted to the mayor and the chairman, and the meeting separated.

PUBLIC MEETING AT MANCHESTER.

THURSDAY.—This morning at 11 o'clock a very numerous meeting of the merchants, bankers, manufacturers, tradesmen, and other inhabitants of the borough of Manchester, was held in the large room of the Town-hall, King-street, "for the purpose of taking into consideration the propriety of memorialising her Majesty's Government in favour of opening the ports for the free admission of grain and all other kinds of provisions, to avert the calamity likely to arise from the scarcity of food, owing to the failure of the potato crop and the defective quality of the wheat harvest." The meeting was convened by the mayor on the requisition of upwards of 800 firms and individuals of station in the town. Mr. W. B. Watkins, mayor, presided; and on the platform we observed Mr. Phillips, M.P., Mr. Brotherton, M.P., Messrs. Aldermen W. Neild, C. J. S. Walker, James Ker-shaw, John Mayson, J. Shuttleworth, P. F. Willert, A. Kay, E. Armitage, and John Burd; also Messrs. G. Wilson, T. Bazley, President of the Chamber of Commerce, Absalom Watkin, J. B. Smith, James M'Laren, Sidney Potter, Benjamin Pearson, W. Bickham, W. Woodcock, Robert Gardner, J. Chadwick, J. Watts, Rev. W. M'Kerrow, W. Gaskell, Joseph Greave, Thomas Woolley, Samuel Lees, J. S. Grafton, Joseph Simpson, T. H. Williams, W. Morris, Thomas Hard-bottle, and others.

The MAYOR said, that independent of the object of the meeting, the respectability of the requisition would have warranted him in calling such a meeting. They were met to memorialise her Majesty's Government, and he hoped the business would be transacted not only with good temper, but with great spirit, and if there were any gentlemen present who differed as to the objects of the meeting, he hoped they would have a fair hearing. He would, without further comment, call on Mr. R. H. Greg to move the first resolution.

Mr. GREG then came forward, and observed, that if he had been asked to sign such a requisition a month ago he would not have consented to do so; but now that so alarming a necessity had presented itself he did not hesitate to ask for the opening of the ports. It was well known that there was a failure of the wheat crop. He had been in Scotland last week, and in some of the most forward districts the wheat crop had not been gathered. He regretted the further calamity which arose from the failure of the potato crop, a description of sustenance which formed a large portion of the food of the people of Ireland, Scotland, and the north of England. When the extent of that disease became known, the cry was raised "Open the ports," and that cry was re-echoed by the press without regard to politics. Four Cabinet Councils had been held, and he did not hesitate to say that nine-tenths of the population expected to see the result of those meetings in the opening of the ports; but, from some cause which he could not explain, no order was issued for the admission of foreign grain. He was decidedly of opinion that the sliding scale was one of the greatest curses that ever afflicted this country. He concluded by moving the following resolution:—"That the deficiency of the harvest and the failure of the potato crop in many parts of the United Kingdom have produced the utmost apprehension among all classes of the community, and are circumstances imperatively requiring the immediate consideration of her Majesty's Government."

Mr. J. HEXWOOD, in seconding the resolution, said that the cultivation of the potato crop was one of the causes of keeping on the Corn Laws. As the price of grain advanced the cultivation of the potato root progressed, and it was a curious fact that a disease in that root should now come to facilitate the repeal of the Corn Laws. In England the disease might not be so great, but in Scotland it was severely felt. In Lanarkshire, meetings had been held, at which statements were made from which it appeared that at least one half of the crop was diseased. In Ireland, the suffering created by the disease was greater than in any other part of the kingdom, owing to the fact that potatoes were the staple food of the people of that country. After a few remarks on the disputed territory of America, he concluded by seconding the resolution, which was put and carried unanimously.

Mr. Alderman KAY moved the next resolution. He had no desire to be considered an alarmist, but when he saw the present, and contemplated the future state of this vast district, he could not help urging the people of Manchester to devise means to avert a calamity which must inevitably ensue. If the ports be not opened, or some other measure adopted, famine and great distress, he was sure, would overtake the inhabitants of the manufacturing districts. He then took a review of the difference of the prices of food, and contended that, when food was cheap, manufactures were prosperous. They (the people of Manchester) were met for the purpose of demanding from her Majesty's ministers the opening of the ports, and he hoped every district in the kingdom would make the same demand in terms not to be misunderstood. He was no party man; the time was come when all names in politics should be forgotten, and the ministers told that the people were not to be allowed to starve for the protection of sectional interests. The worthy alderman then read lengthy extracts from a work entitled "Manchester in 1844." We copy a few of the extracts:—"In Manchester, in March, 1842, there were 116 factories and other mills which had ceased working; 681 shops and offices had been closed, and 5492 houses were unoccupied. The value of mill buildings and machinery had lessened fully one-half; and five spinning mills, estimated at 211,000*l.*, only found buyers at the sum of 66,000*l.* The butchers, grocers, and linendrapers declared that their daily sales had decreased 40 per cent. A committee of relief, formed for the distribution of clothing and bedding to the poor, visited, in the course of the year 1840, 10,000 families, containing 45,591 individuals, of whom 2000 could not be relieved for want of funds. The rooms and cellars occupied by these unfortunate beings were entirely destitute of furniture. Bricks and logs of wood were the substitutes for tables and chairs. Heaps of shavings, litters of straw, defiled with all sorts of impurities, served them for beds. Frequently several families occupied different corners of the same chamber, and there was no separation of the sexes, save the distance between the beds of straw. It was found that a certain portion of the town, consisting of No. 1 and part of No. 2 districts, contained 2000 families, numbering 8866 persons, earning on the average 1*s.* 2*d.* only per head per week, being at the rate of 5*s.* 3*d.* only per week for each family. The number of pawn-tickets possessed by these families was 22,417, and, upon the articles thus pawned, the amount of 2780*l.* 14*s.* 4*d.* had been advanced." "In Bolton, a town of 50,000 souls, 50 manufacturers employed ordinarily 8124 workmen; in 1842, 30 of these establishments were closed, or did not work more than four days per week, and 5061 hands were thus deprived wholly or in part of the means of subsistence. Of 2110 ironfounders and mechanics, 785 had been thrown out of work, and the remainder, viz., 1325 of These men, who in 1836 had been urged to make 9 to 12 working days out of each week, were reduced to 4 or 5 days per week. The other trades had suffered the same reduction. In short, if to the decreased wages of the working classes, we add the augmented price of provisions—the loss to these operatives must have been at least 320,560*l.* per annum, or upwards of 1000*l.* per day. Public charity is powerless against such calamities as these." Stockport and other manufacturing towns were in the same condition. He concluded by moving the following resolution:—"That the recollection of the calamities which afflicted this district and the whole country during the period of high prices of food, from 1838 to 1842, renders it impossible to contemplate the recurrence of a similar state of suffering without intense anxiety and alarm."

Mr. Alderman WALKER seconded the resolution, and observed that no time should be lost; they had waited seven years and nothing had been done. Sir Robert Peel had not grappled with any of the great questions which were necessary for the improvement of the condition of the poor; he had conceded the whole question of the Corn Laws, and he was well aware of the injustice of the sliding-scale. It had been said that he would repeal the Corn Laws if he could, but he (Alderman Walker) believed he could repeal them if he would. He had not forgotten the advice which Sir Robert Peel had given to Lord John Russell; he told him if he could not carry his measures he ought to resign. Now, he (Alderman Walker) would suggest to the Minister to apply that advice to himself, and if his colleagues stood in the way of the repeal of the Corn Laws, let him appeal to the country, and see if the constituencies of England would not return to Parliament such members as would support him in his glorious undertaking. He concluded by seconding the resolution.

Mr. Alderman NIELD, in supporting the resolution, said, he respectfully submitted that the sliding-scale would slide away, and never again be heard of in England. It was well known that the protection afforded by that law had done more to prevent the cultivation of the soil than any other circumstance. He concluded by calling on Sir Robert Peel to comply with the prayer of that meeting, in which he would be supported by the great majority of the people.

Mr. A. WATKINS moved the third resolution, in a speech of some length, in the course of which he stated that Sir R. Peel had been bound down by the owners of the soil, and it did appear to him one of the most extraordinary cases of the aberration of a noble mind. He could not conceive why he allowed himself to be thus bound down, knowing as he did that these very men hated him. He moved,—"That the immediate opening of the ports for the free admission of food, and the repeal, without delay, of every law which restricts its importation, are measures obviously required to prevent a serious revulsion in trade, and consequent grievous suffering to the whole of our industrious population."

Mr. B. PEARSON seconded the resolution, and contended that they were letting themselves too low in asking for a repeal of the Corn Laws alone; they ought to demand a bounty on all corn imported into England for the next 30 years as a compensation for the injury they had sustained since the imposition of the Corn Laws. Whilst they were demanding a repeal of these laws, they must take care they do not split on the rock of a fixed duty, which would, in his opinion, be more injurious than the present law, because it would delay their ultimate repeal. He regretted that the Government had taught the people that however good their cause was, it could only be obtained by clamour, and therefore he urged the people to demand an immediate and total repeal of the Corn Laws. (Applause.)

The resolution was then put and carried with acclamation. Mr. T. BAZLEY, president of the Chamber of Commerce, moved the next resolution:—"That this meeting therefore respectfully, but most earnestly, calls upon her Majesty's Ministers to suspend immediately the operation of the Corn Bill, and to submit to the Legislature, at an early day, a measure for the entire abolition of all laws which restrict the free supply of food." With cheap food they had seen prosperity in trade and manufactures, and with dear food a revulsion of that prosperity, and therefore he urged them to demand the opening of the ports, and having procured that object, care should be taken never again to allow them to be closed. The manufactures of England had scarcely recovered from a depression of many years, when by a failure of the crops and consequent dearness of food, they were again to be plunged into the same state. With cheap food and prosperity of trade the wages of the workmen had been advanced, but with the prospect of bad trade and dear food before them, a reduction of those wages must follow.

Mr. Alderman KERSHAW seconded the motion, and declared that he would not have seconded the resolution had it not contained a demand for a total repeal of the Corn Laws. He had not the nerve to contemplate the pending evils without serious alarm. What has already been the consequences? The state of the money market had been seriously affected, and the price of manufactures had declined within the last two months at least 10 per cent. He felt that in calling on the Government to open the ports he was demanding a measure of humanity; and where were they to look for such succour but from the paternal Government of the country. He did not wish to exaggerate the state of the country; but he could not help calling the attention of the meeting to the awful state of the country, more especially of the manufacturing districts, a few years ago, when its trade was interfered with by the operation of the Corn Laws. He hoped the voice of every town in the kingdom would ring in the ears of her Majesty's Ministers, and on them lie the moral responsibility of the future state of the country if they refused to listen to the prayers of the people.

MARK PHILIPS, Esq., M.P., on rising to move the next resolution, was received with repeated cheers. He observed that they had arrived at an important crisis in their national history, and, without wishing to exaggerate in the least degree the evils to be apprehended, he did not hesitate to say that he agreed in everything that had been said by those who had preceded him, when they spoke of the evils to be dreaded as the result of the scarcity which was now staring them in the face. He had risen to suggest to them now the propriety of embodying the resolutions, which they had just adopted, in the shape of a memorial, to be presented to her Majesty's Government. Her Majesty herself truly and deeply sympathised with the wants and the privations of the people. What would, by and bye, be the feelings of her ministers, on whose actions every political movement in this country depended, if they failed in the present emergency to act in accordance with what were well known to be the heartfelt wishes of her Majesty? (Hear, hear.) That they might better understand his object in rising, he would here read to them the resolution which had been put into his hand, and which was in these words:—"That the following memorial, embodying the sentiments of the previous resolutions, be signed by the mayor on behalf of this meeting, and presented to the right honourable Sir Robert Peel, Bart., First Lord of the Treasury;" and, before proceeding any further, he would also read to them the memorial itself. He would not detain them with many observations in connection with the present aspect of affairs. He would address them for a few moments as an agriculturist, for to agriculture he frequently resorted for recreation and rest from the cares and anxieties of other business. Should famine overtake the land, what would the position of the agriculturist be? This was an important question for all classes to consider. He had of late years taken the deepest interest in the establishment of the system of field gardens, a system from which he was sanguine the most beneficial results would arise. What was at present the condition of many of the holders of small allotments, to say nothing of farmers on a large scale? In his own neighbourhood he feared that the destruction of the potato crop would amount to more than one half of the entire quantity produced—he had serious apprehensions that he would not be able to save, for the purpose of human food, any portion of the crop raised on his own ground. He was now endeavouring, therefore, to secure as much as was available for the supply of nourishment to cattle and pigs. Such was a faithful picture of the district in which he lived, and if it were a correct representation of the condition of many other districts in the kingdom, which he had but too much reason to fear it to be, what a melancholy prospect was opened up, not merely to the manufacturer and merchant, but also to the agriculturist. (Hear, hear.) Many of the last-mentioned would consume all their available potatoes before Christmas, and what then remained for the sustenance of their families? (Cries of hear, hear.) The sliding-scale not only damaged the manufacturer and the mechanic, but also re-acted with terrible force upon the poor agricultural labourers, who were insulted by being told that the Corn Law was the avowed and favourite policy of the landlords, principally on the farm labourer's account. (Hear, hear, hear.) His potatoes gone, either consumed or rotted, he and his family must starve. If they had a pig they must kill it before it was properly fatted, which every economic farmer well knew was a waste of his property—although a waste to which he was driven by imperative necessity. (Hear, hear.) When his pig was consumed, what had he then to depend upon? Why, both the agricultural labourer and his family became then dependent for subsistence upon the supply of grain. (Hear.) If that supply were deficient, and the ports were not opened to remedy the defect, what resource then remained for him, for the supply of his necessities? (Hear, hear.) Thus they plainly perceived that no class of the community whatsoever could be free from the horrible influence of the infernal sliding-scale. (Cheers.) Even with the greatest care, economy, and forbearance, it will be difficult for the farmer to preserve from the produce of this year sufficient for seed for the potato crop of next year. Every practical man was aware of this. Sir Robert Peel was not ignorant of it. (Cheers.) But that was not enough. It was the duty of the people to make their wants and desires known to the Government in a way they could not misunderstand. They must call upon him to show whether he was prepared to govern the country with a view to the welfare and happiness of the great majority of the people, or whether he was still determined to sacrifice these objects for the benefit of one small class of the community? (Hear, hear.) He had a document in his hand which fully confirmed the statement of Mr. Kay, as to what took place in former years of scarcity. That document (which he would not detain the meeting by reading) was prepared by Mr. Royston, of Manchester, and clearly showed what had been the effect of the fluctuations in the price of food in that town. By this paper it appeared that whenever the price of wheat was high, the number of inmates in the workhouse was great in proportion; and that the injury was more permanent than was generally supposed might be gathered from the fact that the number did not decrease in the same proportion and with the same immediate effect as prices lowered. (Hear, hear.) He had been formerly (though he was not now) extensively engaged in foreign trade, and he could tell them from his own experience, that such was the operation of the sliding-scale, that it was utterly impossible for him to exchange his goods for grain, with the view of re-mitting it to this country, with any certainty of profit, for he never could calculate what the price would be here, or what sort of an exchange he could effect. There were many gentlemen on the platform engaged in foreign trade, but he did not believe one of them would venture generally to take wheat for the home market in exchange for his goods, or would have done so this year, however favourable the terms might be on which he could have obtained it. The consequence of the present system was, that all the grain that was brought into this country was brought in by adventurers and speculators, and not by merchants and those regularly engaged in trade. If Sir R. Peel opened the ports—and he would tell him that he must do so (loud cheers)—if he opened them only for a short time, the evil would be not remedied, but aggravated (hear, hear); for in that case, all purchases of grain to supply the present deficiency, must be made in bullion, and as the price at home would speedily become the price abroad—i. e., if the price were 60*s.* here it would be 60*s.* abroad—the money that would be required to purchase it, and money only would be taken, would occasion a drain on the Bank of England, and the pressure on the whole monetary system would be so great, that the strongest capitalist would view it with alarm; and that man who laid his head on his pillow with the consciousness that he was responsible for the wages, and of course the subsistence of perhaps thousands of his fellow-men, would do so with feelings of no very enviable character. They would see, then, that this was a question affecting the poor man as well as the rich—for when the capital of the employer was jeopardised, what was to become of the interest of the working man? Let them then unite in declaring that they would be no longer the slaves of any party or any interest. (Hear, hear.) Let them show to the Government their determination to insist on the carrying out of that natural law which gave every man the right to purchase the food that he wanted in those countries which produced it in the greatest abundance and which sold it cheapest. (Cheers.) Belgium had opened her ports for the admission of foreign corn; Holland had done the same; and the Pacha of Egypt, despot as he was, had shown a regard for the welfare of his people in this respect. He had prohibited the export of corn; he had said to his people, "You shall not export corn, because you will want it to feed yourselves." But with us it appeared that a Dutchman was more valuable than an Englishman, a Belgian than a Scotchman, and an Egyptian than an Irishman. (Cheers.) Let it never be said, however, that the people of Manchester were indifferent to their Irish fellow-subjects. There were 50,000 or 60,000 Irishmen in that town, and he would say to them, as to his own countrymen—let the two countries forget all differences, and endeavour at this juncture to assist each other. (Cheers.) The hour of trial had arrived, and it was for Englishmen to show with what fortitude they would bear the pressure that was even now beginning to work upon them. Let Sir R. Peel see and know that there was a spirit abroad in this country which declared, "We will be fed." We will at all events disentangle ourselves from the baneful influences of the sliding-scale, and leave its promoters and supporters to settle the question among themselves of what is best for their own interests hereafter. (Hear, hear.) If the meeting should be of opinion that it would be desirable for a deputation to wait on Sir Robert Peel with the memorial, he should be most happy to make one, and do all he could to further the views expressed in the resolutions of that day. (Hear, hear.) He would leave no argument unemployed to urge upon the minister the importance of the interests at stake, and which depended on aye or no on this great question. (Hear, hear.)

Mr. JOSEPH BROTHERTON, M.P., seconded the adoption of the memorial. He said he considered the objects of the meeting to be good, and the means taken wise and politic. He would ask, were they asking the Ministers for a favour or a right? ("Right.") The landowners undertook to feed the people, and they had not done so, and therefore the people must now demand the privilege of feeding themselves. He was of the same opinion as Mr. Walker; he believed Sir R. Peel could repeal the Corn Laws, and he must be made to know that the people demanded it as a right, and were determined to have it. (Applause.)

The memorial was carried with loud cheers; and Messrs. Phillips, Brotherton, May, and Greg appointed a deputation to present it.

On the motion of Mr. Robert Gardner, seconded by Mr. White, thanks were voted to the mayor, and the proceedings terminated about two o'clock.

We have been compelled greatly to abridge the report of the proceedings at this important meeting from the pressure of time and space.

COMMON COUNCIL, MANCHESTER.

MANCHESTER.—At a meeting of the town council on Wednesday, after the business on the notice paper had been gone through.

Mr. Councillor SHUTTLEWORTH asked whether this was not an adjourned quarterly meeting, and if so, whether it was not competent for a member of the council to propose a motion of which notice had not been given?

The TOWN CLERK, after a short consultation with the mayor and ex-mayor, said although their circular did not state that this was not an adjourned quarterly meeting as well as special meeting, yet he had read the proceedings of the last meeting at the commencement of the business, by which the quarterly meeting was adjourned to this day, and whether there had been a circular issued or not for special business, the council would have met to-day by that adjournment, and he conceived therefore that it was competent for Mr. Shuttleworth to move any motion though notice of it had not been previously given.

Mr. Councillor SHUTTLEWORTH said he would rather not have moved the resolution before him if any other gentleman, of whom he saw many more competent, would do so; but if no one else rose to make such a motion he must; for he felt it to be a question of duty. (Hear, hear.) He moved a resolution calling upon her Majesty's Ministers to open the ports; and declaring that the council will hold them responsible for the calamities that might result to the country should they neglect to do so. (Loud applause.)

Mr. Councillor PRENTICE said although he had not previously heard the terms of the resolution, he felt bound to second it with all his heart. (Applause.) He must confess that he, along with a great number of the members of the Council, had been guilty of signing a requisition to the mayor to call a meeting on this subject to-morrow (Thursday), and not having taken the trouble to read the heading carefully, he had thought that it was to call a meeting of the Town Council; however, it turned out that it was a requisition to call a public town's meeting. And he was pleased to see that it bore the names of all the aldermen, and nearly all the councillors of the borough. This itself was a pretty strong test of the opinion held upon the question by that Council. Short as the notice was at which the motion was brought before them, he thought the opportunity a favourable one: there was no doubt the minister would be obliged to do something, and as he had himself declared in Parliament that it was the right of every man to buy in the cheapest and sell in the dearest markets, they were only helping him to carry into effect his own opinions. He understood that on a late occasion, when the Mayor was invited to Tamworth, Sir Robert Peel took every opportunity of showing in his person the respect he paid to the town of Manchester, and if he paid that respect to him (Mr. Watkins) as Mayor of Manchester, it was to be hoped that he would pay the same respect to a memorial from the town of Manchester when it was signed by him as the Mayor of Manchester. (Hear, and applause.)

Mr. MATTHEW TOMLINSON supported the motion, and said he was happy to find that it put the responsibility of neglecting to comply with its object where it was said to rest by a gentleman once a distinguished member of their body—Mr. Cobden—upon the ministers. (Hear, hear.)

Mr. Ald. KAY (late mayor) said he did not rise to object to the motion, but he suggested that it would be unwise to affix responsibility where it did not exactly rest. Sir Robert Peel and his colleagues could only open the ports with the sanction of Parliament, and if they were to open them during the recess they would have to ask Parliament, upon its assembling, for an act of indemnity. He suggested that a committee be appointed, who should retire from the Council, and put the resolution into such shape that it would be less objectionable. Ultimately, upon this suggestion, Mr. Ald. Nield, Mr. Ald. Kay, Mr. Shuttleworth, Mr. Prentice, and Mr. A. Heywood, were appointed a committee to retire, and after an absence of about ten minutes, they returned with Mr. Shuttleworth's resolution slightly altered, and put in the form of a memorial to Sir Robert Peel.

Mr. SHUTTLEWORTH said he thought at the time that he and Mr. Ald. Kay were agreed on this subject, though they expressed themselves differently and misunderstood each other. Mr. Ald. Kay meant legal responsibility, and he (Mr. Shuttleworth) moral responsibility. He had great pleasure in moving the memorial, and that it be signed by the mayor on behalf of the Town Council, and that the common seal of the Corporation be attached to it, and that it be presented to Sir Robert Peel. (Applause.) He felt that after the sentiments he had expressed, Sir Robert Peel must only be acting in accordance with his own wishes and convictions in acceding to the prayer of their memorial, for though closely connected with the landlords, he had as clear a perception of our commercial interests as any of them, and he (Mr. Shuttleworth) had no doubt that he was preparing—if not in ordinary sense of the term, in one which might be readily understood—to “turn another sod”—(hear, hear, and laughter) and to enable them still to occupy that position in the country which they ought and must occupy. (Applause.)

Mr. Ald. KAY said he could not but look at the course likely to be taken in the present emergency with singular apprehension—for though on looking over the files of the newspapers for the last six months, he found that though Lord Stanley had abstained from alluding to the state of the harvest, yet the Duke of Rutland (who was one of that class who thought it right to enjoy the revenue from their estates, without reference to the comforts of other classes) stated at an agricultural meeting that the results of the harvest had been satisfactory. (Hear, hear.) Now he (Mr. Ald. Kay) thought that the duke must have been sadly misinformed, for in less than a fortnight after, that statement was followed by a report stating that the harvest in Ireland was awfully deficient, and that the potato murrain was almost universal. (Hear, hear.) He trusted that this memorial, backed by the others which were flowing in from all parts of the country, would have the effect sought, and with that hope he cordially seconded it.

After a few words from Mr. TOMLINSON the motion was agreed to unanimously, and the council separated.

SALFORD.

SALFORD COUNCIL.—A special council was held on Saturday last, at the Salford Town Hall, in order to adopt a memorial to the Lords of the Treasury, praying that the ports may be forthwith opened for the free admission of foreign corn. At 9 o'clock, John Kay, Esq., the mayor, took the chair.

Mr. Alderman LOCKETT then moved the series of resolutions, of which he gave notice at the last meeting, declaring the necessity, at the present crisis, of opening the ports for the free admission of foreign corn, and determining the council to adopt a memorial to the Lords of the Treasury, praying that the ports may be opened forthwith. In moving the resolutions, he said, the injurious effects of the Corn Laws were now so well understood, that it needed no eloquence to convince the council that it was their duty, as well for their own interests as those of the public at large, to endeavour to get those wicked laws as soon as possible repealed. He had collected a few facts from various Poor Law and other reports, and he thought those facts would show the alarm and horror with which they ought to view the present state of the country. He would begin near home, where the effects of the present high price of corn had begun to be severely felt. In June this year, the guardians of the poor of the Salford Union were paying 5d. for a 4lb. loaf; they were now paying 7d. Taking the population of the Salford Union at 70,000, and allowing each person a 4lb. loaf weekly (which was less than the inmates of the workhouse were allowed), the difference in the cost would be 30,338l. per annum, or 583l. per week, for the Salford Union alone. (Hear, hear.) Now, look at the effect which this large additional expenditure for bread must have upon the drapers, shoemakers, tailors, and other trades supplying the necessities of life! Suppose a family to consist of a man, his wife, and four children, and that they only used the same quantity of bread which was allowed to paupers, that family would have now to pay at the rate of 2l. 12s. a year extra for bread, compared with what they had to pay in June last. 2l. 12s. a year might be thought a small sum; but it was a very large one to a working man; and, by having to pay that amount extra for bread for his family, he was deprived of many other necessities which he might otherwise obtain. Suppose the population of Great Britain were taken at 20 millions—which would be about the population now, allowing for the increase since the census—we should be paying for bread alone, since June last, at the rate of 8,666,000l. extra per annum, or 166,135l. per week; and, if matters went on as they appeared to be doing, the 4lb. loaf would be 8d. or 9d. This must evidently deprive the working classes of the power of buying manufactured goods for clothing, and thereby decrease our manufactures, and injure trade to a very great extent. We talked about the Income-tax; but this tax upon bread was ten times more oppressive than the Income-tax, because it fell upon a great multitude of those who were not able to bear it. Then look at the effect which it had upon the poor-rates. In 1837, when wheat averaged 41s. 9d. per quarter, the amount expended in poor rates in Lancashire was 183,790l. In 1840, when the average price of wheat had risen to 68s. 6d. per qr., the poor rates amounted to 239,491l., being an increase of 55,701l. In England, in 1837, when wheat was 49s. 9d. per qr., the amount expended in poor rates was 3,803,309l.; in 1840, with wheat at 68s. 6d. per quarter, the expenditure for the relief of the poor was 4,315,241l., being an increase of 511,935l. over the previous year. In 1836, when the average price of wheat was 40s. per quarter, the poor rates in Salford amounted to 52,000l.; but in 1840, when wheat was 68s. 6d. per quarter, their poor rates were 74,000l. This was a most serious and alarming increase. At that time a statement was given, showing that there had been a decrease in the receipts of 50 shopkeepers in Salford of 67,200l. per annum, as compared with the years of cheap food. This showed that the higher the price of corn the less was expended in manufactured goods. The receipts of all descriptions of shopkeepers fell off. The receipts of bakers, though bread was at a higher price, were less, because the people could not purchase the bread; they purchased in less quantities. In the same year, 1840, according to the Poor Law Commissioners' report, there were 28,350 able-bodied paupers receiving relief for want of work in this county. It was said that the Corn Laws were made to protect agriculturists and agricultural labourers. Let us see from the report of the Poor Law Commissioners what protection the agriculturists had under the Corn Laws, which were the greatest delusion, the greatest humbug, if he might use the word, that could be put before that body as a protection. The expenditure in poor rates in twelve agricultural counties in 1840, when corn was at a high price, was 74d. per head upon the population of those counties. At that time, though there was very great distress, the expenditure in poor rates in Salford only amounted to 4s. 1½d. per head upon the population. What protection, then, could there be for the agriculturists? They were suffering equally with ourselves, and no class was protected by the Corn Laws unless it were the landlords. In 1840, in twelve counties, there were 53,546 able-bodied paupers out of employment. Mark how pauperism increased as high prices and consequent distress increased. In 1841, the number of paupers out of employment in those 12 counties was 76,945, making an increase in one year of 4505 paupers without work; and this was at a time when corn was at a high price. (Hear, hear.) Not only did dear corn increase the number of paupers and the expenditure in poor-rates, but it lessened our trade and commerce to a very great degree. All recollected the distress and want of employment which existed in this and the neighbouring towns. The cause was evident; for when the people had to pay so much more for their food it must prevent them from buying manufactured articles. It had been said by the advocates of the Corn Laws that the agricultural districts furnished the great mart for manufactures, but the consumption of manufactured goods in the agricultural districts was nothing compared with what it was here. Again, the Corn Laws had a most serious effect upon the morals of the people, for when corn increased so much in price there was a most rapid increase in the amount of crime. In 1835, when wheat was 39s. a quarter, there were in England 20,700 commitments; in 1841, when wheat was at 64s. per quarter, there were 27,700 commitments; making an increase of 7000 culprits. These were stubborn facts, and could not be refuted; and they were facts which called upon the council to set their shoulders to the wheel to endeavour to get those wicked laws removed. What he proposed was merely a memorial to open the ports, a step the necessity of which was apparent to all; but he was in hopes that if once the ports were opened, the benefits arising therefrom would be so obvious, that the Corn Laws would be done away with for ever. (Applause.)

Mr. Alderman HARVEY, in an able speech, seconded the proposition, which was carried unanimously, amidst great applause.

THE TOWN CLERK said, that in anticipation of the resolutions being passed, a memorial to the Lords of the Treasury had been prepared. It was an echo of the resolutions.

After the memorial had been read, a resolution was passed, approving of the memorial as read, and ordering that the same should be signed by the mayor, sealed with the common seal of the corporation, and transmitted to Sir R. Peel, the First Lord of the Treasury.

LEEDS.

LEEDS TOWN COUNCIL.—The first meeting of the Leeds Town Council, since the recent municipal elections, was held on Monday last, the Mayor (Darnton Lupton, Esq.) in the chair. The whole of the members were present except Aldermen Jackson, Gaunt, and Carbutt; Councillors Watson, Heaps, Horner, Weddell, Hobson, and Hainsworth. A considerable number of spectators had assembled in the gallery.

At the close of the other business of the Council, Mr. Barrett introduced a memorial to her Majesty's Government, praying for the immediate opening of the ports for the admission of all kinds of food. In the course of his remarks in support of the memorial, he said that it was a notorious fact that a large proportion of the produce of this country would be deficient, not only in grain but also in potatoes. Setting the deficiency in the potato crop aside, he had from the best statistical accounts he could lay his hands upon, estimated that the deficiency in grain of various kinds would be eight or nine million quarters. (Hear, hear.) This fact he showed from calculations founded upon the estimates of the annual yield and consumption of grain taken from McCulloch and other sources. The deficiency in the wheat crop alone (taking into account both its quality and quantity) as compared with 1844, he showed to be no less than 10 per cent. With so lamentably inadequate supply of food, he conceived that the people must be reduced to a state of famine, unless some means were resorted to to supply the deficiency. And the question arose, from what source an amount of food, equal to the deficiency in this country, was to be derived? Holland, Belgium, Germany, Turkey, and Russia, had likewise a deficiency in their produce. We could evidently not, therefore, look to Europe for a supply. Indeed, the probability was, that these our nearest and best markets, would rather seek to obtain corn from us, than be able to supply us with their own. (Cries of hear, hear.) We might next turn to Canada, but (considering the advanced season), the St. Lawrence might be closed by frost, before we could get our ships there. We might then go to the United States, which had a surplus of grain; but if we went there, we had no time to lose, inasmuch as various other countries were ready to compete with us in that market; and if we delayed, snatched from our hands the promised blessing. (Hear, hear.) Having impressed upon the Council the dire calamities that must ensue, if the deficiency of food were allowed to continue, he read the memorial, and called upon them to give a unanimous vote in its support. (Applause.)

Mr. NUNNERY seconded the adoption of the memorial. Mr. HEYWOOD complained of being taken by surprise, by a motion of so much importance being introduced without previous notice. He therefore proposed that the consideration of the question should be adjourned until Wednesday. Mr. BULMER, taking a similar view, seconded the adjournment. Some discussion ensued, in which several of the monopolist members expressed their opinion that there was not so much ground for alarm as Mr. Barrett had represented, and argued that the matter might be left in the hands of the Government, who were making every inquiry, with a view to be prepared to do whatever the circumstances of the country might require. On the question being put to the vote, an adjournment for half an hour was carried. On the council resuming, the monopolists, who had been in favour of the adjournment to Wednesday, were absent; though Mr. Heywood had threatened in terrorem, that (if they did not adjourn to another day) his first speech would occupy till midnight.

Mr. YEWDALE resumed the debate in a very able and eloquent speech. He was followed by Mr. Alderman GOODMAN and Mr. Alderman BATESON; after which, Mr. BARRETT replied, and eventually the memorial, with some modifications, was unanimously adopted.

The meeting then separated at 11 o'clock, having been assembled eleven hours.—Leeds Times.

SHEFFIELD.

SHEFFIELD.—The town council of Sheffield held a meeting on Monday, the 10th instant, for the purpose of memorialising her Majesty's Ministers to open the ports for the free admission of corn. The motion was proposed by Mr. ATKIN, and seconded by Mr. FISHER, jun. Mr. Alderman DUNN opposed the motion on some peculiar grounds of his own that are not very clearly stated in the report of his speech. He denounced the Corn Laws, however, most emphatically, but advocated a town's meeting.

A desultory discussion ensued; after which Mr. ATKIN, in reply, said Alderman Dunn had been very ingenious in erecting a giant, for the purpose of knocking him down. In the outset of his remarks, he deprecated political discussion; and then he proceeded to make a speech which, had he been in the chair, he would not have allowed any gentleman to make unchecked. He knew that they were trenching on delicate ground, and therefore he had been the more guarded. The broad fact was, that famine was staring them in the face. Whether the ports could be again closed if they were open, better politicians than he must decide; but the general opinion was, that if once opened, no power on earth could shut them. But what was to become of Ireland, if the ports were to remain shut until they could be opened by Act of Parliament? When the two factions met again, there would be protracted discussions; and what were the people to do in the meantime? The question appeared to him to be one of such emergency, and so clearly a question of humanity, that he should have expected Alderman Dunn to have held up both hands in its favour. It was their duty to deliberate for the interests of the town, and he appealed to Alderman Dunn whether he did not find that as food became scarce, crime increased? If this were so, how would it be in a state of actual famine? It was their duty, as guardians of the town, to guard against crime; and that was a reason for the support of this motion. The discussion here would be a means of arousing the public mind, and preparing it for a public meeting, which was not always a very deliberative assembly. It was for them to pray, on the ground of humanity, that the ports might be opened to meet the emergency. It would be for a public meeting afterwards to discuss the question politically and morally.

The motion was then put to the vote, and carried by a large majority, four hands only being held up against it.

NOTTINGHAM.

NOTTINGHAM, Nov. 19.—At the meeting of the town council to-day, Mr. TAYLOR brought forward a motion on the subject of memorialising the Government to open the ports at this important crisis, to prevent difficulties which must arise, should they not be opened, from a scarcity of food arising from an insufficient crop of wheat and the disease amongst potatoes. He urged the necessity of the memorial to strengthen the hands of those in the Cabinet who might be favourable, and condemned the policy of deferring to do an act which all the nations of Europe had thought it right to pursue for the purpose of affording an ample supply of provisions to the inhabitants, and to prevent their being visited with the horrors of famine. He begged to move, that with the fearful prospect of distress occasioned by the deficiency of the late harvest, the council deem it expedient that a memorial in conformity with this resolution be prepared and transmitted to the Lords of the Treasury, and that the mayor do affix the common seal to such memorial.

Mr. J. BRADLEY seconded the motion, as he considered the present a very momentous crisis, and the subject one of vast importance to the country at large. At Manchester within the last few days they had memorialised the Government, and the mayor had called a town's meeting; and at Huddersfield and other places, the subject was attracting general attention. There being no time to be lost, he would urge the council to be prompt and decided, as the gaunt spectre of famine was on the threshold.

Mr. WAKEFIELD thought the alarm created had been greater than necessary; but he should vote for the memorial.

Sir T. H. SMITH did not feel there was so much cause for alarm as to be in such haste. He never knew greater plenty than at the present moment; and he thought potatoes were cheap, as a man came to his door and begged and prayed of him to buy some of him at 4s. a sack.

Mr. Alderman WILSON said it was undeniably true that the wheat crop was deficient, and the potato crop had failed at least one-third or one-fourth—he meant as to sound potatoes; and there was great fear that seed would not be found for the next planting. The people felt convinced that their potatoes would not keep, hence they begged and prayed for persons to buy at almost any price. He had bought 10 sacks for sound potatoes a very short time ago, and they had begun to decay, and he was obliged to return them as he had wanted them to send away. He therefore urged that a memorial be sent without delay.

Many members of the council spoke in favour of the motion, and it was carried unanimously, and a committee was appointed to draw up a memorial agreeing with the spirit of the resolution.

STOCKPORT.

STOCKPORT BOROUGH COUNCIL.—The annual meeting of the borough council was held in the Court House at noon on Monday last, the mayor in the chair. There were present besides, 10 aldermen, upwards of 30 councillors. The various committees having been appointed.

Mr. J. D. FERNLEY, after taking a glance at the present prospects of the country as regards the supply of food, proposed, “That a strong but respectful memorial should be addressed to Government by the council, in favour of the opening of the ports.”

Mr. J. J. MOODY seconded the motion. After some conversation, in which Mr. Alderman Marsland, M.P., and Alderman Nelstrop took part, the resolution was carried, and a memorial adopted.

OLDHAM.

OLDHAM.—A highly-spirited and numerous attended public meeting of the inhabitants of Oldham was held in the Town Hall on Monday last, to memorialise Ministers to open the ports. Many excellent speeches were made and most enthusiastically received by the meeting, and the resolutions and memorial passed unanimously.

NEWCASTLE-UPON-TYNE.

NEWCASTLE CHAMBER OF COMMERCE.—On Wednesday afternoon a large and influential meeting of the Chamber of Commerce was held in the Council Chamber, Guildhall, to consider the propriety of memorialising her Majesty's Government to open the ports of the United Kingdom for the free admission of corn under the present circumstances of the country. Alderman Wilson, one of the Vice-Presidents, in the chair.

Mr. E. H. POLLARD, without comment, moved the adoption of a memorial to the Right Hon. Sir Robert Peel, Bart.

Mr. W. ARMSTRONG, a member of the Town Council, and an extensive corn-merchant, opposed the memorial, on the ground that no cause existed to apprehend a deficient supply of wheat. He maintained that the opening of the ports would benefit none but the foreigner, or the English speculator.

Mr. C. RAYNE, also an extensive merchant, combated the arguments advanced by the preceding speaker, showing that the sliding-scale cheated the consumer without benefiting the farmer; and, when as high as at present, produced the very fluctuations it professed to avoid. The necessity for open ports was urgent. The supply of wheat was deficient, as the market price proved, and the quality was greatly inferior to that of the produce of last year's harvest. The potato crop was notoriously a failure, and as Government would have to do something to preserve the Irish poor from starvation, it was indispensable that a supply of grain should be obtained before continental competitors had secured all that was to be had.

On a show of hands, the motion was carried nearly unanimously.

AYR.

AYR TOWN COUNCIL.—The council met for the first time after the annual election, on Friday morning, Provost Miller presiding. The attendance was full, including the newly elected councillors.

The Provost stated that although it was rather an unusual practice to transact any other business at the meeting immediately after the annual election, yet from the urgency of the case he felt himself justified in laying before them a memorial to Government craving for the opening of the ports for the admission of all kinds of grain free from duty. The failure of the potato crop called for some such step, and without entering into the question of the Corn Laws, he hoped all would unite with him in the prayer of the petition. The Provost then read the draft of a petition.

Mr. GEMMELL seconded the motion, and said he hoped the petition would be granted. He thought it would be cruel in any minister, and dangerous to the well-being of the country, to shut out grain from a peaceable and industrious people, in the prospect of something like famine during the approaching winter.

The motion was unanimously agreed to.

MONTROSE.

MONTROSE TOWN COUNCIL.—The first meeting of the new Town Council took place on Friday forenoon, at 10 o'clock. All the members were present, with the exception of Mr. D. Low. After the routine business, the Council, on the motion of Mr. Watt, baker, resolved to present a memorial to the Lords of the Treasury, praying their lordships to throw open the ports throughout the kingdom for the importation of grain duty free.

BOLTON.—A requisition most numerously and respectfully signed, has been presented to the Mayor of Bolton, requesting him to convene a town's meeting to memorialise her Majesty's Ministers to open the ports. He has consented to call the meeting, which will be held in the course of next week.

OPENING OF THE PORTS.—A letter was read from Sir James Graham, merely acknowledging the receipt of the Council's memorial, praying Government to open the ports for the free admission of foreign corn.—Scotsman.

OPENING OF THE PORTS.—We are glad to be able to state that our friends in the neighbouring borough of Gateshead are acting on our advice. A requisition is in course of signature, requesting the mayor to call a public meeting to petition for opening the ports, and we shall doubtless have the pleasure of reporting the proceeding of this and similar meetings in our next. The Chamber of Commerce, it will be observed, meets to-day, to promote the same object.

GATESHEAD AND THE CORN LAWS.—Some years ago, when Mr. Alderman Brockett brought before the Town Council of Gateshead a motion for the repeal of the Corn Laws, it was negatived by that body. On Monday last, at the annual meeting, the standing orders were suspended, that the same gentleman might move, without previous notice, a memorial to Sir Robert Peel for the opening of the ports, and the memorial was unanimously adopted. And not only adopted nem. con., but the show of hands in its favour was general, and not a whisper of dissent was heard. A similar memorial has also been adopted by the Newcastle Council.

CAMBRIDGE.—Mr. Falvey delivered an address on Free Trade and the present critical state of the country, in the large room of the White Bear Inn, Cambridge, on Monday evening last. Henry Staples Foster, Esq., was in the chair, the room was quite full with a very influential audience, many Conservatives and members of the University being among the number. Mr. Falvey pointed out the necessity of an immediate opening of the ports, and of keeping them open, in order that the people may be properly fed, and the prosperity of trade and commerce permanently maintained. Mr. Foster, the chairman, made a spirited and pointed speech, and suggested the propriety of getting up a memorial to Government in favour of opening the ports, which was unanimously agreed to. The meeting then broke up, with three hearty cheers in favour of Free Trade.

IMPORTATION OF CORN AND CATTLE.—A memorial to the Queen is now in course of signature in Exeter, praying her Majesty, by Order in Council, to give free importation to corn and cattle, and every description of food for "man and beast," and "the abolition of all taxes and dues, of whatever description, on the necessities of life."—Devonport Telegraph.

FREE TRADE ASSOCIATION.—An institution bearing the above noble title has recently been established in Wigan. The society, which has been only formed about a week, already numbers near 200 members, and 50 more have been proposed. Mr. W. F. Brand has been appointed president, and Mr. Joshua Coop vice-president. We understand that it is the intention of the committee to establish a news-room in connection with the association, as soon as convenient premises can be procured. We wish the undertaking every success, and trust that the Free Traders of the borough of Wigan will give it their hearty support. The terms of admission are very liberal, being within the reach of the most humble artisan.

ADMISSION OF INDIAN CORN.—The chairman of the American Chamber of Commerce, Liverpool, has received a letter from Lord Sandon, expressing his lordship's approval of the memorial to the Privy Council in favour of admitting Indian corn. His lordship thinks that such a course on the part of our Government would greatly strengthen in America the hands of those who advocate the relaxation of the tariff.

TRADE WITH CHINA.—We understand from Mr. Court, of the Underwriters' Rooms, that the letters received by the mail from China, on Saturday evening, announce the extraordinary arrival of no less than 21 vessels at Hong Kong, direct from Liverpool, since the sailing of the previous mail.—Liverpool Albion.

CORN LAWS.—Just published, price 2s.,

AN ATTEMPT TO ESTIMATE THE EFFECTS OF PROTECTING DUTIES ON THE PROFITS OF AGRICULTURE, by JOHN MORTON, F.G.S., Author of "The Nature and Property of Soils," &c.; and JOSHUA TRIMMER, F.G.S., Author of "Practical Geology and Mineralogy," &c.
James Ridgway, Piccadilly, and all booksellers.

"On occasions of this kind I have generally said a few words as to the bearing of the Corn Laws on Agriculture, but that part of the subject has been taken out of my hands. A little pamphlet, published by Messrs. Trimmer and Morton, practical agriculturists, has quite superseded any observation I could make. They looked on the Corn Laws in a debtor and creditor point of view. They took different farms in different soils, and they showed what their owners gained by protection, and what they lost. The first time I received that book I was a little staggered by the facts which it adduced; but having read and considered it several times, I am quite satisfied that it underpins rather than overpays the real state of the case. Now, as I know a great many willing and anxious to see a repeal of the Corn Laws, and to secure full commercial freedom, who have some lingering doubts as to whether their agricultural friends may not suffer in some way or other from such an event, I recommend all such persons to lay out a couple of shillings in the purchase of the pamphlet, and to read it carefully through."—From Earl Ducie's Speech at the Birmingham Meeting.

LETTERS ON THE CORN LAWS, No. L.

TO THE PEOPLE OF ENGLAND.

At this critical period you are cast upon your own resources. You must think and act for your selves: there is no one to think and act for you. In the prospect of Irish famine and English scarcity, the people are quietly left to their own devices. Monarchy, aristocracy, and representation—Church and State—Privy Councillors and Cabinet Ministers—all are mute as the grave. The oracles are dumb. Prove yourselves, then, equal to the occasion. Show that you can think and act, and that you will. Be not paralysed by the abandonment. Look onwards, full in the face of whatever probable calamity is coming, and adopt your measures accordingly. There is in you, as I believe, a spirit of intelligence that will not fail, but rise to the emergency—unfettered by the desertion of those whose function is to watch over the public safety, which most assuredly would be perilled by any approach towards public starvation.

Exact knowledge of the existing supplies of food within your reach might at this time have been in your possession, had Parliament acceded to the desires of its Free Trade members. The parties who refused information now cant of exaggeration. They who have legislated for artificial scarcity will tell you there is no scarcity, until the competition of a hungry population wrings out famine prices for their profit. Suppose there is exaggeration; that fact only enhances the difficulty of your condition. Deficiency, a large deficiency, is certain. The dictate of wisdom is, to make as sure as possible that, whatever its extent, there shall be the means of counteraction. Who can put a great nation upon a workhouse dietary? Who shall say, thus far may consumption be economised, and the population kept just alive by the reduced and damaged rations in their stores? It may be that the self-appointed feeders of the community can so far supply its wants (at their own prices) as that not more than some few thousands need be actually famished. And it also may be, that even so much is beyond their power to accomplish; and they and Death will reap their harvest together. This is no time for such nice calculations. Those who have once been burned out, with life scarcely saved, will only sleep in peace, knowing a fire escape to be at hand. Let the people of England have their famine-escape in readiness.

While Cabinet Councils held daily consultations, you quietly awaited the result. There were few who doubted what that result would be; and the disappointment was as deep as the expectation was general. But there was no precipitancy on your part. You did not assume before-hand the indecision of the Government, or its temporary indifference, or the ascendancy of class interest over a nation's rights and wants. No; you hoped and believed right willingly, until ministers ended their deliberations, and with no announced determination dispersed, and returned to their rural amusements. Then arose the feeling that if they would not act, you must.

If those who should take care that you be fed are silent, not so those who take care that your food be taxed. They, too, have deliberated, and their published resolve is for no relaxation. The banner of "Protection" is raised in alliance with that of scarcity. As the Somerset report says, "the present season promises to be more remunerative." Yes; it will remunerate the landlord, the gravedigger, and the hangman. It will augment rents and wretchedness. It will tell upon tithes and typhus. There must be ghastly want to realise this golden "remuneration."

The sliding-scale has attained the climax of self-falsification in its professed objects. With wholesome food verging on a famine price, it excludes supply. Bad corn must keep down the averages. Were not a wheat-ear grown in the country fit for grinding into flour, the stuff that but serves to thicken hogswash would regulate the averages, sustain the duties, and keep the ports closed. Such is the practical working of this nefarious contrivance. Will you hear with patience of trying this machinery again, with some further tinkering? Is there any one expedient which you ought to ask for, or accept, save that most simple and efficient one, of the immediate opening of our ports for the reception of food, from whatever region it can be obtained?

To claim that measure forthwith—not as a temporary arrangement, but a final policy—is your only prudent course of procedure. Meet throughout the country in your town-halls, and according to whatever corporate capacity may entitle your voice to be heard. Memorialise Sir Robert Peel, the responsible Prime Minister of the empire; say that to HIM the nation looks, not for good intentions but efficient action. Demand of him that he be the real as well as the nominal head of the Government, or give way to some man of moral courage better proportioned to the emergency. Tell him that all reasonable time for procrastination or compromise is gone; he must decide to be the despised tool of a selfish class, or the idolised leader of a grateful people. If to some "the present season promises to be remunerative," to him it threatens to be retributive. He is made or marred for ever as a statesman by his conduct now. Bid him defy class interests; he cannot fall with a nation at his back; nor can he long stand, if now unfaithful to its righteous claims for safeguards against the worst of public calamities.

And while you meet, and memorialise, and remonstrate, neglect not the continuance of that good work which chiefly gives power to your resolutions. It was an idle menace when petitions were described as coming from so many thousand men "capable of bearing arms." Let your memorials be from tens and hundreds of thousands capable of being registered. Let them be not only capable, but actually on the registry. They are appended to the death-warrant of monopoly.

The people are not less deeply responsible than the minister. He can only be strong for them as they are strong for themselves. Reliance on him is a self-betraying confidence. Silently trust him, and he is weak as water. Trust only to yourselves and your just cause. Show him that the hour is come, and the man will not be wanting. The hour will make its man. Only be the nation's will adequately expressed—no pretence afforded for delay by seeming apathy—and that will is certain of agents for its fulfilment. All depends on your duty being done well and promptly. Quiescence at the present moment is treachery and treason. It is now or never, for the people of England. Winter and want are on their way; and the cold shadows they cast before them begin to darken the land.

A NORWICH WEAVER BOY.

At the Southland municipal election, only three Tories were returned,—a strong proof, notwithstanding Mr. Hudson's election, of the liberal character of the town.

LETTERS FROM THE SOUTH OF ENGLAND.

TURNIPS, 'TATOES, AND PHILOSOPHERS.

During the last fortnight I have met at least twenty farmers who have spoken to this effect:—"The 'tatoes are going bad, and that is bad enough; but look at the turnips, see how they are going with the disease. What be us to do if the turnips go like the 'tatoes?"

Well, I have looked at the turnips, and there is unquestionably a disease of most formidable character in the Swedes—in that turnip of all others least liable to disease. Whether it has any relationship to the potato-trouble I am not learned enough in the science of conjecture to say; but that the only remedy for it is also the only remedy for the potato famine I venture to call myself learned enough to declare. "Give us bread instead of 'tatoes," as a Hampshire ploughman said to me the other day, "and you wunt see we bemoaning the 'tatoes long; let we ha' bread enough, and then there will be 'tatoes enough."

With a scarcity of bread in Europe, it may not by any administrative or legislative act of our government be possible to give the Hampshire ploughman enough of bread instead of his 'tatoes—"gone," as he says, "all to stink, till even a hog shakes his head at them. But across the sea, be it the German Ocean or the Atlantic, we must look for succour; there is none nearer."

Last year there was a scarcity of turnips, and also of hay, in the south of England, and the flockmasters felt the scarcity, and feel it yet, for their sheep starved and let their wool drop from their poor carcasses. It was a grievous thing to the farmers to have a scarcity of provender of their own growth; to have to pay 7l. per ton for hay; to have to borrow money—those who could borrow, or give away all their ready cash, those who had any, to get the very scarce and the very dear provender to keep their flocks and cattle from starvation, which, after all, were not more than kept alive; and the more grievous was it that they were compelled to do this in the face of an abundance of cheap and good provender, which only wanted the fetching from the other side of the sea, had there not been a legislative barrier in the way;—a barrier put up to keep every body out of their manger, and which kept them to their own and out of everybody else's when their own was empty.

If there be a scarcity of turnips this year the cause will not be the same as last year. Then they never grew. This year they have grown, and grown luxuriantly. But the remedy, so far as a remedy can be applied on so short a notice, will be the same which should have been applied last year when there was a long notice—a whole summer's notice—of winter scarcity of provender for cattle; to wit, open ports;—"ports opened, and the nation standing with its back against them never to let them be shut again," as was recently said, and said well.

I could fill column after column of the LEAGUE paper, from beginning to end, with the details of the potato disease where I have been lately travelling; but I will not do so. It is enough to say that in the south and west of England, where potatoes are the chief food of the working population, the disease is making universal havoc. No kind of potato; no variety of soil on which they were grown; no skill in treating them; no lesson of science from the philosophers; no exorcism from New Forest gypsies and witches; and, Heaven forbid that it be always so! no prayer to Almighty God has yet arrested the progress of this frightful calamity. I have been in seventy and odd different parishes within the last ten days, and each seems as I go along to be more deplorably famine-bitten than another.

Were it not a subject so melancholy, so fraught with awful consequences, so full of calamity to the eaters of every kind of food, from the parent of the family who looks at his 'tatoes and says, "they be so gone to stink they ben't fit for a hog, but, poor hearts! you boys and girls must eat 'em"—up to the parent of the Cabinet Council, who says, or should say, "the 'tatoes be so gone to stink that words like mine are words more fit for a devil than a prime minister, but, good people all, you must eat them, these stinking 'tatoes, or else go without;" I say, were the subject not so charged with calamity, so fraught with peril to personal and national well-being, some of the views which this potato famine presents would be grotesquely comic. As it is there are comic actors in it.

Professor Henslow, of Cambridge, was the first to put on a grave face and perpetrate a joke. But being the first, and being withal a grave, worthy, and well-meaning gentleman (excepting only his jokes upon a melancholy subject), some people thought him in earnest, and did not laugh. The professor recommended that the rich, whose tables are always well spread with substantial and luxuries, upon which potatoes are but an item in the bill of fare, should for one year dismiss that item, that the potato market might be the better supplied for the potato eaters. In other words, that two millions of families who eat few potatoes, but a great deal of beef and bread, should stick to their beef and bread, that fourteen millions of families should have the benefit of their few potatoes in the market.

But the best joke is one by Professor Buckland, of Oxford, the eminent geologist. If I should be wrong, and the professor is not joking, then I shall presume to infer that the learned gentleman is better acquainted with the things under the earth than the things upon the face of the earth, with megatheriums than with men and women, with the strata of the rocks than the strata of society. In a letter to the Times the other day the doctor thus instructs the potato sufferers:—

"Steam or boil all potatoes in which the smallest speck of decay has appeared, and ram them down airtight in large jars or pans, covered over at the top with a layer of fat, to be left like potted meat for use during winter, and stored in a dry place."

Lord bless Dr. Buckland! where is the fat to come from? where the fuel to steam or boil the potatoes? where the jars and pans? And if the fat was there, would it keep out the air? would it not go to keep out something else?

"We ben't so bad in Botscombe parish, thank God, as they be in Idmiston, and most other parishes. There is some charity here. The clergyman gives some of the people a bit of dripping, or some lard, and they melt that and pour it on the 'tatoes, and that makes them eat better. Bacon, sir, or butter; oh no, nothing of that kind. . . . We only burn a fire when we cooks our 'tatoes, coals be so dear." (See reports of 'tatoe disease in morning papers of last week.)

Dr. Buckland, walk out of Oxford over to Mr. Pulman's estate, Deputy Usher of the Black Rod; take the road where a wild boar fell upon an Oxford student reading a book and devoured him. You know the road. There are no boars now to frighten students from that road. Go over it, and ask the labourers what they live on: you have only to walk three miles from Oxford.

ONE WHO HAS WHISTLED AT THE PLOUGH.

GALASHIELS ANTI-CORN-LAW ASSOCIATION.

We have much pleasure in giving a place in our columns to the following letter from the Right Hon. the Earl of Buchan, to the Galashiels Anti-Corn-Law Association. His lordship has ever been the able and consistent advocate of Free Trade.

"Ammundell, 28th October, 1845.

"Gentlemen,—It would ill become me, after the distinction conferred on me by having the honour of twice being requested to preside at your Free Trade meetings, were I not to express my regret at leaving you for a time; and of testifying my sincere conviction of the singleness and honesty of mind and opinion which actuated you all in this important national movement.

"I have lived long enough in this imperfect world to be upon my guard how far I allow prosperity, however flattering, to inspire me with much confidence in results; yet I cannot help congratulating myself and the supporters of Free Trade, that our prospects are as auspicious as ever.

"Clouds, since we met, have occasionally obscured our view; never, I trust, damped our ardour. The squall in Hudson's Bay, lately, might to the faint-hearted convey a pang of transient uneasiness. It was, however, but a puff, and will end in smoke—the natural accompaniment of a Railway King.

"Our cause and its promoters wish and have no 'tongue to rail'.

"The principles, gentlemen, of the Anti-Corn-Law League agitation, if steadily persevered in, will only terminate in accomplishing the great patriotic and national end for which it was at first gloriously established.—I remain, Gentlemen, most truly yours, BUCHAN."

THE REGISTRATION.

An abstract of the relative gain and loss of Free-Traders and Monopolists in the constituency of the borough of Southampton, Havant, by disqualifications, deaths, &c., and new votes, since the registration of 1841:—

Free-trade gain, 165	Free-trade loss, 109	Increase 56
Monopolist gain, 81	Monopolist loss, 116	Decrease 35

Balance in favour of Free-trade	91
Increase on new, unascertained, and doubtful votes, 179; of which, looking at the relative numbers in the several parishes, and the political characters of the respective parishes, we may fairly calculate on two-thirds being Free-traders	60

Total increase for Free-traders, real and estimated	151

SIR JOHN FRANKLIN'S EXPEDITION.—The expedition to the North Pole, consisting of the Erabus and the Terror, Captain Crozier, under the command of Captain Sir John Franklin, was spoken by the Enterprise, Martin, master, arrived at Peterhead, lying at an iceberg, in lat. 73 12 N. lon. 62 W. on the 28th of July.

Not only did the three past years of cheapness cause a rise in wages, but innumerable benefits, right and left—cheap trains, pleasure trips, &c., all leaving a profit to tradesmen. For instance, in 1843 there were 15,000 visitors to the Isle of Man; in 1844 there were 21,000; while in the present year there were no fewer than 30,000. But what will be the case with wages and enjoyments next year, if we have not Free Trade?

COUNTIES REGISTRATION MOVEMENT.

HUDDERSFIELD.

On Tuesday night, one of the most enthusiastic meetings we have ever witnessed in the West Riding of Yorkshire, on the subject of Free Trade, was held in the Philosophical Hall, Huddersfield, on the occasion of meeting Messrs. Cobden and Bright on the question of the registration. The large hall and the gallery, calculated to hold upwards of 2000 persons, were crowded, and on the orchestra a large number of the most influential men of the town and neighbourhood were seated. Several ladies also were present. The enthusiasm exhibited was most animating, and the speakers' sentiments were cheered with a spirit which seemed to be felt by all. The ardency of desire for the accomplishment of the object sought, or of affection for the persons of the gentlemen who have from year to year so ably advocated the cause of the labouring man, did not appear to be in the least abated; on the contrary, it exhibited itself more strikingly than before. Among the gentlemen we observed W. Willans, Esq., Thomas Mallinson, Esq., T. P. Crosland, Esq., J. Wrigley, Esq., B. Robinson, Esq., T. Pitt, Esq., Joseph Butler, Esq., W. P. England, Esq., William Shaw, Esq., Joseph Shaw, Esq., John Sutcliffe, Esq., J. P., Rev. M. Trappes, T. C. Wrigley, Esq., Joseph Kaye, Esq., T. A. Heapes, Esq., W. Batley, Esq., W. Cooper, Esq., T. Webb, Esq., T. Robinson, Esq., Godfrey Binns, Esq., John Day, Esq., J. Bennet, Esq., Beaumont Taylor, Esq., T. Kilner, Esq., S. Kell, Esq., Sidney Moorhouse, Esq., Wm. Wrigley, Esq., Foster Shaw, Esq., G. D. Tomlinson, Esq., B. Shaw, Esq., Joseph Wrigley, Esq., Joseph Webb, Esq., Rev. John Cockin, R. G. Jackson, Esq., and many other gentlemen.

F. SCHWANN, Esq., was called to the chair, amidst great applause, and said:—Before obeying your call allow me to allude to the painful loss we have sustained by the death of our late president, Mr. Wm. Brook, of Gledbold, who from the commencement of our association was a firm supporter of Free Trade doctrines, and on all occasion stood manfully forward in defence of liberal principles, with more than an ordinary degree of talent and firmness. May Heaven grant strength to his bereft family to sustain their irreparable loss, and may this country never look in vain for men of our lamented friend's sterling qualities in times of danger! It needed not this mournful introduction to mark our proceedings this evening with a character of solemnity. The crowded numbers of our friends—their anxious and inquiring looks—sufficiently indicate how deep an interest they take in the object of our meeting. (Hear.) A whole week has the oracle in Downing-street been sitting to weigh with chemists' scales how small a portion of food might suffice to keep the people quiet. The oracle retires, disappears, and remains silent, leaving the people in the most anxious uncertainty about the future. What a glorious opportunity was here lost to place the aristocracy of the country into their true position, as the respected and beloved leaders of the people, conceding that with gracious kindness and affection which will shortly be demanded as an act of right and justice. So much seems agreed, that the ports are not to be opened at present—at a period when an early frost may suddenly cut us off from our best supplies. This is fearful gambling with the temper, patience, and lives of millions of beings apprehensive of famine, and reminds me of a passage from French history shortly before the revolution, when a Cabinet Minister, Foulon, under very similar circumstances, suggested—"The people might eat grass if they could not get bread." Shortly after, the same minister was seen paraded through the streets of Paris with a handful of grass protruding from his mouth! (Cheers.) After a short-lived prosperity we may, from present appearances, once more prepare to encounter all the sufferings of commercial distress—paralysed industry, scanty employment, lower wages, a pauperised and discontented working population, and all the miseries—physical, social, and moral—which are inseparable from a dear and scanty supply of food. (Hear, hear.) What a pity that a minister understanding the working of the Corn Law as well as Sir Robert, should have allowed things to arrive at this extremity! As he arrogated to himself and to his measures the merit of our transient prosperity, so he will have to be answerable now for the consequences of our reverses. (Cheers.) What we have to hope from the celebrated sliding-scale is proved by the fact, that the comparatively low price of the badly-housed, damp wheat of this year's growth so depresses its averages, that the sliding-scale at this critical moment refuses to act, the high import duty of 15s. and 16s. per quarter prohibiting foreign importation, at a time when good sound wheat is selling in this country at 74s. per quarter! Thus, the first time the sliding-scale is brought to the test it is found wanting; proving the folly—nay, the wickedness—of interfering with the benevolent laws of Him who, if he permits a partial failure of the crops in one locality, amply provides a corresponding surplus in another part of the globe, as an inducement for his children to cultivate feelings of kindness and love, to assist each other in their mutual necessities. (Cheers.) What a different aspect this country would now present if the advice of the League had been followed four or five years since! Our ports might by this time be the granaries of Europe, and after satisfying our own wants we might have assisted our suffering neighbours, instead of depriving them (as we shall have to do) of a portion of their own scanty supplies. But this is not a time for idle lamentation. (Hear and cheers.) We must continue our active exertion to shake off this degrading, humiliating bondage, the last remnant of serfdom. (Cheers.) We have no new measures to propose; we have only to persevere in what is so gloriously begun—qualify! qualify! qualify! (Cheers.) Sir Robert Peel is extremely sensitive to the influence of votes: he must be put in motion by a power from without. Like a mighty steam engine—without self-acting principle, without heart, without soul—if you fill him to the brim with Free Trade steam, he will swiftly glide along the Free Trade line, carrying with him the Buckinghams, Richmonds, Wellingtons, or upset them if they obstruct the way. (Cheers.) Let us, therefore, form a Free Trade line, the terminus of which shall be the uttermost end of the earth. (Laughter and cheers.) The price of shares to be from 30l. to 10l., and each shareholder to be entitled to a vote for the West Riding of Yorkshire. As soon as we have obtained our bill, we will establish extension lines to every branch of the human family, carrying to them peace and good will, knowledge and civilisation, and every blessing that freedom and industry can bestow. (Long continued cheering.)

The Chairman then called upon Mr. Cobden, who was received with long prolonged and rapturous applause, as was Mr. Bright, who followed him.

The tenor of these addresses was to urge in the most effective way the importance of continuing the efforts of last year in the West Riding of Yorkshire to secure an overwhelming majority of Free Traders on the register.

At the conclusion of Mr. Bright's speech, a resolution was adopted, on the motion of Mr. Willans, seconded by Mr. Batley, pledging the meeting to spare no effort to place such a number of new voters on the register for the West Riding as would be decisive of the issue of the next election.

After a vote of thanks to Messrs. Cobden and Bright, the meeting separated.

BLACKBURN.

BLACKBURN.—On Wednesday evening Mr. Cobden and Mr. Bright were present at a most numerous meeting in this town, held in the large school-room under the Independent Chapel. The meeting was held with a view to promote the Free-trade registration and qualification movement in North Lancashire. William Eccles, Esq., was unanimously called upon to preside, and the meeting was addressed by Mr. H. Ashworth, of Bolton, Mr. Cobden, Mr. Bright, and Mr. W. Hargreaves. The meeting was most enthusiastic and unanimous, employers and employed showing an intense interest in the question, heightened, doubtless, in some degree by the present very unfavourable aspect of trade. The Blackburn district has greatly improved its condition during the past year, but we believe by the exertions now about to be made much more may be done. One very gratifying fact was stated at the meeting—that, of the qualifications purchased last year, a large number were bought by working men, and from the spirit existing in the town we have hopes that a very numerous body of this class will become freeholders and county voters. It is rumoured that Mr. Wm. Hargreaves is likely to be brought forward as a candidate at the next election for the borough: his connexion with an influential and respected family in the neighbourhood, his known ability, and his firm adherence to the principles of Free Trade, shown by his activity in the cause, and his liberal subscriptions to the League fund, all point him out as a very desirable representative for an enlightened constituency.

BURNLEY.

BURNLEY.—On Monday last Mr. Cobden and Mr. Bright visited this town, in pursuance of the resolution of the Council of the League to secure the representation of this division of the county to the Free Traders. A public meeting had been called for seven o'clock, and by that hour the Court House was crammed with the most numerous and influential assembly ever held in Burnley, not less than 1500 to 2000 persons being present, of whom a large majority consisted of working men, for whose convenience nearly every mill in the town had ceased working an hour earlier on that evening. William Hopwood, Esq., was called to the chair, and opened the meeting with a few impressive observations on the importance of the question about to be discussed. Mr. Cobden first, and afterwards Mr. Bright, addressed the meeting on the general question of the Corn Law; on the peculiar features of the present crisis; and on the necessity of taking the representation of the division out of the hands of the landed monopolists, and transferring it to the middle and industrious classes. Their speeches were received with great enthusiasm, and a determination was manifested from which much may be expected. Votes of thanks were passed to the speakers and to the chairman, and the meeting separated. It is a matter worthy of remark, that every manufacturer and spinner in Burnley is a Free-Trade and a subscriber to the League, and on this occasion almost every establishment was represented by its proprietors being on the platform or in the meeting. The Burnley polling district contains one-sixth of the North Lancashire constituency, and within its limits the Free Traders have a certain majority of more than two to one. With such a preponderance of opinion in favour of Free Trade as this indicates, we feel confident that much may be done, and will be done, by the Burnley district to rescue the division from the discredit of being represented in Parliament by two monopolists. North and South Lancashire must work together, and Free Trade must be their watchword.

MIDDLESEX.

MIDDLESEX AND THE SURROUNDING COUNTIES.—A series of meetings will be held during the next few weeks in all the principal polling districts of Middlesex, East Surrey, Herts, Essex, South Hants, West Kent, and East Sussex, for the purpose of urging upon the unregistered friends of Free Trade the importance of qualifying, by the purchase of 40s. freeholds—first for the county, or such division of these counties, in which they reside—and then for as many of the neighbouring counties as possible. The first of these meetings was held on Thursday night at Highgate, in the Assembly Rooms of the Gate-house Tavern, and was most numerous and respectfully attended. Mr. R. R. Moore addressed the meeting at very considerable length, and the speech was received with great acclamation throughout. The chair was taken by W. H. Ashurst, Esq. The second meeting took place at Hampstead on Friday evening. The meetings for each week will be regularly announced in the LEAGUE of the preceding Saturday, and we subjoin particulars of the arrangements already made for next week:—

Monday, Nov. 24th.—Enfield; Kings Head.

Tuesday, Nov. 25th.—Bridge House Hotel, Southwark.

Wednesday, Nov. 26th.—Rosemary Branch, Camberwell.

Thursday, Nov. 27th.—Horns Tavern, Kennington.

These meetings will be addressed by R. R. Moore, Esq.

REGISTRATION APPEALS.

COURT OF COMMON PLEAS.

THURSDAY, NOV. 13.—The Court sat at 10 o'clock, and heard the arguments in the two first cases, but took time to consider its judgment.

EASTERN DIVISION OF THE COUNTY OF GLOUCESTER.

PRUEN, APPELLANT: COX, RESPONDENT.—This was an appeal from the decision of the revising barrister upon the following case:

John Surman Cox objected to the name of Rayner Winterbottom being retained upon the list of voters for the parish of Cheltenham.

The notice of objection was duly given, and was in the proper form, but the objector described his place of abode as "No. 308, High street, Cheltenham," and "on the register of voters for the parish of Cirencester." The name of the objector was on the list of voters for the parish of Cirencester, but the place of abode as described in that list was "Cheltenham" only.

Cheltenham is a parish within the said division of Gloucester; the No. 308, High-street, Cheltenham, is within the said parish of Cheltenham, and is the true place of abode of the objector. It was contended that the objector ought to have omitted "No. 308, High-street," the description of his place of abode, and described it generally "Cheltenham" only, as it appeared on the register of voters.

The revising barrister thought the description sufficient, and the voter being unable to prove the qualification, expunged the name.

If the Court should have been of opinion that the revising barrister was wrong, the name was to have been restored, together with the names of sixty other persons, otherwise it was to remain expunged.

Mr. Cockburn, Q.C., having finished his argument for the appellant, the Court, without calling on the learned counsel for the respondent, dismissed the appeal with costs.—Decision affirmed.

WEST RIDING OF YORKSHIRE.

ALEXANDER, APPELLANT: NEWMAN, RESPONDENT.—

The Court heard the arguments in this case, and took time to consider its judgment; when that is given, we shall give a report of the case.

CITY OF LITCHFIELD.

MONDAY, NOV. 17th.—BARTON, APPELLANT; ASHLEY, RESPONDENT.—Case.—At the Court of Revision, William Barton objected to the name of Thomas Ashley being retained on the list of persons entitled to vote as occupiers in respect of property within the parish of Saint Michael; and the notice of objection served on the overseers of that parish by the objector was in the following form:—"I hereby give you notice that I object to the name of Thomas Ashley being retained in the list of persons entitled to vote in the election of members for the city of Litchfield. Dated, &c." In the city of Litchfield it is the duty of the overseers of the several parishes to make out and publish two separate lists of persons entitled to vote in the election of members, one of persons entitled to vote in respect of the occupation of property; and the other, of persons, not being freemen, entitled to vote in respect of the rights reserved by the 33rd section of the 2nd Wm. IV. cap. 45. The name of Thomas Ashley only appeared in the first-mentioned list. It was objected on the part of Ashley that the notice of objection served on the overseers was insufficient, as it did not comply with the directions given in the note to schedule B., No. 10 of the Registration Act, 6 Vic. cap. 18. There being two lists of voters made out by the overseers of the parish of St. Michael, and the notice not specifying the particular list to which the objection referred, the revising barrister held the notice insufficient. The question, therefore, for the opinion of the court was, whether such notice was sufficient or not?

Judgment.—Tindal, C. J.: I think, upon reference to the note at the foot of the schedule, which is, "If more than one list of voters, the notice of objection should specify the list to which the objection refers," it is so clear and distinct, that I think there can be no doubt on the question, and affirm the decision of the revising barrister.

Maule, J.: I agree with the revising barrister that this notice was not to the form or to the effect. It is not necessary that a rigid compliance with the form given in the Act should be had, so long as the effect is adhered to. If the form had been complied with in the present case, the overseers would have been spared some trouble. The effect of the form is not accomplished if, upon looking at the notice of objection, the overseers could not immediately discover to which of the two lists the objection applied. It is true that the overseer, with some additional labour, might come to the same result, by an imperfect notice given them, as they would have come to if the effect of the notice was according to the form in the schedule A. In the same manner a particular part of a book might be pointed out to a person, without giving him the number of the page; and by reading through it, he might be able to obtain the particular information which he might have acquired at a glance, if the particular page had been given.

Erie, J.: It appears to me also that the revising barrister was right. The statute 6 Vic. cap. 18, gives a particular form, and that form has not been followed. It has been said that no inconvenience would follow from a relaxation of the general rule in the present case; but assuming no inconvenience to have been occasioned, much mischief might be prevented by a strict adherence to the form or its effect.

Mr. Sergeant Byles applied for costs, which were given.—Decision affirmed.

COUNTY OF MIDDLESEX.

WOOD, APPELLANT; OVERSEERS OF WILLESSEN, RESPONDENTS.—Case.—At a court duly holden by the barrister appointed to revise the lists of voters for the county of Middlesex, the name, place of abode, and qualification of Henry Hall, as a voter in respect of property situate within the parish of Willesden, were described in the register for the said county in the following words: "Hall, Henry, the Grove, Neasdon, in this parish, house and land, as occupier, Neasdon." This name was objected to by the appellant; and it was proved that the voter's place of abode was at the Grove, Neasdon, in the parish of Willesden, and that he occupied a house and land at Neasdon, for which he was bond fide liable to upwards of 50l. yearly rent; but it was contended by the appellant, first, that the voter's place of abode was not sufficiently described for the purpose of being identified, for that the words in the second column, namely, "The Grove, Neasdon, in this parish," did not specify any particular parish. The revising barrister was of opinion that the words, "in this parish," must mean in the parish of Willesden, and he overruled the objection.

In the register aforesaid, the list of voters in respect of property situate within the parish of Willesden is immediately preceded by a heading in the words "Parish of Willesden," and the same words, "Parish of Willesden," stand as a heading to every subsequent page in which voters in respect of property within that parish are described.

It was also contended by the appellant that the property in question was not sufficiently described for the purpose of being identified; and that the name either of the property or of the occupying tenant ought to have been given in the fourth column.

It was shown that Neasdon was not a street, lane, or like place; and that the property was not situate in any street, lane, or like place, but was known by the name of "The Grove, Neasdon."

The revising barrister was of opinion that the words "House and land, as occupier," in the third column, together with the word "Neasdon," in the fourth column, amounted to a sufficient description of the property; and

The revising barrister overruled the objection, and retained the name, with 20s. costs.

If the Court of Common Pleas should have been of opinion, either that the words "in this parish," in the second column of the register, do not necessarily mean "in the parish of Willesden," or that the property as above described was not sufficiently described for the purpose of being identified, then the name of the voter was to have been expunged; but if the Court of Common Pleas should agree with the revising barrister on both those points, then the name was to be retained.

Judgment.—Tindal, C. J.: It appears to me not to be a question of misdirection, but a question of fact: fact, for the determination of the revising barrister, whether upon the description on the face of this register there was sufficient to identify the property as that in respect to which the real qualification arose. This is not an objection, in the first place, to the claim put in by the party who claimed to be entitled to vote, neither is it an objection to the list made out by the overseers. In either of which cases there is a precise form both of the claim and the objection pointed out in the Registration Act Schedule A, Nos. 2 and 3, and in the fourth column, on which that objection would have arisen; and if we had been now to determine the sufficiency of the claim on the objection which was argued before us, because on that would have arisen the objection whether in the fourth and last column the word "Neasdon" alone was a sufficient claim by the heading of the column. What was the objection that arose before the revising barrister upon the register? When the revising barrister gives his judgment, he has to collect from the point brought before him so much of the old register as the clerk of the peace has made out and furnished to the overseers of the different parishes, in addition to which he has also the new claims in respect of new qualifications made out by the parties themselves and published by the overseers. Those are the two ingredients of judgment which are placed before him, and on which he has to decide. Now the objection that has been pointed out here was that which arises on the new claims so put in the new register, made out by the overseers; but in order to see what the barrister is to do in his court, we must look at the 40th section of the Registration Act and see whether the objection now made can be applied to the course which he took. Now in the clause which is at the beginning of the section, it points out that he may correct any mistake which shall have been proved to him to have been made in any list—that would have been, any light mistake—that at once suggests itself to his mind as a matter of mistake. Then it goes on to say he shall expunge the name of any person whose qualification as stated in the list shall be insufficient in law to entitle him to vote. That is the main and important objection in the inquiry before me; then it appears also that he shall expunge the name of every person who shall be proved to him to be dead. That would follow as a reasonable consequence that they should be removed from the list of those who ought to appear at the next election to vote; and it goes on, "And wherever the Christian name, or the place of abode, or the nature of the qualification, or the local or other description of the property of any person who shall be included in any such list, and the name of the occupying tenant thereof, shall be wholly omitted in any case where the same is by this Act directed to be specified therein, or if any person whose name is included in any such list, or his place of abode, or the nature or description of his qualification shall in the judgment of the revising barrister be insufficiently described for the purpose of being identified, such barrister shall expunge the name of every such person from such list." Leaving, therefore, as a question for the judgment of the barrister on this clause, whether these particulars of description are such as will not be sufficient to identify the property, but even then, he is not absolutely bound to expunge it, for it goes on to say, "unless the matter or matters so omitted or insufficiently described be supplied to the satisfaction of such barrister, before he shall have completed the revision of such list, in which case he shall then and there insert the same in such list." And after going on to state that no change is to be made of the qualification stated in the list, proceeds to say, that if an objector shall appear, the barrister shall require it to be proved that the person so objected to was entitled on the last day of July then next preceding to have his name inserted in the list of voters in respect of the qualification described in such list, and in case the same shall not be proved then to expunge it. That leaves it as a question of yea or no before him whether such description in the list so furnished is sufficient to identify the premises, whether they were described so as to have been made out to the satisfaction of the revising barrister, that is, whether from the fact of the enjoyment of the property, it was made out to his satisfaction? Now, on the present occasion, the objection taken is, that it was not sufficient to identify the property. It was considered by the revising barrister that the property in question was sufficiently described for the purpose of being identified. And he goes on to say, it was in my judgment sufficiently described for that purpose. I think that is a point made out before us, that he having so found it, and he not seeing any reason to say on the evidence before him, it was not sufficiently described, I think that the finding of the revising barrister must be affirmed.

Coltman, J.: It appears to me also that the decision of the revising barrister ought to be affirmed. I conceive what we are to look at and what we are to determine in this case is the law, as it affects the point reserved. Now the question before the barrister appears to have arisen in the 40th section in question—namely, whether, under the circumstances in question, he was justified in being of opinion that the property in question was sufficiently described for the purpose of being identified? I believe that is the only point that is placed before us to day. I do not speak of that as the only point, but the only substantial point in the case. The second point in the case is that which appears to have arisen distinctly on the question, whether he was justified in being of opinion that the property was sufficiently described for the purpose of being identified? Now the clause of the Act of Parliament is, that the barrister shall expunge the name in any case of any person whose name is included in any such list, or his place of abode, or the nature or description of his qualification, if it shall in the judgment of the revising barrister be insufficiently described for the purpose of being identified. Therefore the act itself infers that the barrister is to ascertain whether the matter is sufficiently described in his judgment. He has formed his judgment on it, and it appears to me the matter is conclusive; we are not to go further to determine whether it was sufficient to find that which is expressly given him to determine. He has determined it, and I do not think we are authorised to look further, or to see whether there might possibly be found some matter which would warrant us in interfering. I do not see on the face of this anything that leads us necessarily to say that he did not or could not in his judgment come with propriety to the conclusion that the property was sufficiently described for the purpose of identification.

Maule, J.: I think also this is not a question of misdescription. The 42d section of the Act enables the party not satisfied with the decision of the revising barrister to appeal to this court: the question the revising barrister has decided is, that in his judgment the description was sufficient for the purpose of the property being identified. I do not think we can be justified in deciding a question of fact. The only way to put it as a question of law would be this, that it is impossible the property can be sufficiently described as being identified when it is described as "a house and land in Neasdon, in the parish of Willesden." Now, as to whether it was Neasdon, unless there is some evidence of the fact that it was Neasdon, it is impossible to say whether the identification is sufficient or not. Suppose a person stated the qualification was a house in Oxford-street, and it appears in evidence that Oxford-street is two miles long, and that there are some five or six hundred houses in it, or suppose the revising barrister stated the qualification was a house in Oxford court, and it turned out that Oxford court had only one house in it—I think that would be sufficient; in the other case it would not. But these are matters of fact in which it is fit there should be a decision. I do not think the Act contemplated any such thing as that this court should reserve decisions of fact. The Court of Westminster never give decisions to reverse or affirm any question of fact; they are properly matters for a jury to decide. In case of a new trial, the court may choose to send the case down to a jury to have the question of fact tried. No such favour is given in this case; and no doubt the legislature meant that the revising barrister should be a Judge without appeal as to what was in his judgment a sufficient description for the purpose of identification; consequently in this case the decision must be affirmed.

Erle, J.: It appears to me, also, the decision must be affirmed. I have observed the question arises as to the name of a voter as it appears in the old register; there is a requirement in the statute that the name shall be specified in the notice of claim; and there is, also, a requirement that the name of the property shall be specified in the list of claimants; but throughout the Act there is no specific requirement that the name of the property should appear in the old register. The register every year has been made out, and on the ground of the omission of the name of the property it cannot be said that any specific requirement of the Act has been contravened. I say that, because the question arises in the earlier part of the 42d section, which contemplated two classes of cases—first of all, as to matters of form, the revising barrister is to look down the lists, and either from his own head, or the suggestions of the overseers, to correct it. Upon the contest of any objection, he is to hold an inquiry into the matter of form; and when the list has been disposed of by striking out the names of parties not entitled, to give effect to one part of his office, which is to correct the list, then the barrister is to go into the question that exists as to the party entitled to the qualification. The question has arisen as to the earlier jurisdiction; and the statute as to that says, if the Christian name, or the place of abode, or the nature of the qualification, or the local or other description of the property of any person who shall be included in any such list, and the name of the occupying tenant thereof shall be wholly omitted in any case where the same is by this Act directed to be specified therein, that is one case which he is required to inquire into. In the notice of the claim, the Act requires the name of the property. There is another and a wider jurisdiction given to him, under which the present appellant contends he ought to come. "If any person whose name is included in any such list, or his place of abode, or the nature or description of his qualification, shall, in the judgment of the revising barrister, be insufficiently described for the purpose of being identified, such barrister shall expunge the name of every such person from such list, unless the matter or matters so omitted or insufficiently described be supplied to the satisfaction of such barrister." Now, under that hand of jurisdiction, the appellant says, "Henry Hall's property at Neasdon is not sufficiently described to be identified." In his judgment the revising barrister says it is sufficiently identified and described. He says, "It is so in my judgment." And on this statement of facts the question is submitted for our decision. It seems to me it is sufficient if it is identified in the judgment of the revising barrister. It is impossible after he has found the very issue in question in the affirmative, for this Court to find a negative; and under the circumstances of the case, I think that is a reasonable decision which he has come to, and it ought to be affirmed.

Mr. Arnold applied to the Court for costs.

Tindal, C. J.: There has been some difficulty in the case. We will not give costs.

WALKER, APPELLANT; PAYNE, RESPONDENT.—Case.—At a court duly holden by the barrister appointed to revise the list of voters for the county of Middlesex, the name, place of abode, and qualification of Wm. Gibbs, as a voter in respect of property situate within the hamlet of Mile End Old Town, were described in the register for the said county in the following words, that is to say: "Gibbs, William, travelling abroad, freehold house, 82, Heath-street."

This name was objected to by the appellant; and it was proved that the voter was and for several years had been travelling abroad, and had no fixed place of abode; but it was contended by the appellant that as no place of abode was given, the name ought to be expunged. The revising barrister was of opinion, that as the voter had no fixed place of abode, but was travelling abroad, he (the revising barrister) was not at liberty to expunge the voter's name, and he therefore retained it.

If the Court of Common Pleas should have been of opinion that a better description of the voter's place of abode, under the circumstances above stated, ought to have been required, the name was to be expunged, else to have been retained.

The Court, without calling upon the respondent, gave judgment as follows:

Judgment.—Tindal, C. J.: It appears to me by place of abode to mean, that if a party has a place of abode, that place of abode should be given. It never could have been intended that persons executing a public duty, which led them abroad, should from that very circumstance lose their votes.

Coltman, J.: It seems to me it cannot be said from the place of abode being omitted that the name is to be expunged, if he has no place of abode. There is nothing omitted which could be inserted; and I cannot think any objector can be put to any difficulty because, though he cannot serve him with a notice there, he might be permitted to make any objection, before he is called upon to prove his notice; and after the preliminary matters are examined by the barrister, any one may suggest the irregularity; before the qualification is gone into, he is obliged to prove his notice, though not for the purpose of taking the objection in the first instance.

Maule, J.: I think the place of abode can only be stated where the party has a place of abode. The Act does not appear to disfranchise a person for not having a Christian name, or for not being a Christian.

Erle, J.: It appears to me that it is sufficient, and that the Act of Parliament seems to require certain particulars to identify the party claiming to vote; if he has a place of abode it must be specified: if he is a person without identification or profession, that appears to be a description, and as near a compliance with the statute as can be produced.

Mr. Phipson applied for costs, which were refused. Mr. Phipson said that he understood that where the respondent was not heard it had been laid down as a general rule to give costs.

Tindal, C. J.: We have heard you a little, and therefore cannot give costs. (Laughter.)

CITY OF LITCHFIELD.

THURSDAY, NOV. 20.—HITCHINS, APPELLANT; BROWN, RESPONDENT.—At the court held for the revision of the list of persons entitled to vote in the election of members for the city of Litchfield, William Upton appeared to have given due notice of his claim to have his name inserted in the list of persons entitled to vote in respect of property occupied within the parish of St. Peter at Arches, and described the situation of the property in the following terms—in the fourth column—"No. 5½, Muck Lane, St. Peter at Arches, Lincoln; and previously in the occupation of a house, No. 21, St. Mary's Street, in the parish of St. Mary le Wigford, Lincoln." He proved that he had occupied the two houses described in the fourth column of his claim, in immediate succession. The insertion of his name was duly objected to by the appellant on the ground that the nature of the claimant's qualification was insufficiently described for the purpose of being identified. On the part of the claimant it was contended, first, that the description was sufficient; and second, that if not, the barrister had power to correct the same. The revising barrister decided that it was sufficiently described, but by desire of the claimant altered the statement as follows: In the third column, "House occupied in immediate succession;" in the fourth column, "21, St. Mary Street, St. Mary le Wigford; and No. 5½, Muck Lane, St. Peter at Arches," and inserted his name with such alterations.

Judgment.—Tindal, C. J.: It appears to me that the decision was proper according to the statute, and that it complies with all the requisites of the Act. The decision depends on the construction of the 15th sect. of the 6th Victoria, cap. 18, and also upon the form which it set out in Schedule B, No. 6. Now, then, by the 15th sect. it is enacted, "that every person whose name shall have been omitted in any such list of voters for any city or borough, so to be made out as aforesaid, and who shall claim as having been entitled to have his name inserted therein; and every person desirous of being registered for a different qualification than that for which his name appears in the said list, shall on or from the 25th day of August in that year, give or cause to be given a notice of claim." And then it enacts, the claim shall be made out in the form, or to the effect that is given in No. 6. Now, then, on looking at that form, it appears to me to be quite clear that the third column, on which the argument has turned, is intended to point to a general nature of qualification; and that the 4th column that follows immediately, and is in a manner subjoined to it, is only a more particular exposition of the third column. That such is the case, appears, I think, from the heading in No. 6; for after the third column, stating the nature of the qualification, the heading of the fourth column is "street, lane, or other like place, in the parish where the property is situate, and No. of the house, if any;" to which these words are added in italics, "when the right depends upon property;" and evidently meaning, therefore, that the preceding column has called the attention of those who are to be objectors, or those who are to act upon it to this last column, in which the party claims to vote in respect of property. That is clear, for at the end of it you find the words "when the right depends upon property" in italics; evidently meaning that it is the same kind of rubric, or direction, and pointing out, as it seems to me, that which was necessary to the whole affirmation of this 4th column is where the general nature of the qualification is one depending on property, that is, upon the occupation of the "householder" or "profession;" it is in contradistinction to the other lists of voters, that the overseers are required to make out for any of the bygone rates still existing, and which of the parties enjoying them are still in full life. That being the case, I consider the third column to be satisfied by stating that this is a house qualification and the 4th column is quite correct by stating that this is a house qualification, and is not in respect of one single house, but of two houses that have been occupied in succession.—And one cannot suppose that the 3rd column was intended to be as precise as the 4th, for if that were so, where was the necessity of a 4th column, at all? It seems to me that the argument that has proceeded on the decision of this court, in the case of Bartlett and Gibbs, has not applied itself to the real ground on which that judgment rested, which was all the way through both put in argument at the bar and in the judgment of the court on the 4th column and not on the third; and in the 4th column, inasmuch as it described the house in East-street, whereas the right of the voter depended on the house in West-street, for six months preceding the house in East-street, so that the 4th column did not describe the real house of the voter, and therefore the revising barrister had no right to give him the power of voting, in respect of a qualification that could not be a qualification. That case was rightly decided, and we decide this case also rightly, by holding, that the description in the 3rd column is a sufficient compliance with the Act of Parliament. One must suppose, and one is bound in ordinary charity to suppose, the objector to be a man of ordinary intellect capable of walking about without assistance, and capable of reading, and if he look to the third and fourth columns, it is utterly impossible for him to misunderstand them.

The other judges concurred. Decision affirmed, with costs.

NORTH NOTTINGHAMSHIRE.

ASHMORE, APPELLANT; LEES, RESPONDENT.—James Ashmore was an inmate of Shrewsbury Hospital, and claimed to be a voter for North Nottinghamshire, as being entitled, as such inmate, to an equitable life estate or interest in lands and corn rents in lieu of tithes arising from lands in the parish of Harworth and the adjoining town, Syston. There are now 20 male inmates of the hospital; they occupy and enjoy certain rooms in Sheffield, in the county of York; but they are not in the occupation of any property in Notts. The governor receives the rents of the property belonging to the hospital; and pays out of those rents the sum of 2s. 6d. per week to each of the inmates (which sum has since been considerably increased); and also to give to every man a purple gown in every seven years for festival days, and a blue one every two years. The revenue of the hospital arises entirely from real property, which is partly in Yorkshire, and partly in Nottinghamshire; the Yorkshire property forms nearly two-thirds of the whole in value, and the remaining property is in Harworth and Styrup. The allowance of the pensioners is paid without any distinction as to the Yorkshire or Nottinghamshire property. The appellant was an inmate of the hospital, and as such inmate received a stipend of 10s. per week, and also the allowance of coals and clothing. If this weekly sum and the average annual value of his allowance for coals and clothing are added together, and are considered as arising from the whole of the real estates of the hospital, and apportioned between the two counties, according to the relative value of the estates in each, the amount of the proportion so considered as arising from Nottinghamshire would be of sufficient value to entitle him to vote, provided his interest were in other respects sufficient; but if the value of the coals and clothing was not to be taken into account, then the proportion of the money stipend alone would be insufficient. If the land and corn rents in Notts are not added together in estimating the total value of the Nottingham property, the value in no case is sufficient.

On the part of the objector it was contended, first, that James Ashmore had not a life interest in the emoluments he enjoyed by virtue of his appointment as an in-pensioner of the hospital; second, that if he had a life interest in such emoluments, it was not proved that he had any legal or equitable estate in lands or tenements in the county of Nottingham, as the whole real estates were in two different counties, and James Ashmore was not entitled to require payment of his stipend out of the Nottingham property in particular; third, that even if he had an equitable estate in the Nottingham property, yet as that property consisted partly of lands and partly of corn rents arising from lands not belonging to the hospital, these two different descriptions of property could not be joined to make up the requisite value for the franchise, each of them being singly insufficient for the purpose; fourth, that the mere right to receive, as an inmate of the hospital, the weekly stipend and allowance of coals and clothing, did not constitute a sufficient equitable estate or interest in the real property out of the rents and profits of which such allowances were made to entitle James Ashmore to be placed on the register; and that at all events the value of the allowances for coals and clothing could not be taken into account to make up the requisite value. The revising barrister decided in favour of the objector on the second and fourth grounds, and expunged the name.

This was a consolidated appeal, and 16 other names abided the decision of the Court in the above case.

Judgment.—Tindal, C. J.: It appears to me that the question is reduced to the single inquiry, whether the amount is sufficient on which the present claim to the right to vote is founded? But that will depend upon this: whether the claimants are entitled legally or equitably to a greater sum than the payment of 3s. 6d. per week; because it is contended, on the finding of the barrister, that if he is not entitled to more than 3s. 6d. per week, even if we took into account the amount of allowances for clothing, and also the coals in the proportion left for Nottinghamshire, it is not sufficient to put the claimants on the Nottinghamshire list. Now, on looking at the Act of Parliament under which the hospital has been founded, it appears perfectly clear there is no legal or equitable right to more than 3s. 6d. per week. It was originally a payment of 2s. 6d. per week, and it was afterwards increased to 3s. 6d. per week, and has been increased by dividing the surplus till it amounts to 10s. per week. The clause that directs the discretion of the trustees, is that which appears in the 25th page of the Act of George the Third, set out in the special case, in which it is enacted, "That out of the surplus of the yearly and other rents, issues, interests, monies, proceeds, revenues, and profits of the said trusts for the time being, shall by and under the directions of the said Edward Duke of Norfolk, during his life, and after his decease, and such person and persons as hereinafter is and are mentioned, weekly make answer and pay to and for the present members of the hospital and their successors, other than the governor of the said hospital, for the time being, such allowances, appointments, payments, and stipends, as that the said trustees for the time being under the same directions shall from the circumstances of the case or the exigencies of the time, having due regard to what the yearly income and revenues of the said hospital will provide from time to time, find requisite, with full power and authority to them the said trustees for the time being, and under the same directions, to lessen, increase, vary, change, and alter, such weekly allowances, payments, and stipends, as they shall also find requisite, so as the same allowances, payments, and stipends shall not at any time be reduced be low or under 3s. 6d. per week money to each of the said members (other than the said governor) respectively." When you couple that with the power formerly given by another section of the Act, (and, indeed, the direction from time to time to increase the number of pensioners is perfectly clear) that there can be nothing, and no fixed value which each separate pensioner is entitled to receive beyond that which is made a minimum in the Act—3s. 6d. a week—and, therefore, that is not sufficient to give a qualification. The other judges concurred. Decision affirmed, without costs.

THE CORN LAWS AND THE CULTIVATION OF LAND.—One of the reasons which used to be assigned for retaining the Corn Laws was, that they are necessary to enable farmers to cultivate their land properly, and that without them the land would be neglected. Yet for the last two or three years we have had landlords, stewards, agents, scientific professors, and even persons schooling and lecturing and exhorting the farmers because their land, is not, as it is alleged, half cultivated; that all they do is badly and slovenly done. So that, according to the showing of the monopolists themselves, the Corn Laws in respect to the cultivation of the land, have entirely failed. There is no doubt that the produce of the soil might be doubled at least; but in order to do this it is necessary that the farmers should occupy a more fixed position; that, by having a more secure tenure, they might expend their capital, skill, and labour with safety. Why do the landlords object to give them leases? We shall assign two reasons. 1st. Because their love of power over their tenants is too strong to yield to justice. 2nd. Because it would enable the farmer to exercise uncontrolled his elective franchise, and the monopolists would be unable to maintain their Parliamentary position.—Brighton Herald.

AGRICULTURE.

FARMERS ROBBING ONE ANOTHER.

Viewed in whatever aspect it may be, the system of "protection" is invariably found to be either a fraud or a delusion. This is especially the case with the agricultural view of the Corn Laws. Doubtless high prices are tempting, and those who, for a series of years, obtained high prices for their produce, through a combination of causes, are very apt to lend willing ears to promises of permanently high prices. This was the position of the farming body in 1815, when the Corn Law was enacted. But the great profits made in farming under the high prices which preceded 1815 were attributable to the fact that prices had for many years been constantly rising. The farmer obtained not only the price he had calculated upon, but something more; and though rents advanced with great rapidity, they scarcely overtook the rise of prices. This was a state of things impossible to last; for so much competition for farms had been induced, that rents were sure to rise beyond the rate prices would justify. Had the Corn Law, then, kept prices permanently high, the tenant farmer would have gained nothing, for competition would have compelled him to hand over to the landlord in the shape of rent all the gains derived from high prices. What has actually happened is, that rents have been fixed with reference to the high prices expected to be secured by means of the Corn Law, while the farmers have only received those high prices occasionally. This alone ought to make every tenant farmer an ardent Free Trader. But it seems that, after all, a somewhat higher average price of grain has been obtained in this country through the Corn Laws than would have been received under a Free Trade. We have often shown that the ill consequences of restriction, direct and indirect, to the farmer, which are necessarily incident to a restricted trade, far more than counterbalance the advantages of "protection" created high prices.

Now, one of the consequences of protection is to advance prices against as well as in favour of the farmer. Farmers are not simply producers. They are not merely gatherers of the spontaneous produce of the soil, as the protection theory implies; they must consume, and that largely, before they can produce; and it is only out of the surplus of their production beyond their consumption that they can derive a profit. This aspect of the protective system was first strongly insisted upon by Mr. Cobden, in his remarkable speech of last spring, when moving for a committee "to inquire into the effect of protective duties on the condition of tenant farmers and farm labourers." And though the House of Commons refused the inquiry, we are glad to find that the operation of protection upon farmers, as consumers, has been fully worked out by those eminent agriculturists, Mr. John Morton, and Mr. Joshua Trimmer. These gentlemen have communicated to the public the results of their inquiries in a tract, published by Ridgway of Piccadilly, entitled "An Attempt to Estimate the Effects of Protecting Duties on the Profits of Agriculture." This is a part of the question coming so home to the business of the farmer, that no man who thinks upon the Corn Law question—and there is no farmer who can avoid the consideration of it—should allow a week to elapse without perusing this pamphlet. Let the protectionist farmer above all others obtain it, consider its statements and calculations, apply them to his own business, and then, if he cannot displace their conclusions, let him tell his political leaders that their delusion of protection to British agriculture has lasted long enough. And it is to that test we would especially submit the calculations of the tract we refer to.

The writers avow that it was Mr. Cobden's assertion, that agricultural protection is a system of mutual plunder, which led them to work out the question in detail, and the result has proved surprising even to themselves. We shall give a summary of the results of their inquiries rather than by attempting to state them in detail, in a single article, run the risk of obscurity; but the book itself should be in the hands of every farmer.

They ascertain the amount of the actual extent to which prices in this country have been increased by protection, by the average duties paid on the importation of foreign wheat and other grain, for home consumption, between 1828 and 1841; and they test that by a reference to the price of wheat in the Channel Islands, where the trade in grain is quite free. In this way they fix the extra price of wheat, caused by the Corn Laws, at 5s. 6d. a quarter; of oats, at 6s. 6d.; of barley, at 4s. 8d.; of peas, at 5s. 10d.; and on beans, at 6s. 11d. This is pretty nearly what the protectionists themselves state, when they would, as now in the days of their feebleness, extenuate their monopoly.

They first investigate the case of a light land farm in East Norfolk, of 400 acres; and as a preliminary they show that the high price of the hay, oats, &c., consumed by the farmers' horses and animals employed in the cultivation of his farm, can be of no benefit to him. It is only on the saleable produce that he gains by an enhanced price. And the same observation applies to the food of his labourers; subject, however, in the case of the labourers to this exception, "when the competition for employment enables him to pay them money wages, insufficient to purchase their fair share of the produce." And this may be said to be the constant state of the nine-tenths of the agricultural labourers of England. And the amount of which the labourers are thus robbed by protection, goes not into the farmer's pocket to remain; he is a cat's-paw only for the landlord.

In making their calculations, however, Messrs. Morton and Trimmer assume as true the monopoly fallacy, "that whatever the labourer pays in the shape of protecting duty on his food, he receives back again in the shape of higher wages; but they say truly that the fact is quite the reverse.

In East Norfolk the farmers sell no protected articles, produced by themselves, except barley and wheat. They buy bullocks; in most cases they buy sheep. They invariably purchase oats and beans for their horses, and much artificial food for feeding stock, as well as artificial manures. Upon this outlay the whole system of Norfolk agriculture is dependent. Without it they would neither pay their present rents nor make the struggles they have made against the difficulties and uncertainties of "protected" agriculture. Their seed corn is likewise enhanced in the same proportion as the corn they sell. Here we find some tolerably large items upon which the farmer, as a consumer, pays for "protection." If the East Norfolk farmer contrives to pillage the public of some shillings on every quarter of grain he sells, it is clear that he is himself plundered by somebody else on the above-named articles of his own consumption. The Fens of Lincolnshire, Scotland, and Ireland, pluck him in the price of his oats. He pays tribute to Cheshire, Derbyshire, Gloucestershire, Wilts, and Somersetshire, on his cheese. Kent and Essex supply him with "protected" clover seed at an artificial price. Kent and Surrey tax his hops. His lean stock cost so much that he has no profit from fattening them on "protected" grain. They are mere manure making machines, sometimes very expensive machines. The occupier of 400 acres of land in East Norfolk, will consume yearly 40 tons of oil-cake. Upon this alone the use of cheaper foreign grain would effect a yearly saving of 80*l*. The use of the linseed compound, introduced by Mr. Warnes, with peas and meal, has shown the Norfolk farmers what benefits they might derive from the free importation of oats, peas, beans, and maize.

The writers say—

"A large tenant farmer near Norwich informed us, that in 1843 the produce of 20 acres of peas, with the linseed from 8 acres of flax, fattened as much stock as he could have kept with purchased oil-cake to the value of 300*l*., and he also informed us that during the winter of that year the use of this kind of food reduced the price of cake by 2*l*. a ton. Other parties have assured us that this was a low estimate of the reduction of price thus occasioned. The general failure of the hay and turnip crops in 1844 caused oil-cake to advance again in price, notwithstanding the extended use of the compound of Mr. Warnes. We are therefore forming a very low estimate of the effect of an unrestricted importation of beans, maize, and oats, in reducing the price of oil-cake, by fixing the reduction at 2*l*. per ton."

And another way of making the calculation leads to the same result: "Seven quarters of oats weigh a ton, the protective duty on which at 6s. 6d. per quarter amounts to 2*l*. 5s. 6d.," and thus the free importation of oats and other grain fit to be used as substitutes for oil-cake may be fairly calculated as equal to a reduction of 2*l*. per ton in the price of oil-cake. We know practically, however, that the saving would be much more considerable. And this estimate has regard only to the feeding cattle and sheep; but the gain from cheap beans, peas, and Indian corn for pig-feeding would be fully equal to that derived from cattle-food. We doubt whether so much manure could be made in so short a time and at so little cost as by feeding pigs, were it not for the great cost of their staple articles of food—beans and peas. There is assuredly no way of producing so large a quantity of meat in a short time as by pig-feeding; and what is of great social importance, it is the only kind of stock which is practically within the reach of the agricultural labourer.

To return from this digression. The present writers show that the demand for meat might be constantly augmenting were our labouring classes fully employed at good wages; for “two pounds of meat consumed weekly by each of the 200,000 mouths added annually to our population, would occasion an augmented demand, increasing annually at the rate of 74,000 oxen of six cwt. each; while increased wages, affording to five millions of our under-fed population the means of purchasing one pound of meat weekly, would cause a further annual demand of 386,000 oxen of the same weight, or an equivalent of mutton or pork.” The stimulus given to employment by the repeal of the Corn Laws would be certain to cause an increased consumption of meat far beyond the above estimate. One of the first objects in which an agricultural labourer expends his increased wages is animal food. That is to him the greatest luxury. It would soon become a necessary; and we say this from actual experience, for upon our own farm—where for our own profit we employ useful men only, and give them good wages—we find that after supplying themselves with decent clothing, they invariably become regular consumers of meat, and that in considerable quantities. For instance, we have two young single men lodging on the premises, boarding themselves, and who consequently have no expenses for rent; these men, who had previously thought themselves well off if they got a sufficient meal of bread, regularly use seven or eight pounds of meat per week. The market for meat, were the trade in grain free so that the farmer could produce it with profit at moderate cost, may be said to be without limit. The following is a recapitulation of the items on which the farmer pays the protective duties, contrasted with the objects of sale on which he receives a “protective” price:

“Amount paid by the cultivator of 400 acres of light land in East Norfolk in the shape of protecting duties on agricultural produce consumed by himself, his labourers, and cattle; and first for seed, as we have allowed the protective duties on the gross produce of the farm without deducting the seed, we must here charge the same duties on the corn sown.

Barley 5 qrs. X 100 acres	= 500 ditto 4s 8d	116	13	4

“Deducting the amount paid for protection from the amount received by it on the produce sold, we find that the occupier of this farm gains 17s. 4s. 7d. by the protective system.”

Thus, after paying the direct burden caused by protection on the mere cost of cultivating 400 acres of Norfolk land, the protected farmer gains apparently, and only apparently, 17l. 4s. 7d. by monopoly!!

But that gain is not real, for there remain to be estimated the effects of protection on the rent and the expenses of the tenant's family. His rent is 500l., fixed at that sum on the assumption that wheat will always sell for 56s. a quarter; but, in fact, the average does not range above 50s. a quarter. His rent is, therefore, too high by 54l.

There goes at once all the monopoly-profit, and something more. And Messrs. Morton and Trimmer truly say, that when the protection delusion is at an end, the farmer would get either an actual reduction of rent, or he would obtain what would be quite equivalent, namely, “improved tenure, diminution of game, removal of useless fences, trees, &c., and power to convert poor pasture into arable.”

But, beyond the excessive rent occasioned by protection, a farmer occupying 400 acres of land could not save less than 40l. a-year upon his family consumption. Here, then, we find an addition of 94l. a year to the 209l. 8s. 9d., the increased cost of cultivation arising from protecting duties, which will amount together to 303l. 8s. 9d.; and, deducting from that sum 226l. 13s. 4d., the profits of protection, the tenant will be a loser of 76l. 15s. 5d. by protection. Farmers, make these calculations for yourselves, from the figures furnished by your own account-books and the facts of your own farms, and you will find that the practical farmers, from whom we have quoted, have far understated the farmers' case against the Corn Laws.

Great as it is, however, this is not the whole loss. “Besides the 40 tons of oil-cake, purchased to improve the manure of his farm, the tenant expends at least 200l. in the purchase of artificial manures, such as rape-cake, bones, and guano. If, by the removal of restrictions on the importation of corn, he were enabled to purchase oats, weighing 40lbs. a bushel, for 15s. the quarter, the 200l. now expended on artificial manures would buy 266 quarters of oats, which would enable the green crops to fatten 170 sheep and 17 beasts more than the farm carries at present. The manure produced by them would be more beneficial than the bones, rape-cake, or guano, which would be purchased for 200l.” Now, if these additional sheep and cattle only return their prime cost, and the cost of the corn they consume—and they ought to do more, and generally will—the whole expense now incurred in the purchase of artificial manure will be saved. This sum added to the previous sum of 76l. 15s. 5d., would give 276l. 15s. 5s. as the farmer's loss by protection: but as the farmer must employ an extra capital of say 400l., on which for interest and casualties he should be allowed 10 per cent. or 40l., the clear sum lost under the present system of artificial manure buying will be 160l., and the farmer's loss by protection, 236l. 15s. 5d.

But let us suppose a profit of only 3s. a head on the sheep, and 30s. a head on the beasts, to be made above their prime costs and the cost of their corn, a further sum of 51l. must be added, making the loss by the Corn Laws 287l. 15s. 5d.—equal to 14s. 4d. the acre on 400 acres!

This, then, is what every farmer who shouts and pays at “protection” meetings shouts and pays for. He neglects his business to assist in maintaining a law which mulets him of 14s. 4d. an acre. Of this his landlord may pocket some 5s. an acre; all the rest is a dead loss to everybody.

We have already exceeded our usual limits without having given more than one of the cases put by Messrs. Morton and Trimmer; but the subject is so important in itself—and is especially important now, when our rulers seem undecided whether to getrid of the delusion at once, or to keep it lingering over the fortunes of farmers for another year or two—that we shall next week recur to this tract, and notice some further illustrations it affords of the farmer's DIRECT LOSS THROUGH THE CORN LAWS

AGRICULTURAL CORRESPONDENCE.

We recommend to the perusal of our readers the following communication from Sir R. Musgrave, of Tourin Castle, Waterford:

MY DEAR SIR,—I have delayed writing to you in order that I might convey some information on the state of th potato crop. I am sorry to say the accounts I receive from different quarters are very alarming. Some friends of mine, who have travelled lately, state the crops in Antrim, Cavan, Louth, and Tipperary, to be very defective.

In the county of Waterford we are better off; although a portion of the crop has been lost in this county, still the greater part of it is as yet safe. But even here, it appears that the potatoes are of a worse quality than in other seasons they are more watery, and in numerous instances have shown the disease after being put into pits. It is highly probable that they will not keep in a sound state until the new crop comes in. The general food of the labouring class is a species of white potato, of an inferior description. Last May, on complaint being made by the paupers in the Lismore Union workhouse that the potatoes supplied to them were bad, I went into the Lismore market with the master of the workhouse: and though several cartloads were exposed for sale, I could not procure any of an eatable description. If such was the case last year, the present crop will not be available in May as food for human beings.

It seems to me quite certain that an awful state of distress will prevail among the labouring class next summer. Great exertions have been made by boards of guardians as well as by private individuals, in order to ascertain the best mode of preserving the present crop, and to prevent the dreadful evil of famine. Many representations have been made to Government on the subject, but I think they have not gone far enough. To me it appears not sufficient to call on Government to provide employment as a remedy. The greatest evil is not want of employment—the calamity we have to dread most of all is an absolute deficiency of the necessities of life; and it appears to me we ought to import food from every part of the world offering to supply it. In England, but more especially in Ireland, restrictions on the importation of foreign grain have forced great part of the population to depend on potatoes for subsistence. Corn Laws have been at all times injurious; but to attempt to maintain them now, when famine is to be apprehended, and when we find that instead of bread, the staff of life, rotten potatoes are substituted, is really monstrous, and almost incredible. A bounty on importation would be more consistent with common sense and humanity. In case of a famine, there would hardly be security for life or property; and no class perhaps would suffer more than landlords from laws excluding a supply of food.

The labouring classes of Ireland are extremely patient under severe suffering; and I have frequently known labouring men to subsist during a considerable part of summer on one daily meal of dry potatoes; but we have now to dread something infinitely worse. Men will submit patiently to what they consider the dispensations of Providence, but they cannot be expected to endure patiently the effects of mischievous legislation. The effect of Corn Laws at present is to abstract from Ireland large quantities of grain for the support of the people of England, and to exclude the Americans and others who are willing to supply it. Next spring, when it is found that in this way little corn is left for the use of the people of Ireland, whose labour has raised it, the worst effects of popular indignation may justly be dreaded. It is more than probable that Ireland will afford a fearful illustration of the sound arguments so ably brought forward in the LEAGUE.—I am, my dear Sir,

Yours most truly, R. MUSGRAVE.

A correspondent sends us the following letter, which he received from Messrs. Sturge of Gloucester, and to which he adds the judicious comments contained in his own letter:

“Gloucester, 11 mo, 12.

“Mr. —, Cheltenham,—In reply to thy favour we should have been glad to have complied with thy request, but regret to say we have no oats of any description by us at present for any of our customers.—We are very respectfully,

“J. and C. STURGE, per T. M. STURGE,

“To the Editor of THE LEAGUE.

“Cheltenham, Nov. 17, 1845.

“I send you a letter I have received from Messrs. Sturge, cornfactors, of Glo'ster; since which I have sent over my servant to Glo'ster, and the report is, ‘there are no oats in all Glo'ster. My own opinion is, that early next year the same reply will be made as to potatoes. It is really melancholy to see the state of the potato crop in this neighbourhood; one-half the crop is lost to the country. I usually ride out daily; and day after day I see potatoes piled up in the road near the potato field—wheeled out of the way—being too bad even for pigs. Potatoes advance but little in price, because the little farmers and market-gardeners hasten to sell what they can—as do what they will they rot on hand. From this I perceive clearly that after Christmas there will be potatoes only for the rich—the poor will not be able to purchase them. Are we then to have a subscription for the poor? Here lies the DIFFICULTY! To subscribe to relieve the poor, whilst the monopolists enjoy their protection, can be considered in no other light than a subscription to maintain the present (starving and famine-making) Corn Laws. In fact, it would be a subscription to assist the Richmonds, the Miles's, and such like, in their selfish pursuits of monopoly. At the last general election Mr. Wm. Miles declared on the hustings at Wells, ‘that the present Corn Laws,’ meaning the Corn Law of 1815, were the very best that could be devised ‘for landlord, for tenant, and for the labourer.’ Upon this very statement he was sent to Parliament to represent East Somerset. But what did he do? Why, listen: he voted for the present Corn Law. His brother, the Member for Bristol, did the very same thing. The latter, in bringing forward his famous Sugar Monopoly Bill, called upon members of both sides of the House to assist him, ‘for if you don't,’ says he, ‘you will ere long lose your protection on land.’ The Duke of Richmond, in his place in the House of Lords, after this election, declared, ‘We have turned out one Ministry because they proposed a fixed duty, and we will turn out another if they follow the same plan.’ I again ask, what is to be done? To resist contributing to the poor I am ashamed; but to give is clearly to give not to the poor, but to the monopolist. I will relate to you a fact which came to my knowledge about the year 1840 to 42. A merchant in Bristol speculated in corn; he was successful in his speculation, except on two or three cargoes, which arrived too late. On the arrival of these cargoes the price had fallen; but the duty had advanced. The wheat was consequently bonded; it remained in bond all the cheap years, and my friend did not know what to do with this wheat. He had kept it so long, the original price had nearly doubled itself in expenses of various kinds. He came to me one day and said, ‘What am I to do with my wheat? I have ceased to be at the expense of turning it, because when I go in a morning I find it has changed sides in the granary; the insects turn it regularly.’ I advised him to buy some pigs, and get rid of it in that way. His answer was, ‘I would do it if it were not for the duty; the duty being then about 8s. Here we parted. About 15 months after he said, ‘Do you want any money? I have unexpectedly got some to spare: more than usual.’ ‘How's that?’ ‘Why,’ he says, ‘to tell you the truth, I have sold all my wheat to a miller. I have at last cleared myself in first cost, interest, expenses, &c.' 'But what is the miller going to do with this wheat?' 'He has got some good old English wheat, and he grinds them down together.' Such is the effect of the sliding scale, and I know this made him a convert to a small fixed duty. Would the Duke of Richmond eat the bread made of this wheat? No; but his poor labourers would, though they might perish in fever after. Suppose we go to a subscription, will the Dukes of Wellington and Richmond head the list with 10,000*l.* each, and the Miles's with their 5000*l.*? No; perhaps not one penny. Field Marshal the Duke will decline the meeting of a deputation as he did the Paisley affair; but the middle men who are the great sufferers, will be expected to subscribe. It is a landlord's question, and a landlord's only; and to the landlords I for one may leave it; and in the hour of death the pious Lord Ashley will procure their absolution, though it be at the expense of his Dorsetshire friends."

WILLITON AND DUNSTER AGRICULTURAL ASSOCIATION.

—The annual meeting and ploughing match took place on Thursday. The ploughing came off in a piece of ley, near the road leading to Minehead. Thirteen ploughs started, and the work was generally done in a very creditable manner. The dinner was provided at the "Luttrell Arms," and reflected great credit upon the worthy host for his liberality and good management. Bickham Escott, Esq., ably presided. The cloth having been removed, the honourable chairman gave the usual loyal toasts, prefacing each with apt and loyal remarks. On the health of the members of the county having been drunk, Mr. Acland returned thanks, on behalf of Mr. Dickinson and himself; and in conclusion proposed "the health of Mr. Escott." (Loud and long-continued cheering.) Mr. Escott, in returning thanks, said he always felt great pleasure in meeting a large party of friends such as he saw before him. That pleasure was greatly heightened when he remembered that the object of their meeting was one of unmixed good, and of great benefit to this part of the country. (Cheers.) He drew the attention of the meeting to the failure of the potato crop; and was interrupted, or rather attempts were made to correct the hon. genl.'s statements regarding the affliction. The Rev. Mr. Ralph questioned the assertion that one-half of the food of the poor consisted of potatoes. A farmer replied to the question, how much of the crop had been destroyed? he said that more than three-quarters had been rendered totally useless. Mr. Escott continued: he believed that in the whole case it would be found that four-fifths had been destroyed, rendered totally useless. (Hear, hear.) And were they (the agriculturists) in such a state as not to be able to tell the truth? Why, when the time came that bitter want pressed upon those who now chiefly lived upon potatoes, would those who suffered be satisfied to have the matter stifled. Would they be satisfied to hear that it was a visitation of Providence, and all that could be done was to endeavour to avert the consequences? He was not a reasonable man who endeavoured to stifle inquiry, and the fullest inquiry, into the cause. (Cheers.) He had asked what portion of food had been destroyed, and he was told three-fourths. If he himself stated that four-fifths were nearer the mark. How, then, he asked, were those to live who had been accustomed to use potatoes to the extent of one-half of their food, now that three-fourths of that crop had been destroyed? (Hear, hear.) He did not intend to say anything about politics; but he would say this. He knew what had been done in former times, in cases of similar emergency—he knew that in the case of the oldest nation of which we have any record, the inhabitants sent to the granaries of other countries for food. He knew, also, that whenever the people of this country had been distressed, one of the principal causes of that distress always was the high price of provisions in our great trading communities. (Hear, and cheers.) He advised those who heard him to consider these things; he advised those who were in the Government to consider them; he advised such men as his hon. friend (Mr. Acland), than whom there were few more able or more honest—he advised all to use the influence which rank and station, education and ability, and honesty gave them, to endeavour to ward off or to mitigate the evil that was impending. (Loud cheers.) Let them tell those who were in power, to beware how they tampered when such an imminent danger stared them in the face. (Enthusiastic cheering.) The last toast the chairman gave, was "Prosperity to the Williton and Dunster Agricultural Association." He said he gave that toast with feelings of satisfaction at all the proceedings which had taken place that day, without any exception whatever. The object for which the association had been established was a good one. He believed that benefit arose from such societies, though some persons were apt to exaggerate it. It is true that good might be obstructed if political questions were introduced; and for this reason, that so long as we in this country enjoy that freedom which we have inherited, and which he hoped we shall ever enjoy, we feel so much on political subjects that our feelings overcome our judgment—(hear and cheers.) He had listened to the whole of the remarks that had been made, and had endeavoured to watch every word that had fallen from his own lips; and, with one exception, no political question had been touched upon in that room. It was true that many of the questions adverted to might become subjects of political discussion, and excite party feeling in the councils of the nation. But he did maintain that they never ought to be allowed to do so. He maintained that the supply of food for the people least of all other questions should be made political. Col. Luttrell—I must go after this. The supply of food not a political question! Mr. Escott continued—His friend had said the supply of food was a political question. He (Mr. Escott) told the meeting, and it was well that it should be known, if such societies as these were to be of any use at all, the free expression of opinion was necessary to their usefulness.—(loud cheers.) The meeting then broke up.—Somerset County Gazette.

IRISH GOOD GOVERNMENT.—In a country of monopoly there can be no patriotism. There may be a party spirit; but public spirit there can be none. As to a spirit of liberty, still less can it exist, or anything like it. A liberty made up of poodles!—a liberty made up of ineptitudes!—a liberty made up of exclusion and proscription, continued for ages, of four-fifths, perhaps, of the inhabitants of all ranks and fortunes! In what does such liberty differ from the description of the most shocking kind of servitude? But it will be said, in that country some people are free—why, this is the very worst description of despotism. Partial freedom is privilege and prerogative, and not liberty. Liberty, such as deserves the name, is an honest, equitable, diffusive, and impartial principle. It is a great and enlarged virtue, and not a sordid, selfish, and illiberal vice. It is the portion of the mass of the citizens; and not the haughty license of some potent individual, or some predominant faction.

MAIZE, OR INDIAN CORN.

(From the New York Albion.)

We have great satisfaction in stating that Mr. B. Escott, Member of Parliament for Winchester, gave notice in the House of Commons, that he should, early in the next session, move that Maize or Indian corn be admitted into the ports of Great Britain duty free.

It would be affectation in us not to express the gratification we feel on reading this notice. The introduction and use of Indian corn into the British Isles, has long been a favourite object with us, and we have on various occasions advocated it in the columns of the Albion. In the year 1842, we addressed a letter to Lord Ashburton, then in this country, on the subject, and the letter we subsequently published in a pamphlet. This pamphlet has had a wide and general circulation, and, during the last year, has been the subject of much conversation in England among many of the leading statesmen and politicians of the country. We had, also, the pleasure of receiving a letter of thanks from Lord Aberdeen, for the information which it contained.

But an innovation of this kind, upon the protective laws of the kingdom has, and will meet with much opposition. The agricultural protectionists, already sufficiently annoyed with the inroads made on the corn tariff by Sir Robert Peel, will, of course, resist this new measure; but we are not without hopes—nay, indeed, we have the fullest confidence that when the merits of the case are fully known, and the question comes up in the House of Commons for discussion—that its advantages will appear so palpable as to disarm hostility. It should, therefore, be the business of Mr. Escott and those gentlemen who view the plan in a favourable light, to have its advantages laid before the public during the recess. That the scheme will stand the test of the fullest investigation, we do not for a moment doubt; and if prejudices can be conquered to any reasonable extent, we have no fears for the result.

That the people of England will voluntarily adopt Indian corn as an article of food, we do not suppose; prejudice indeed will in the first instance be a considerable obstacle in the way of its successful introduction; but we look forward to times of scarcity when the crops have failed, when bread is dear and money scarce; when the poor in the manufacturing towns are in a state of destitution; when soup houses are opened to feed starving thousands—then, when such a disastrous period does arrive, will the Indian corn be properly valued. In addition to soup houses, let mush and pudding houses be opened, and the plate of mush or slice of pudding be given to the hungry, who will certainly apply for it. Let it be borne in mind that the maize in either form is most nutritious and wholesome, and palatable too, when seasoned with a little sugar or molasses, or what would be preferable in England—treacle. In addition to these facts, let one other fact be also kept in view, namely, that the plate of mush or slice of pudding, with its concomitant sweetening, can, if the duty be repealed, be prepared at the cost of one half-penny, and be sufficient in quantity to satisfy the appetite of any moderate person. These facts with corresponding details were published in the pamphlet before adverted to.

But it is not as human food only that we would recommend the use of this article. It is well known to be admirably adapted for hogs and poultry; and for milch cows, the meal when mixed with green fodder, is pre-eminently useful. If introduced and used for these purposes in England, the land which is now employed for barley and oats could be appropriated to wheat, turnips, and the higher and the more valuable articles of agricultural production. Our theory indeed is simply this:—There is a want of superficial surface in the islands of Great Britain to provide food for their increasing population, it is therefore wise and expedient to use what land there is for the better class of productions, importing from foreign countries what may be considered the lower and cheaper articles of food.

The commercial considerations attached to this subject should not be overlooked. If there should be an annual demand for ten millions of bushels of maize in Great Britain and Ireland, that quantity at half a dollar a bushel would constitute an article of export from the United States, amounting to five millions of dollars. The returns for this would in all probability, be made in British goods of some sort, or in British capital for investment; and in either case the transaction would be highly conducive to the welfare of both countries. The Jersey, the Virginian, New York, Pennsylvanian, and Ohio farmer would feel the effect of this new demand for one of the great staple commodities of the soil; he would feel that he was raising a crop for a country that was able to pay for it; he would have assurance that his corn would not be cheapened down to 40 cents a bushel, but would command an encouraging and remunerating price. Such a consideration would tend to preserve the peace between the two countries, by showing the people how mutually usefully they are to each other.

THE FREE CHURCH AND THE CORN LAWS.

ANTI-FAMINE SERMON.—At the meeting of the Synod of Lothian and Tweeddale, of the Free Church, held in the Rev. Dr. Candlish's Church, Edinburgh, on Tuesday, the 14th inst., at which the elite of the Free Church ministers were present from all the neighbouring districts, the Rev. Mr. Mackenzie, of North Leith, preached a most eloquent and impressive sermon, much of which was directed against the unjust policy of our rulers in enacting laws to make the food of the industrious and honest scarce and dear, and their own luxuries abundant and cheap. He selected for the subject of his discourse part of the 6th chap. of Revelations; and in particular, the 5th and 6th verses:—"And I beheld, and lo, a black horse; and he that sat on him had a pair of balances in his hand. And I heard a voice in the midst of the four beasts say—a measure of wheat for a penny, and three measures of barley for a penny; and see thou hurt not the oil and the wine." The rev. gentleman, towards the end of his discourse, referred to the destitution and suffering likely to be endured in this kingdom during the present season, as exemplifying the predictions contained in his text. He agreed with the majority of commentators in regarding "the black horse" as being an emblem of calamity and mourning; and "the balance" in the hands of the rider as indicating that there would be a great scarcity of provisions, and that men would have their food dealt out to them, not in natural abundance, but weighed and measured with the minute exactness required in a period of scarcity and famine. "The measure of wheat," he said, was no more than the ordinary daily allowance of bread to a slave, while the Roman "penny" (or sevenpence-halfpenny of our money) was the usual day's wages of a labourer. Thus, during the period referred to, the poor would be in a state of great suffering, for a man could earn only bread for himself, and none for the other members of his family. The effect would be to drive many to the coarse and less nutritive articles of food which the "penny" would purchase in larger quantities. "Three measures of barley for a penny," in place of one measure of wheat, would be their first step in the downward course; and even then they would obtain only a bare subsistence of the least desirable kinds of food, and have nothing left for clothing or other necessities. The result would be a state of dreadful destitution and suffering on the part of the poor; but then the luxuries of the rich were not to be interfered with—"see thou hurt not the oil and the wine." This, he said, was a true picture of the state of matters in our own day and country. The aristocracy made and maintained laws in order to oppress the poor and benefit themselves. The result—which they appeared indisposed to avert—would probably be a famine in the land; and thus their unjust policy and legislation might perhaps be overruled by Providence, as a punishment for our sins as a nation. The rev. gentleman concluded a most able discourse, which was listened to throughout with intense interest, by an earnest appeal to the ministers of the Synod, individually and collectively, to be faithful shepherds over the flocks entrusted to their pastoral care.—Scotsman, Nov. 5.

PRESENTATION OF PLATE TO EDWARD HOLLINS, ESQ.

On Saturday the 8th, a soirée was given by the work-people of Edward Hollins, Esq., manufacturer, at Park Mills, Stockport, on the occasion of their presenting that gentleman with a service of plate, as a testimony of the attachment and regard, which he has won from them by his invariable efforts for the promotion of their comfort, and for the advancement of their intelligence and happiness. Upwards of eight hundred persons partook of an excellent entertainment in one of the upper rooms of the mill, which was tastefully decorated with evergreens, and festooned with pink and white drapery. Along the walls were hung various banners, bearing inscriptions, such as "The Rights of Industry," "The Town and Trade of Stockport;" and over the chair were the words, "Thus shall it be done unto the man whom the people delighteth to honour." Across the centre of the room, on two parallel beams, was erected a platform, or rather a gallery for the band, decorated with pink and white festoons, and rosettes. Such was the good spirit and hearty reciprocity of sentiment on the part of all who had met to do honour to one—

"Whose generous friendship no cold medium knows."

Burns with one love, with one resentment glows," with those who participated in them, and who were but "in the morning of their youth," he looked upon, through the vista of years, as a sort of land mark to guide them on in the path of well doing. After the tables were cleared, Mr. Hurst, one of the foremen of the establishment, was called to the chair. Mr. Johnson read over letters from Richard Cobden, Esq., M.P., E. Davenport, Esq., Mr. and Mrs. Marsland, Mr. Hollins' father, and others, expressing their regret that they could not be present on the occasion, owing to prior engagements. After the usual loyal toasts had been given, the Chairman gave "The people, the producers of wealth." Mr. J. Allinson, a power-loom weaver, responded in an excellent speech of considerable length, for which we regret we cannot find space.

The plate was then brought into the room and placed on the table before the chairman, amidst the simultaneous and honest applause of the vast assemblage. The testimonial, valued at 100*l.*, consisted of an elegant silver tea and coffee pot, two sugar-basins, cream-jug, and toast-rack, of the newest style and pattern, and a massive silver salver, on which was engraved the following inscription:

"This salver, together with the silver tea-service, was presented to Edward Hollins, Esq., by the work-people in his employ, November 8th, 1845, in testimony of their gratitude for his unwearied exertions in the promotion of their comfort, intelligence, and general happiness."

The parties deputed to present Mr. Hollins with the plate were two of the oldest hands of the mill, namely, William Davies, who had served 42 years, and Joseph Robotham, who had served 36 years. The chairman then gave the health of Henry Coppock, Esq., and the other guests who had given them their company that evening. Mr. Coppock returned thanks. The chairman said that there was another pleasing proof of the attachment of the work-people of Park Mills, not only to their respected master, but to their manager also. The gentleman was well known to every one connected with the bleach-works—he meant Mr. James Nightingale. The work-people have purchased for him a piece of plate. Mr. Joseph G. M'ile, the Vice-president, said he had been by that gentleman deputed to say, that he sincerely thanked the bleachers and finishers for their kind consideration of him, but that he could not participate that evening in the festivities consequent upon the presentation of the testimonial to their worthy master, Mr. Hollins, and begged to decline accepting the mark of their esteem for him on the present occasion; at another time he should feel proud to receive it from their hands. As the object of that meeting was to do honour exclusively to their revered master, Mr. Nightingale had taken a right view of it, and did not wish to have the business for which they had met, interrupted, by appropriating any portion of their time to him. (Hear, hear.) The chairman proposed "The Ladies," which was responded to by Mr. P. Marsland. At nine o'clock the tables were removed, and dancing was kept up with great spirit until a late hour.

PRESENTATION TO MR. JAMES NIGHTINGALE.—On Monday evening, the crofters employed in connection with the same establishment presented Mr. James Nightingale, the manager of the Newbridge Lane Bleach Works, with a splendid silver cup, valued at 15 guineas, as a testimony of their regard and esteem for him. The ceremony took place at the Bull's Head, Market-place, and about 100 sat down to supper. The festivities were kept up until a late hour.

CORN LAWS.—We understand that R. Cobden, Esq., M.P., and J. Bright, Esq., M.P., will attend a meeting in Bristol on the subject of the Corn Laws, on Friday, the 5th December. Milner Gibson, Esq., M.P.; and Chas. Villiers, the hon. M.P.; are also expected to be present.—Bath Journal.

ANTI-CORN-LAW MEETINGS.—Free trade meetings, which will be attended by Messrs. Cobden and Bright, are to be held at Sheffield on the 24th; at Leeds, the 25th, and at Bradford, the 26th instant. During the same week other meetings will also be held at Wakefield, Barnsley, and Doncaster.

NOTICES TO CORRESPONDENTS.

R. C. S., Grey Friars Gate.—A person qualified for a borough, and under more counties, may vote for each and every of them at a general election.

A Subscriber to the League, Leicester.—To entitle a person as a freeholder to be on the register, he must have in law or equity a freehold interest of 40s. clear. If the estate is mortgaged to the full extent, or over its value, and leaves no surplus, that property will not legally give a vote to the mortgagor, but the mortgagee might have a vote if he was in possession or in the receipt of the rents and profits. 2d question.—It is not of necessity that the house should be let at all times to confer the vote: it is sufficient if it is shown that it is of the yearly value of 40s.

POSTSCRIPT.

LONDON, Saturday Morning, November 22, 1845

The country is aroused to a sense of the dangers impending over its prospects. The inhabitants of Manchester, Newcastle, Salford, and several other towns have met and joined in memorials to the Government for the immediate opening of the ports. It is now certain that recourse must finally be had to this measure; and delay only serves to impair its remedial efficiency. "The sliding scale," says the Morning Herald, "is efficient to keep corn out when it is not wanted, and to let it in freely when it is wanted." But the real question is, who are to be judges of the want? If the determination of this issue be referred to the monopolists, who have a direct interest in obtaining the artificial prices of scarcity, they will not recognise the existence of want until the pressure of famine became so intolerable as to menace the public safety. The eaters of bread would not import corn unless when wanted; and in a natural state of things their demands would exactly measure the deficiency, and procure the supply. But the law, and the Government which made that law, have arrogated to the Minister the power of determining the adequacy of the supply of the national food, and for the exercise of this power he is morally and constitutionally responsible. The meetings in Manchester, Newcastle, and elsewhere show that the danger is felt to be pressing; we trust that every town in England will similarly express its opinions on this perilous crisis, and thus throw upon the Government the entire responsibility of the consequences. The accounts from Ireland become worse every day; the Mansion-house committee, over which Lord Cloncurry presides, has published resolutions, declaring that more than one-third of the potato crop is already destroyed; that the pestilence is daily extending; that their information on the subject is positive and precise, being derived from persons of all political opinions, and from clergymen of all religious denominations in the various quarters of Ireland; and to this they add a resolution condemnatory of the Ministerial policy, which we subjoin:

"That the people of Ireland should particularly arraign the conduct of the present Ministry in shrinking from their duty to open the ports for the introduction of provisions by royal proclamation, whilst they have had the inhumanity to postpone the meeting of Parliament to next year."

The ministerial organs deny the existence of the want. Let the want then be proclaimed by those who feel it. Manchester proclaims that it is sensible of deficiency; its constituted authorities, its most important body of operatives, and the general mass of its inhabitants, convened in public meeting, declare to the premier that the supply of provisions is inadequate to the exigencies of the population, and they set in array a body of evidence which can only be resisted by the most wilful blindness and perversity. But the same signs of distress are becoming evident in every part of the country; the several boards of guardians in the metropolis find that parochial expenses increase, while the power of sustaining them is diminished. It is the duty of the people to prevent their rulers from continuing in the delusion which their semi-official organs labour to propagate. Every town in which the symptoms of approaching scarcity begin to show themselves, should at once place these evidences on record and lay them before the Cabinet. The cry of distress from Ireland is swelling; let it find an echo in England, that our rulers may know it has been heard. Let it be thoroughly understood that the nation requires something to be done, and then, if nothing is done, there can be no mistake as to where the accountability rests. The Government is playing a desperate game, when it denies that there is any deficiency. Its denial is thus answered by the Mansion House committee:

"We are unfortunately able to proclaim to all the inhabitants of the British empire, and in the presence of an all-seeing Providence, that in Ireland famine of a most hideous description must be immediate and pressing, and that pestilence of the most frightful kind is certain, and not remote, unless immediately prevented."

Here is a solemn declaration set forth by men of different creeds and parties, supported by a long array of evidence, which cannot be overborne by the heartless speculations of the Herald, or the surmises of the Standard, aided though the guesses of both be by the inspiration of the Cabinet. It is the duty of every town in the empire to pronounce on the notorious inadequacy of our present stock of provisions, and to warn our rulers of the impending results. At such a crisis as that with which we are menaced, the nation must not be wanting to itself; the example given by the great towns of the North is an indication of the proper course to be adopted; there is yet time for the voice of warning and remonstrance to be heard; and, if that voice be unheeded, the people will at least have delivered their own souls.

MARKETS.

CORN MARKET.

MONDAY, NOV. 17.—There is only a small show of samples of Wheat from Essex, Kent, and Suffolk this morning. The supply of foreign is large. There is rather more disposition evinced to purchase both English and free foreign, and the former is readily taken off at the prices of this day week. In bonded there is little or nothing doing. The supply of Barley is good, and fine qualities are 1s. and inferior 2s. lower than last Monday. Beans about 1s. cheaper. In the value of White and Maple Peas no alteration. A very large fleet of vessels laden with Oats have arrived within the last few days; about 30 from Ireland, and as many from the near Continental ports. The effect has been completely to stagger the market, and prices have declined considerably. Oats are freely offered at 2s. less money than could be obtained last Monday, but even at this reduction purchasers are not numerous. There is, however, more demand than of late.

THE LEAGUE.

No. 114.—VOL. III.]

SATURDAY, NOVEMBER 29, 1845.

[3d.]

NOTICE TO THE PUBLIC.

LEAGUE FUND.

All Subscribers of £1 and upwards to the LEAGUE FUND will be entitled to, and receive, a copy weekly of this publication for twelve months from the date of the receipt of their subscription.

Subscribers of half-a-crown, and under £1, will have forwarded to them a copy of THE LEAGUE, containing an acknowledgment of their subscription; and it is requested that all subscribers will be kind enough to send their names and addresses to the offices of THE LEAGUE, Newall's-buildings, Manchester, or 67, Fleet-street, London.

N.B. As there is considerable risk in the transmission of gold and silver by post, parties wishing to forward small contributions to THE LEAGUE FUND are particularly requested to make their remittances by post-office orders.

The Council of the League would also suggest to their friends in the country the importance of transmitting their copies of THE LEAGUE newspaper, after perusal, to such parties (more especially farmers) as may be either hostile or indifferent to the question of Free Trade.

By order of the Council,
JOSEPH HICKIN, Secretary.

OBSERVE!

Samples of good Wheat were sold in Mark Lane on Friday at 74s. per quarter.

The duty on Foreign Wheat is 14s. per qr.

The national expenditure for bread is NOW at the rate of 20 millions a-year, or FOUR HUNDRED THOUSAND pounds weekly MORE than during the whole of last winter and spring.

THE COUNTIES!

QUALIFY! QUALIFY! QUALIFY!

Could we hope that the mere repetition of these words were of force to convey to our readers' minds and hearts the whole of what we mean by them, we might be well contented to write nothing else from now to the 30th of next January. There is nothing else we can write of half the importance. All our other labours are just now insignificant compared with those which have for their object to WIN COUNTIES.

Meetings for memorialising the Government, or petitioning the Queen to open the ports, are good. We cannot have too many of them. Everywhere they ought to be held. We rejoice to see that everywhere they are held. Yet the very fact that public meetings are necessary, indicates a deep-seated evil which no conceivable amount of public meetings can correct. With a representative government, we ought to have no occasion to agitate and hold public meetings for redress of grievances. Constitutionally, the House of Commons is the true public meeting. If the intent and spirit of the constitution, as settled in 1832, were realised in fact; if the government of the country were really where the constitution of the country means to place it—in the hands of the industrious classes;—there would be no need of all this begging and praying, by meeting, memorial, and petition. We should have a self-acting polity—needing popular intervention only once in seven years. Administration and legislation would be as promptly and as exactly responsive to the wants and wishes of the people, as they are now to the behests of the landed oligarchy.

All this meeting and memorialising is good, under the circumstances—because, under the circumstances, it is necessary. But the necessity is one of which we, the people of England, ought to be ashamed—and the circumstances which create it are circumstances which we must forthwith put an end to. Our agitation for open ports and Free Trade is, at the best, but a lame and clumsy substitute for franchises that would supersede all need of agitation—franchises which the law and constitution of our country actually put within our reach on the easiest and cheapest of terms, but which we have hitherto supinely neglected to make our own. We agitate, because, as matters stand, we really can do nothing else; because we have let the power which "makes and unmakes" Parliaments and Cabinets pass into the hands of an oligarchy; because we live under a representative government, in which, through our own default, we are not represented—under a government which has just enough of popular representation to blunt the edge of individual and personal ministerial responsibility, but not enough to afford any effective popular control over ministerial acts. The dukes and squires, the Richmonds, Buckinghams and Tyrrells—they are represented, for they have the votes; they pull the wires; they have the power which "makes and unmakes" ministries. Ministries, of course, do their bidding. Responsibility waits on power. To them, and not to us, does the minister feel himself answerable—for to them, and not to us, does he own it that he is minister. If public meetings cannot mend this, the people might almost as well stay at home, and await with what patience they may the tedious process of ducal and squirearchical conversion;—it is because the public meetings of the past fortnight have given the most unmistakable and decisive signs that this state of things shall and will be altered and reversed, that we look with satisfaction and delight on the recent demonstrations of national opinion. After all, the essence and heart of the present movement for open ports is the county qualification movement, which is very generally identified with it.

We cannot repeat too often, or too earnestly, that the power which alone can repeal the Corn Law, is voting power. It is not "opinion" that will do it—but qualified and registered opinion. The only meetings the monopolists or the ministry care for are meetings of electors—or meetings which tend to and practically result in, the making those electors who before were non-electors. It is on votes—especially county votes—that monopoly stands: it is by votes, especially county votes, that monopoly must fall. Nothing else will do. We must not look to any miraculous or quasi-miraculous intervention to deliver us, even though "the stars in their courses do fight against Sisera;"—Sisera's destruction was not consummated by the stars. We must not trust to accident to help us—though accident, or an agency as distinct from our efforts and almost as inscrutable to our perceptions as what we call accident, has helped most wonderfully to bring our question to an early crisis. We must not look to any relenting of landlordism, under the pressure of national distress. How far national distress will go to move landlordism to justice and humanity, or sway the policy of the ministers who live on landlordism's suffrages, and do its work, the experience of former years has very sufficiently taught all men with memories. Potato panic will do little for us, even though it should open the ports. The ports have been open before, under the pressure of temporary casualties—open and shut again. The ports were open in 1826, and 1828 witnessed the enactment of the sliding-scale. We have nothing to trust to but VOTES. Votes have done the mischief—votes maintain it—votes must undo it. "Demonstrations" are nothing, if they do not demonstrate the result of the next general election. We must make our show in the registration courts, where alone shows are realities. We must arm ourselves with the franchise, that only sufficient and all-sufficient weapon of offence and defence, which is breast-plate and buckler, sword and spear, all in one.

In this great work of winning counties, let no county be set down as altogether hopeless; let no Free Trader neglect taking out his title to a vote for his county, merely because he can see no reasonable likelihood of a Free Trade majority in that county. The likelihood may exist without his seeing it. In many and many a county of England, there are allies ready waiting for us, who will gladly accept our aid in the work of self-emancipation from the insolent oligarchical tyranny that treats English counties as if they were pocket boroughs. County electors—the present race of county electors are fast coming to a point at which they will "resolve that they won't stand it any longer." The present state of things in the counties cannot last; such elections as that which took place the other day in South Warwickshire, when a lordling, on his travels (we forget the lad's name), was made a legislator without knowing it, and the representation of a great county was quietly disposed of by private contract;—such daring exhibitions of landlord domination, of which Hertfordshire is about giving us another specimen in the mock election of somebody that nobody ever heard of before, must by and by become utterly intolerable to English farmers and freeholders. This thing will come to an end; the signs have latterly multiplied on us that the end is not far. There will be—there already is—a reaction towards self-respect and electoral independence. Be it ours to accelerate and give effect to such reactions. Even an inconsiderable Free Trade minority may prove the nucleus of a sturdy independent majority. Let no effort be neglected, for assuredly none will be lost.

Again and again we entreat our friends everywhere to accept the county franchise on those simple, cheap, and easy terms on which it is offered by the ancient constitution of the country. Let every man qualify who can, and for as many counties as he can. Let none consent to exclude himself from the pale of a constitution which bestows so liberally the rights of citizenship and the powers of sovereignty. The monopolist journals, we observe, have been talking of the "vast expenditure" that will be necessary to win a score or two of counties. Nothing can be more nonsensical. It is not "expenditure" at all that we urge. It is investment—that particular mode of investment to which the law of the land annexes a share in the government of the empire. The man who buys a qualification no more parts with his money than if he deposited it in the Savings' Bank. He can get it again when he will, and he has a fair interest for it in the mean while. The vote costs him nothing. It is the land that he buys; and the land is worth the money, without the vote. The vote is given him into the bargain. The CONSTITUTION throws it in GRATIS.

LORD JOHN RUSSELL, THE LEAGUE, AND THE COUNTRY.

"We are not yet so badly off in England but that we may find somebody willing and able to do the will of the country whenever it is unmistakably expressed."—Mr. COBDEN'S Speech at Birmingham, 13th November.

The past week will ever be a memorable one in the history of our struggle. It completes the seventh year of the League's history, and it has been signalled by an accession of strength to our cause, which brings us within sight of the termination of our labours. The powerful leader of a great party in the state, has finally cast in his lot with "us, the Queen's subjects," in our efforts for the emancipation of industry and commerce; and the best beloved and most popular of the aristocratic section of our statesmen has publicly tendered a yet more formal and explicit adhesion to our organisation. LORD JOHN RUSSELL deems it "NO LONGER WORTH WHILE TO CONTEND FOR A FIXED DUTY,"—is "CONVINCED THAT WE OUGHT TO ABSTAIN FROM ALL INTERFERENCE WITH THE SUPPLY OF FOOD," and calls on the country for an "UNEQUIVOCAL EXPRESSION OF THE PUBLIC VOICE" against monopoly, in every shape and form. And LORD MORPETH casts off "all further doubt or reserve," and enrolls himself a member of the League, with the view "to record in the most emphatic way he can, his conviction THAT THE TIME IS COME FOR A FINAL REPEAL OF THE CORN LAWS." Lord John Russell now gives compromise and fixed duty to the winds, and goes for entire and untrammelled commercial and industrial liberty.

We cannot sufficiently express our admiration of the moral courage and manliness with which, in his Letter to the Electors of the City of London, Lord John Russell acknowledges former errors of judgment, and avows the change which "observation and experience" have effected in his opinions. His Lordship says:—

"I confess that on the general subject my views have in the course of twenty years undergone a great alteration. I used to be of opinion that corn was an exception to the general rules of political economy; BUT OBSERVATION AND EXPERIENCE HAVE CONVINCED ME THAT WE OUGHT TO ABSTAIN FROM ALL INTERFERENCE WITH THE SUPPLY OF FOOD. Neither a Government nor a legislature can ever regulate the corn market with the beneficial effects which the ENTIRE FREEDOM OF SALE AND PURCHASE ARE SURE OF THEMSELVES TO PRODUCE."

A very simple confession to make, certainly. Yet how rarely, in great Parliamentary leaders, is this sort of simplicity to be met with! Public men will be infallible—and they call that "consistency." They dread, above all things, being thought wiser after twenty years' observation and experience, than they were before. They will keep up a make-believe of never learning anything new. They are haunted by the ghosts of their past selves. Their wisdom shrinks from being confronted with their ignorance. Their experience dreads comparison with their inexperience. They tremble at the mention of Hansard. They twist and torture Hansard, in all sorts of ways, to prevail on that witness to attest their possession of a virtue which is not a virtue, and which they do not possess. They forget that the true "consistency"—the only consistency worth an earnest man's thought—is a quality of character, rather than of opinion. It is not the identity of this year's opinions with the opinions of a dozen years ago, but the moral accordance of action and utterance with inward conviction. It is steadfastness of principle, force of purpose, fidelity to high and noble aims. There is no more manlike and statesmanlike consistency than consistency in progress.

The straightforward candour with which Lord John Russell confesses and retracts the mistakes of former periods of his political life, will at once commend itself to the admiration of Englishmen. It is plain dealing, and Englishmen really do like plain dealing in public men—especially just now. His Lordship is quite safe in not caring for Hansard. We have all had too much of Hansard. The Hansard argument will never be used against him—he has disposed of it by anticipation. "I thought so-and-so once, but I was mistaken, and I think so-and-so now," is a short answer to whole piles of Hansardisms. It is a safe prophecy, that Lord John Russell will never hear a word about Hansard.

As we have never hesitated to resist Lord John Russell, when called on so to do by our allegiance to principle; as we have freely criticised his lordship's errors, inconsistencies, and short-comings, repudiated his compromises, and rejected his devices for modification and adjustment; as we would have supported, energetically and enthusiastically supported, Sir Robert Peel if he had taken (as we really thought, a month ago, he would take) the position which he has now allowed his Parliamentary rival to occupy, as we did support Sir Robert Peel, in the face of much obloquy from the Whig press, on one occasional, when we thought him nearer to the right than his great opponent; as we have invariably made our Free Trade principles paramount to all party or personal considerations whatever;—so do we now tender to Lord John Russell, as the exponent and representative of Free Trade principles, our earnest, hearty, unflattering, and undivided support. The statesman who, among all of his political rank and standing, has been the first to step forward and offer to embody our principles in an Act of Parliament, is the statesman to whom the industrious classes must look to achieve and seal their emancipation.

Not from the great towns alone, but from the remotest villages and hamlets, must the people of the United Kingdom send forth that "unequivocal expression of the public voice" which a statesman thoroughly cognizant of the nature of the work to be done, and the difficulties to be mastered, emphatically warns us is necessary to the nation's deliverance. There must be no idle hurraing. Monopoly is "doomed," indeed, beyond all question—but the doom is not self-executory. Let no one fondly fancy the work is done, or as good as done. It is yet ALL to do. Monopoly is, this moment, at its very worst. Actually the virus is more malignant and deadly now, than when we began. All these seven years that we have been working, we have really done nothing—we have only been getting ready. The hour for the last death-struggle is now come; and the signal is given "to unite to put an end to a system which has been proved to BE THE BLIGHT OF COMMERCE, THE BANE OF AGRICULTURE, THE SOURCE OF BITTER DIVISIONS AMONG CLASSES, THE CAUSE OF PENURY, FEVER, MORTALITY AND CRIME AMONG THE PEOPLE."

FREE TRADERS, LOOK AHEAD.

If Free Traders believe in their own principles, the time is arrived when it behoves them to look ahead. Some have vainly flattered themselves that the brief gleam of prosperity which we have experienced during the season of abundance and cheap bread would never come to an end, but such have not been readers of the "League," or have read it to little purpose. We could not, indeed, point to the year, or the month, when distress would overtake us; but we knew, as surely as the rising of the morning sun, that, so long as the Corn Laws exist, the cycle of disaster would return with the first deficient harvest, and that it would increase in intensity with every succeeding year of scarcity.

In the first number of the "League," (September 30th, 1843) we showed that the improvement in trade which was then beginning to be felt, was the result of returning abundance. A year later (October 12th, 1844), we discussed the question, "Will the improvement in trade be permanent?" and we said, "We answer decidedly, No. We have no more security for the continuance of prosperity, than there is for exemption from the eruptions of a volcano. The same elements which have produced disorder and distress before are still in existence, and, like the volcano, only await the operation of the same train of events to break forth again. Insufficient harvests will again bring with them all the derangement in the currency and in trade which we have before experienced, and its concomitant distress. There is, and there can be no security for the future, but in the total repeal of the mischievous and iniquitous Corn Laws." Our anticipations are unhappily realized, the Corn Laws are unrepealed, and we are again entering upon the same train of evils from which we have so recently escaped by the intervention of two or three abundant harvests.

The harvests of Europe, as well as our own, have this year proved deficient; in addition to which an alarming and mysterious disease in potatoes has extended its ravages not only on this but on the other side of the Atlantic, the consequences of which no man can foresee. Foreign governments have taken the most prompt measures to meet this calamity, by opening their ports to the free admission of food, and some have even offered a bounty on its importation, but in the face of these evidences of threatened famine, our own government has taken the daring step of risking the subsistence of 27 millions of people, by keeping the ports closed against foreign supplies of food!

With a stock on hand of almost every commodity in which we are permitted freely to trade, equal to from six to twelve months' consumption, we have only on hand of foreign corn (in which we are not permitted freely to trade) a few days' consumption. For the supply of this now indispensable article we are left to the tender mercies of the sliding scale; the consequences have already begun to manifest themselves—the value of money is increasing—the value of property is declining—and trade is paralyzed. The most experienced merchants and manufacturers declare that they have never before witnessed such a sudden and extensive stagnation of trade as since it has been ascertained that we shall need supplies of foreign corn. The terrible commercial distress and disasters of 1838 to 1842, arising from deficient harvests and the effects of our Corn Laws, have left an impression on the public mind never to be effaced during the present generation; and have taught our merchants and manufacturers what may be expected from a recurrence of scarcity. It is to this knowledge that we attribute the present anxiety and alarm, which is well expressed in the circular of Messrs. Gibson, Ord, and Co. of Manchester, of the 5th inst.:

"Since the 4th ultimo, the aspect of affairs in the manufacturing districts, and in the country generally, has undergone a serious change, not only threatening a stop to the progressive improvement which has been going on for the past two years, but furnishing, we fear, well-grounded apprehension that our prosperity must, for a time at least, be on the wane. During the first 11 days in last month we had a tolerably good demand in our market, when the announcement of an increased rate of interest by the Bank of England and a realization of the damage sustained by our potato crop acted like magic, and produced such a stagnation to business as we have never before witnessed. For the past fortnight we have literally no price for our staple productions, and until the question now being agitated as to the opening of the ports for the free admission of foreign grain is decided, we must remain in this state of inactivity. That this step will sooner or later have to be resorted to appears inevitable, and, although to be regretted as more immediately disturbing our monetary system, now peculiarly sensitive from the effect of railway speculation, and the amount to be extracted for the construction of such undertakings abroad, would do much to restore confidence in commercial affairs, and produce a calm in the minds of men generally, from the conviction that such a step would avert the horrors of famine and pestilence, now vivid in the minds of no small portion of the community. Our belief is, that if the ports be opened by an Order in Council, spreading over several months, that the drain of specie will be much less than is apprehended, by affording opportunity of returns being made in the productions of the country; and this will more particularly apply to the United States, whence we must look for a considerable amount of our supplies, and where, for the last 18 months, her own manufacturing production has been inadequate to the wants of her increasing population, and her imports from this country only restricted by her ability to make returns."

Since the date of the above circular, the alarm has considerably increased. A month ago scarcely a doubt existed that the ports would be open for twelve months at least, which would have enabled us to obtain supplies of food during that period from the most distant markets, and thus have mitigated the derangement in the currency which has always followed sudden importations of foreign corn; but the determination of the Cabinet to let the sliding scale take its course, renders a restriction in our currency inevitable—hence, the increased alarm and suspension of business. The manufacturers are at present in full employ, but from the impossibility of making sales, stocks are daily increasing. Such a state of things cannot long exist without forced sales and a decline in prices, which will result in serious losses.

In looking forward to the future, it may be well to recur to the past, and we find that in consequence of the failing harvest of 1838, the drain of gold on the Bank of England in 1839 was as follows:—

Jan. 8th, stock on hand	£ 9,336,000
Oct. 15th do.	only £ 2,525,000

The Bank was subsequently drained of all its remaining treasure, and obliged to borrow £2,000,000 of bullion from the Bank of France; and, in order to place itself in a position of safety, was also obliged to raise the rate of interest to 6 per cent. At the present moment the Bank has fortunately a larger stock of bullion on hand than in 1839; but it would be manifestly dangerous on that account to suppose that the most serious results would not follow a continued drain upon its treasure—that drain has already commenced, as will be seen from the following Gazette returns, viz.—

Stock on hand, Jan. 21st, 1845,	£16,639,315
ditto, Nov. 15th, 1845,	£13,570,086

and the Bank has therefore raised the rate of interest successively from 2½ to 3, and to 3½ per cent. It is impossible, however, in the present aspect of things, that the rate can remain here. It must continue to rise as the bullion is abstracted and the currency restricted, and to what extent that will take place remains to be seen. Attempts will doubtless be made to shew that the advance in the rate of interest, and derangement of the currency, is the result, not of the effects of the Corn Laws, but of the recent railway speculations. There is, however, no novelty in the sudden decline of railway shares, in the face of a failing harvest. A similar decline took place in 1839 to 1842, owing to the restrictions of the currency which the Bank of England was obliged to adopt whilst the drain of bullion to pay for imports of corn continued. We find in the Anti-Corn-Law Circular of the 22nd October, 1840, the subject is referred to, and the following extract given from the circular of a respectable share broker:—"Our market continues in a very unsettled state. Towards the close of the week most descriptions of stock, and especially the leading lines of railway, experienced a sudden and material decline in price, attributable more to the measure adopted by the Bank of England for restricting the circulation than from any real pressure of stock for sale.

"We have to notice a fall in the following lines, viz.—London and Birmingham, old, £7 per share, thirds and quarters in proportion; Great Western, £3; North Union, £3; Grand Junction, £4 to £5; Bolton and Bury, £2; Midland Counties, £2; North Midland, £3; Manchester and Leeds, £4 to £5."

Mr. Cobden, from his experience of the past, took occasion at the Covent Garden meeting in June last, to warn capitalists of the danger of entering into large prospective engagements with the Corn Laws hanging over their heads. "Look (said he) at our capitalists spreading out their wings. They are contemplating railways all over the length and breadth of the land. What would be the effect of a bad harvest upon those men who have subscribed their thousands and tens of thousands to some new railway scheme, and have signed the parliamentary contract? It is all very fine and plain sailing now when every thing is at a premium, every thing is up; get shares to-day, sell them to-morrow, pay for them the next day, and get 20 per cent. (Laughter.) But these shares will be held by somebody; and if we have a failing harvest, whenever it comes, then the day of reckoning for the holders of these shares and scrips will arrive. I would advise every speculator in railway shares to keep a sharp eye on the barometer. He should take in two papers, a railway paper, and the Mark Lane Express; and when he has seen the price of shares, then let him go and observe the price of wheat in Mark Lane. But if a bad harvest comes, and a rise in prices takes place, they are a class that will suffer; and not merely they and their families, but it will entail misery and disasters on every section of the community." We recommend this speech to the special attention of the Railway King. The harvest which promised abundance when it was delivered has turned out a failure. Have Mr. Cobden's predictions been verified? An answer may be found in the fact, that the shares of the Midland Counties, of which the Railway King is the Chairman, have since then fallen more than £50 per share!

The effects of our Corn Laws on the value of railway property must engage the attention of those interested in these important undertakings, and they cannot fail to see with how much greater security they may invest their capital when they are no longer exposed to violent and sudden derangements in the currency, arising out of the law which prohibits the trade in foreign corn except in seasons of scarcity. Mr. Cobden, however, does not stand alone in anticipating losses and suffering to the holders of railway shares in the event of a failing harvest. We notice that the extensive Share Brokers of Leeds, Messrs. R. B. Watson, Tootal, and Barff, in their circular of the 14th inst., observe:—

"The wet weather in July and August at first drew our attention to the almost certainty of a check being given to the railway fever, as it has not imply been called, anticipating, as we then did, a rise in the price of grain which, by a necessary consequence, would produce a fall in the price of shares. But who would have thought, three months ago, that a deficient crop of potatoes would produce a further decline in the price of shares? It is quite evident to us, that high prices of grain in this country are incompatible with high prices of shares; therefore, all those who are interested in railway property, and their name is legion, must become (if they are not already so) corn-law repealers. So that out of the evil of a deficient harvest of grain, with a failure of potatoes, may arise (in fact, must arise in time) a total abolition of the corn laws."

Having warned Free Traders to look ahead, we may be asked what course ought they to pursue? We answer precisely that which a skilful pilot would adopt who foresees an approaching storm,—take in your sails—keep close to the wind—be on the constant watch; and then, although you may not altogether escape injury, you may perchance be preserved from shipwreck.

WORKING-MEN, WAGES, AND SCARCITY.

The memorials soliciting the opening of the ports, which have been addressed to the Government by the operatives of Lancashire, prove that the working-classes are alive to the dangers with which they are menaced by the apprehended scarcity of food. They have had recent and lamentable experience of the effect produced by dear provisions on the rate of wages; and they therefore view with just alarm the rapid rise in the price of bread. The process by which the rise in the cost of food brings accumulated agencies to press down and crush the working-man, though sufficiently obvious, cannot be too often placed before the public view. We find it stated that the cost of bread to an operative family in Bolton is greater by 2s. 6d. per week than it was at this time last year; this is, in fact, equivalent to a reduction of wages to the same amount; for it is the same thing to the operative, whether the half-crown is withheld from him by his employer, or wrested from him by the taxer of his bread. The annual subtraction from wages, by the increased price of the loaf, is £6 10s.; and the operative is deprived of this sum, which he might have expended in groceries, clothing, the education of his family, &c.; he is injured by the deprivation, and the shopkeepers with whom he would have dealt are injured by the withdrawal of his custom. We find Mr. Ashworth, whose name is a sufficient voucher for accuracy, stating that the sum thus abstracted from the wages of the operatives, and consequently from their power of consuming any articles beyond the absolute necessities of life, amounts to £3000 per week in the town of Bolton, or, in round numbers, £150,000 annually. This sum is equally abstracted from the wages of the operative, and from the consumption of manufactured goods. Had it not been grasped by the bread-taxers, it would have been to a great extent expended on manufactured articles, and would have sustained the demand for their continued production. The operative then is injured not only as a consumer, but as a producer; he has to meet at once a higher price for his bread, and a less demand for his labour.

The slackening of demand for labour, consequent on the diminished demand for manufactured goods, is slow in its operation, where machinery is extensively employed; for mill-owners will continue to work, even when stocks accumulate, rather than lose the interest of their invested capital; but the march of depression, though stealthy, is steady; the smaller capitalists begin to make sacrifices in order to effect sales; the larger capitalists are thus compelled to make a reduction of prices, and thus when bread is unnaturally dear, everything else becomes unnaturally cheap. The depression falls first on the profits of the manufacturer; but it is out of his profits that he pays wages to his work-people; consequently, when his profits fall, he must either pay less wages to his work-people, or he must employ fewer hands. The smaller capitalists are early forced to diminish the amount of employment; they cannot afford the advance necessary to support an accumulated stock; every man they discharge adds to the supply of labour, every diminution of their production is a diminution of the demand for labour. But the price of labour, like the price of every thing else, is regulated by the balance of supply and demand. "When two masters are looking for one man, labour will be dear; when two men are looking for one master, labour will be cheap." The fall in the price of manufactured goods thus necessarily and inevitably throws many out of work, and reduces the money-rate of wages of those who continue to be employed.

This is a lesson not merely of political economy, but of recent notorious history; it was fearfully illustrated in the very town of Bolton, which we have selected as an example. But the progress of the evil is not yet fully described. As employment diminishes, the improvident are at once thrown upon the parish, and the provident on their savings. The poor-rates rise as the ability to pay them diminishes; the grocers, the butchers, the hucksters, and even the bakers find their customers daily diminishing in numbers and expenditure. Many of them soon shut up shop, and are added to the mass of compulsory idleness and enforced pauperism. During the late period of distress, we counted more than thirty such shops in one street of Stockport deserted and untenanted. The insolvency of this class of shopkeepers indicates a decreased consumption by the operative population and decreased means of payment. In short periods of depression, the small capitals of these industrious shopkeepers are stretched to the utmost; but if the pressure be severe, or of long continuance, their stocks are exhausted, and they sink into inevitable ruin.

Scarcity, then, brings to bear upon the operative the double calamity of a depreciated rate of wages and a diminished amount of employment. But under this double pressure, his physical condition becomes deteriorated; during six years of cheapness the number of persons relieved by the medical charities of Manchester was 154,000, but during six years of dearness the number amounted to 169,000, being an increase of more than 15 per cent.

The gradual sinking of a family of operatives into a family of paupers is one of the most heart-rending spectacles that can be contemplated. When first the head of the family is thrown out of work Hope whispers a prospect of better times; he is respected in his little neighbourhood, and his fair character has procured him credit among his neighbours. The pressure continues; articles of ornament are pawned, and articles of furniture are sold; old associations render the parting with these things painful, but stern necessity must be obeyed. The house is stripped; its walls are bare, the children pine and shiver, the father wanders about all day in search of work, and returns home to a famished household and empty hearth. In 1841, Bolton exhibited streets of such pictures, but Bolton vainly testified its experience to our rulers to prevent the recurrence of such calamities.

We write with sad and anxious hearts; we well remember the disregarded signs which heralded the advent of the mournful depression from 1837 to 1842; the same indications are now manifested around us, more aggravated in their form, more menacing in their approach. Then, as now, the cry of distress was answered by the subterfuge of exaggeration; then, as now, the monopolist, looking on his costly board groaning under the weight of luxuries, declared that he could discover no signs of distress; then, as now, speculators in scarcity boasted that they only obtained remunerating prices; then, as now the powers of human endurance were gauged by the sliding scale. The operatives of Lancashire have rightly read the signs of the times; it is a lesson that they have been taught by a severe and protracted course of instruction. They have raised the voice of warning, and proclaimed to our slumbering pilots that they see the signals of the coming tempest. We fear that the peril is more imminent than is generally suspected; there has been a sensible diminution of employment already, and the complaints of the small shopkeepers in the suburbs of London are loud and frequent. The bakers sell less bread, and the butchers sell less meat. The more this process of decadence is permitted to advance, the greater will be the difficulty of arresting its progress. Wages are everything to the operative, but the fund from which wages has to be paid is muled and diminished by the increased price of food. The question at issue is between the existence of the industrious and the luxuries of the idle; between "a fair day's wages for a fair day's work," and an unfair tax for the support of a mischievous monopoly; the question has been decided by the law of God and nature, and national calamity must be the inevitable result of assistance to their behests.

COUNTIES REGISTRATION MOVEMENT.

SOUTHWARK.

A meeting of the electors and other inhabitants of Southwark was held at the Bridge-house Tavern, last night, to consider the propriety of expressing an opinion on the present alarming state of the country. The large room of the hotel was crowded with respectable persons, who displayed the greatest enthusiasm.

On the motion of Mr. EML. COOPER, Sir Wm. Molesworth, Bart., M.P., was called to the chair by acclamation.

The Hon. BARONET on taking the chair said he rejoiced at being able to attend that meeting. He had just returned from the Continent, on his road to Cornwall, when he was informed that a meeting was to be held in this borough for the purpose of passing resolutions in favour of opening the ports for the free admission of food. As one of the representatives, he felt it his duty to be present, and to lend all the assistance in his power to that object. Some of them might remember that about a month ago he was present at a dinner in that room to celebrate the late victory. He then stated that the question of Free Trade, especially of free trade in food, was of great and all-absorbing importance. That the harvest had been damaged by the weather; that the corn crops were extremely deficient in quality; that the potato crops in England, and especially in Ireland, were excessively injured; that a large portion of the potatoes were certainly rotten, and that well-founded apprehensions were entertained for the soundness of the remainder. He had told them that the consequences would be that before the next harvest there would be a great increase in the price of food—that this would produce great distress amongst the labouring classes in this country, and perhaps famine amongst the wretched peasantry of Ireland. He had further told them that he could not contemplate the possibility of such events without great and serious alarm—that he trusted that his apprehensions were unfounded. But if they were, as he was afraid they were, but too well founded, we should soon have most painful experience of the impolicy of our Corn Laws. He alluded to a report that was in circulation that the ports were to be opened. He expressed his hope that the report was well founded, as it would be the only means of diminishing the impending evils. He had now to express his regret that those hopes had not been fulfilled, and that the ports had not been opened. The corn crop had been deficient in many parts of Europe—the consequence had been that corn bounded in this country has been re-exported to countries of which the ports have been wisely opened to the free importation of food. By this delay we had not only lost food which was ready at hand, but we had lost much valuable time, which should have been employed in procuring food from America; and he was assured that, at this season of the year, the evil was almost without remedy. He need hardly add, that he cordially agreed in the object of the meeting. He declared himself, as they knew, a Free Trader, and he expressed his firm belief that if the ports be once opened, they will never be permitted to be again shut. They all knew his sentiments; but it was for them, the inhabitants of this great and important borough, to express their sentiments in this alarming crisis, and set an example to the rest of the metropolitan boroughs. The honourable Baronet concluded by calling upon Mr. Wilson to move the first resolution (cheers).

Mr. WM. WILSON then briefly proposed as a resolution, "That this meeting views with feelings of alarm the deficiency of the late harvest, and the very general failure of the potato crop in Great Britain and Ireland, and deems it to be the imperative duty of her Majesty's ministers immediately to open the ports for the free admission of every description of human food."

Which, having been seconded by Mr. LEE STEVENS, was put and carried unanimously, amidst loud cheers.

Mr. R. R. MOORE, with his usual eloquence and practical illustration, then spoke at considerable length upon the propriety of the resolution previously passed, and urged every inhabitant of the borough who possessed the means, to obtain a vote for East Surrey. His address was listened to with the utmost attention, and was frequently interrupted by the plaudits of the meeting, and at its conclusion was most enthusiastically cheered.

Mr. RUSSELL then introduced the following resolution as a practical application of Mr. Moore's address:—"That this meeting has seen with much satisfaction the successful exertions of the League in increasing the number of Free Traders on the registers of Middlesex, South Lancashire, and other important counties; and this meeting, therefore, pledges itself to spare no effort to secure the return of Free Trade representatives for the eastern division of the county of Surrey, by adding to the number of Free Trade qualifications, if possible, before the 30th of January next."

Mr. LUKE EMBLETON seconded the motion, individually pledging himself to carry out its recommendation.

Mr. WILLIAM WILSON supported the resolution, and called attention to the establishing of a building society in the borough, for the purpose of extending the county franchise, which was put and carried with repeated cheers.

Mr. E. COOPER moved, and Mr. MOORE seconded thanks to the chairman, which was responded to by three times three, and astounding cheers.

LEEDS.

An extremely large and highly respectable meeting assembled on Tuesday evening last, in the Music-hall, Leeds, to "consider the result of last year's registration labours, the urgent importance of renewed exertions, and also the impending deficiency in the supply of the people's food." Long before the appointed hour, which was seven o'clock, the hall was filled to overflowing; upwards of two thousand persons were present; and we observed several ladies in the gallery behind the platform. Precisely at seven o'clock, the Mayor of the borough, J. D. LANCELOT, Esq., who was unanimously called to the chair, made his appearance, accompanied by Richard Cobden, Esq., M.P., and John Bright, Esq., M.P., who were received with the most vehement cheers, and took their seats on either side of the chair.

On the platform we also observed Alderman Stansfield, Alderman Muclea, Alderman Birchall, Robert Jowitt, Esq., Edward Baines, Jun., Esq., Samuel J. Birchall, Esq., George Hyde, Esq., Obadiah Willans, Esq., John Marshall, Esq., Peter Willans, Esq., Joshua Wordsworth, Esq., Rev. Charles Wicksteed, Joseph Lupton, Esq., R. L. Ford, Esq., Charles Lupton, Esq., H. H. Stansfield, Esq., Thomas Plint, Esq., Walter Stead, Esq., John Wilkinson, Esq., J. C. Barrett, Esq., John Cliff, Esq., Henry Birchall, Esq., Frederick Baines, Esq., Wm. Bruce, Esq., W. B. Holdsworth, Esq., Richard Wilson, Esq., Wm. Fennell, Esq., Jonathan Dickinson, Esq., H. J. Marcus, Esq., John Heaton, Esq., J. Armistead, Esq., Liebreich, Esq., Sheppard, Esq., Thomas Holt, Esq., Wm. Kelshall, Esq., Charles Crompton, Esq., Mr. J. Kitson, Mr. Shackleton, Mr. John Whitehead, Mr. Yewdall, Mr. J. Brady, Mr. S. Shann, &c.

The MAYOR, in opening the proceedings of the evening, observed that the prosperity of the town and district was indissolubly connected with the cause in which they were engaged. They were once more called upon to consider this great question in public, by the appearance again amongst them of their esteemed friends Mr. Cobden and Mr. Bright. They had happily succeeded, during the last year, in placing upon the register of this important riding no less than 2000 voters in favour of Free Trade. (Hear, hear.) Some time ago Mr. Cobden offered to induce Lancashire to come forward and assist the people of Leeds in securing the west riding in favour of the League. But he was sure that the West Riding could fight its own battles. It had done so heretofore, and would do so again. (Hear, hear.) He was certain that every one before him recognised the principles of the League as the principles of truth and justice, and the cause of the League as his own cause, inasmuch as his own best interests were closely bound up with it. He would not occupy the time of the meeting at this period of the proceedings, but would call at once upon Mr. Baines to propose the first resolution. (Hear, hear.)

EDWARD BAINES, Jun., Esq., on rising to propose the first resolution, was received with loud and reiterated cheers. He observed that liberty was the very life of commerce, and that the Mayor of the borough could find no better opportunity for furthering the interests of the town and district than that of presiding over such a meeting as the present (hear). The resolution which he was about to propose was as follows:—"That whilst this meeting is gratified at the success of the noble effort made last year by the Free Traders of the West Riding, to qualify as county electors, it considers that another and equally vigorous effort should now be made in preparation for the revision of 1846; and recognizing in the present alarming crisis of the national affairs a fresh and startling illustration of the mischievous and fatal operation of the Corn Laws, and a more urgent necessity that this important manufacturing section of the empire should return as its representatives to Parliament men of unquestionable Free Trade principles, pledges itself to spare no exertions in inducing Free Traders who may not be upon the register to qualify before the 30th of January next." He would now state, in a few words, the result of the effort made last year to improve the position of the Free Traders upon the register of the West Riding. The result of their operations last year, was to make no less than 3369 new claims in the West Riding. Out of these they succeeded in establishing no less than 2836 claims. (Cheers.) They succeeded also in striking off, upon valid objections, no less than 1242 of their opponents. (Hear, hear.) On the other hand, the Tories succeeded in sustaining 983 new claims, and struck off from the Free Traders 953. But the result of all this showed a most encouraging gain on the side of the Free Traders, for there remained a balance in their favour of no less than 2142. (Great cheering.) This, with their former gains, since the last election, converted Lord Morpeth's minority of 1194 into a majority of 1272. (Great cheering.) In regard to their own district, with which they were, of course, more immediately concerned, he could lay before them the following statement of facts:—"The Liberals had struck off 107 Tories, upon objections clearly sustained, and made, in their own favour, at the same time, 461 new claims, of which they succeeded in sustaining before the revising barrister no less than 323. (Cheers.) The Tories struck off 55 claims from the Liberals, and sustained in their own favour 114 new claims. There was, therefore, a balance left in favour of the Liberals and Free Traders of the district of no less than 263 new votes. (Cheers.) It was but justice to the committee of the League to say that, owing to their exertions, no less than 500 voters had been qualified in the district immediately around the borough of Leeds. (Hear, hear.) Of these 500, 138 did not make their appearance before the revising barrister in order to have their votes recorded, and he hoped that if any of these delinquents were present that evening, they would feel thoroughly ashamed of their conduct, and that they would retire from the meeting fully resolved to do better next year. (Hear, hear.) The remainder of the number were put upon the polling books of Bradford and other districts, making nearly 400 new votes, thus secured in their immediate vicinity through the instrumentality of the League committee. (Cheers.) They had much still of leeway to make up. In the manufacturing districts of the county of York the number of electors was not more, in proportion to their population, than one-half their number in the agricultural districts. In fifteen manufacturing polling districts, the population was close upon one million. In the ten agricultural polling districts the population amounted to about 200,000. In the fifteen manufacturing polling districts the number of electors was 24,449, while in the ten agricultural polling districts, the number of electors amounted to very nearly 10,000. They thus perceived that the agricultural polling districts were in population as 1 to 5, as compared with the manufacturing polling districts, whereas, in the number of electors they were as 1 to 2½. (Hear, hear.) There were, therefore, speaking in the proportion of their respective populations, in the agricultural districts, twice the number of electors that the manufacturing districts were possessed of. (Hear, hear.) The manufacturing districts were not possessed of the spirit for which he was ready to give them credit, should they any longer rest contented under such a state of things. (Hear, hear, hear.) The cause of Free Trade was the cause of all classes of society. The cause of the League had been designated the cause of humanity. (Hear, hear.) The humanity of the Corn Laws was observable in this, that they were established for the purpose—which they had answered but too well—of making the food of the people both scarce and dear. (Hear.) The operation of the sliding scale had been this year most singular. He found that the average price of wheat for the six weeks ending November 16, 1844, was 40s. 2d. During the same period of 1845, the average was 58s. 11d., making a difference in price between the two periods of 12s. 9d. per quarter. (Hear.) That was a great and serious advance in the price of corn. (Hear.) Again, let them observe that the price of the best wheat last year was 51s. per quarter, whereas the price of the best quality this year, was 74s. per quarter, thus making a difference of 20s. per quarter between the two periods alluded to. (Hear, hear.) Now the range of average prices last year was 40s. per quarter for the lowest quality of wheat, and 54s. for the highest; but this year the range had been 40s. for the lowest quality, and 74s. for the highest. (Hear, hear.) Last year the difference in the range was only 14s. per quarter between the highest and the lowest qualities of wheat, but this year the difference amounted to 80s. (Hear, hear.) That showed conclusively that there was, at this moment, a great quantity of bad and low-priced wheat in the country. (Hear, hear.) The effect of which was to keep down the averages, and, by keeping them down, to keep up the duty which prevented the importation of foreign corn just at the time when it was most wanted. (Hear.) Seventy-four shillings per quarter was now given for the best wheat, and the duty on the importation of foreign wheat was 14s. per quarter. Now, according to the principle and promise of the minister, when corn was at 73s. per quarter, the duty should be but 1s. per quarter, whereas they now found, that although the best wheat was 74s. per quarter, owing to the bad wheat which told upon the averages, the duty was 14s. per quarter, instead of 1s., as it should be. (Hear, hear.) It was important for them to know these things. (Hear, hear.) They were quite sure of having corn both dear and scarce, until next harvest at least, and just in proportion as the price of corn was raised would the demand for their manufactured productions be diminished. (Hear, hear.) It now became his duty to state to the meeting a fact which would be received with the greatest interest and satisfaction, not only throughout the West-Riding, but throughout the whole kingdom. (Hear, hear.) It was a fact which was as yet unknown even to his friends Mr. Cobden and Mr. Bright, and by the committee at Leeds, and he would show why it had remained unknown. They all remembered that, about two years ago, a meeting was held at Wakefield, for the advancement of the principles of Free Trade, at which meeting Lord Morpeth, the noble lord who formerly represented so ably the West Riding, attended; and they all remembered the calm and high-minded moral courage with which the noble lord had avowed himself before that meeting of his friends and admirers a supporter of the principles of Free Trade, while he stated that he was not prepared to pledge himself that he would then go the length of advocating a total and immediate repeal of the Corn Laws. (Hear, hear.) On that occasion Mr. Cobden stated that he had the highest opinion of Lord Morpeth's honour and integrity, and he had no doubt that if left to his own unbiassed judgment and right-minded feeling, he would undoubtedly become convinced of the propriety of lending his entire co-operation to the advocates of Free Trade principles. (Cheers.) He (Mr. Baines), had that morning had the honour of receiving a letter from Lord Morpeth, which he would read for the meeting, and which he was quite sure would afford to them the highest gratification. (Mr. Baines then read the letter, which will be found in another column.)

The reading of it was received with demonstrations of the most enthusiastic approbation by the meeting, Mr. Baines having been repeatedly interrupted whilst reading it by repeated bursts of acclamation.

Mr. BAINES continued: Those cheers would find an echo throughout every part of that great country. It would be re-echoed through the hills of Ireland; and it would be heard and cause heart yakings amongst her Majesty's counsels; for the best and wisest Chief Secretary that ever Ireland possessed could not lift up his voice against the Corn Laws without seriously aggravating the responsibility of the Government if they refused to open the ports. Mr. Baines concluded by proposing the resolution, which was seconded by Mr. H. H. Stansfield, and carried unanimously.

Mr. COBDEN then came forward, and was received by the meeting with a warmth of feeling which we have seldom seen equalled at any former meeting. The whole assemblage rose, and for several minutes continued to evince their admiration by repeated bursts of acclamation. As soon as the cheering had subsided,

Mr. COBDEN said—Mr. Mayor and gentlemen, the five pounds which we have just received are worth any five thousand which we have as yet obtained. (Loud cheers.) I was sure it would come to that. (Cheers.) I was quite certain when the meeting took place at Wakefield that Lord Morpeth, if left to his own unbiassed judgment, and the promptings of his own warm and sympathetic heart, would not fail to identify himself, sooner or later, with this great movement. (Renewed cheering.) Middling and working classes though we have been who have hitherto engaged in this work, I never doubted from the beginning that we should find some of the greatest and proudest of the nobility join us in seeking for Free Trade; for there never yet was a time when Englishmen did not find some of their nobility, better and wiser than the rest, join them to battle in favour of any cause which had truth and justice on its side. (Hear, hear.) It is somewhat remarkable that only forty-eight hours ago I was talking to my friend Mr. Bright with regard to our prospects, and I then remarked to him how sincerely I wished that Lord Morpeth was placed at the side of Earl Grey in the ranks of the Free Traders, and I remarked that in such a case, with two such young statesmen identified with us, whether the old politicians at one side or the other were opposed to us, we should be sure of men fit to occupy office whenever Government should give way on this question.—(Hear, hear, hear.)—and I now rejoice to find that Lord Morpeth has come forward with no inducement but the feelings of his own good heart—without balancing himself, and without mystification, wholly and heartily to join us in this great movement. (Loud cheers.) How, then, do we stand? What are the prospects of the country at present? It is too bad, that after bringing us down to partake of excellent diet, we should have the prospect of a large portion of the people being in such a condition next March, that they will be unable to obtain potatoes. (Hear, hear.) That is now the position of a great portion of our countrymen, and I believe these potatoes will be found to be the greatest difficulty that Sir Robert Peel has ever yet had to encounter. This is a melancholy picture; it is humiliating to think that bad potatoes are likely to do more than good arguments towards effecting a repeal of the Corn Laws. (Cheers.) My friend Mr. Baines said, that the Government entertained an intention of opening the ports, but I think it was rather too much to say that, for, in my opinion, they do not know what they are going to do. (Cheers and laughter.) We have all seen that Prime Minister in the farce of Tom Thumb, who, when asked his opinion on grave matters of state, had one uniform answer—"As near as I can guess, I cannot tell." (Hear and laughter.) Well, Government is in that predicament, "as well as they can guess, they cannot tell what to do." (Much laughter.) And yet they had good precedents; and fond as we are of acting on precedent, they refused to follow the example of Russia, Belgium, Holland and Egypt, whose governments, when in the same position opened their ports at once, without even having recourse to a commission of inquiry. Why should not the Government follow that example, and relieve themselves at once from the doubt and difficulty of this "do-nothing position"? (Hear, hear, hear.) Now, to come to your county. I believe that at present Lord Morpeth has no intention of standing for it, because he says so, and he never uttered a syllable that was not of transparent truth. But whether he has or not, you have a duty to perform. The West Riding of Yorkshire has now the privilege of having a noble scion of the house of Howard at its head. (Cheers.) Lord Morpeth now leads you, and you must be worthy of your leader; and that you cannot be if you suffer the West Riding again to fall into the hands of the monopolists. (Hear, hear.) You have it decidedly in your power to prevent such a catastrophe. (Hear, hear.) It is said by some that the majority of those who have qualified, are of the better portion of the middle classes. In other districts the working men have qualified themselves to a large extent; and there is now before me, and there is in the town of Leeds, and in the districts around it, an immense number of working men, who, being able to do so, should purchase the qualification. (Hear, hear.) I have lately read that Mr. Wilberforce was once told by an admirer of his, that it was his intention to purchase a qualification, in order to have the gratification of voting for so celebrated and good a man. Let the West Riding be but emulous of enjoying a similar pleasure in reference to another able and good man, and it can easily turn out no less than 2,000 new votes in favour of Lord Morpeth. (Hear, hear, and cheers.) You should proceed systematically and deliberately to the great work of purifying and extending the registry. In Manchester, they found it convenient to lay the town out into districts, from which districts reports are transmitted once or twice a week to a central committee, detailing the progress which had been made. The same plan may be adopted with the greatest ease in Leeds, and it is sure to lead to two most successful results. You are struggling for that which is well worthy your exertions to attain—you are fighting for plenty, for the comfort and welfare of the whole country, and for a principle which will afford you the best guarantee which you can possess, for the permanence of peace throughout the whole world. (The honourable gentleman, on resuming his seat, was greeted by repeated bursts of vehement and vociferous cheering, the whole audience rising en masse, and waving their hats, the ladies waving their handkerchiefs in the gallery for several minutes.) Order being once more restored,

The Mayor rose and called upon Mr. Bright to address the meeting.

Mr. BRIGHT then addressed the meeting in an admirable speech, which was heard throughout with the greatest attention and enthusiasm. Our limits prevent us from inserting it, and to abridge it is impossible.

Mr. YEWALL then rose and congratulated the meeting upon the noble accession to the ranks of Free Traders in the person of Lord Morpeth. The people of Yorkshire were somewhat slow in coming to a conclusion, but when they once took up the cause of justice and truth, they stuck to it with the most persevering adherence, and Lord Morpeth would, he had no doubt, be characterised by a similar perseverance in adhering to the cause which the dictates of his sound judgment had induced him to espouse. (Cheers.) Lord Ashley had already stated that the Corn Laws were doomed, and he had no doubt that after some time the Duke of Richmond would come round to a similar opinion. (Laughter.) The time was coming when the landed interest would see that there ought to be no class interest, but that all classes had identical interests. Their enemies had been completely put to flight. There was no one in that hall to oppose them for an instant. It was a matter of surprise to him, however, that on a great moral question of this kind, the ministers of the various denominations were not found amongst them. (Cheers.) Providence had supplied the wants of all, and knit mankind together, by making one part dependent on the other for an adequate supply of food. If this great question was once settled, it would settle most others which now engaged the attention of the country. Mr. Yewall concluded by proposing the appointment of a committee to watch the progress of the registration.

Mr. Alderman MARSHALL seconded the resolution, which was carried unanimously.

Mr. Alderman STANFIELD came forward amid loud cheers, and cries of "the member for Leeds," to move the 3rd resolution:—

"3. That this meeting has heard with the highest approbation and delight the declaration of Lord Morpeth, in favour of perfect freedom of trade and the total and immediate abolition of the Corn Laws; that it receives this declaration on the part of one of our wisest statesmen, and most beloved and influential public men, as an encouraging evidence of the progress of the Anti-Corn Law League in public opinion; as a strong additional motive for putting the west riding in a position to return uncompromising friends of Free Trade to the House of Commons." The declaration of Lord Morpeth that he was in favour of total repeal and a member of the League, came like music to his ears. Admired and beloved by all in that county, his identification with this great movement now secured his election beyond a doubt. (Loud cheers.)

Mr. Alderman MACLEA seconded the resolution.

After a resolution of thanks to Messrs. Cobden and Bright, the meeting separated.

SHEFFIELD.

In the crowded state of our columns, it is impossible for us to give anything like a complete abstract of the important proceedings at the great and influential meeting of the Free-traders of the West Riding of Yorkshire, held in the Cutler's Hall in Sheffield, on Monday evening last.

At an early hour the door leading to the hall was besieged by crowds waiting for admittance; and although admission could only be procured by ticket, for which 1s. had to be paid, the large hall was filled almost to suffocation for some time before the commencement of proceedings. At seven o'clock, Mr. Cobden and Mr. Bright took their seats upon the platform, and were received with the most enthusiastic cheers.

Mr. Edward Smith, of Sheffield, was unanimously called to the chair; and besides him we observed Richard Cobden, Esq., M.P.; John Bright, Esq., M.P.; Dr. Thompson; Henry Wilkinson, Esq.; W. Fisher, Esq.; Richard Solley, Esq.; Thomas Jessop, Esq.; Aldermen Turton and N. Hoole; Charles Wilson, Esq.; P. Nailor, Esq.; T. Roebuck, Esq.; and Edward Vickers, Esq.

No inconsiderable portion of the audience consisted of ladies.

WILLIAM FISHER, Esq., proposed that Edward Smith, Esq., take the chair. (Loud cheers.)

HENRY WILKINSON, Esq., seconded the motion, which was carried by acclamation.

The CHAIRMAN—I hope the time is not far distant, when every thinking man will look back with surprise and indignation at the fact, that there existed in this country, at any period, a law, the object of which was to stand between the people and the cheapest and best supply of food; (Cheers;) a law which seems to have been especially contrived to restrain and fetter commerce, while it acts in the most pernicious manner upon the agriculturist himself, for whose especial benefit it is said to have been enacted; a law which seems to have no purpose to serve but to enhance the incomes of the privileged class, whose gain is made at the cost of a loss a hundred-fold greater to the general community. Why, then, is such a law allowed to continue? Why is so gross an imposition still put upon the shoulders of the people of this country? How is it that, at the first whisper of famine, it is not swept from the statute-book? Are we to be for ever admitting principles in the abstract, yet refusing to be guided by them practically in our conduct? (Cheers.) Have we yet to learn that this law has produced the most direful effects on the community? Even now, "coming events cast their shadows before." The dread of scarcity has already deranged your monetary operations. Look at the panic which it has produced in the share market. (Hear, hear.) See how it is now operating in raising the rate of interest. You yourselves know by past experience what must follow. When the rate of interest rises, in due time the banks become more careful in respect to the accommodation they can give to their customers. A check is placed upon commerce, and all our prosperity vanishes like a dream. (Hear.) Have we yet to learn the bitter lesson, that dear food means low wages for the operatives, scanty employment, interrupted commerce, and general depreciation of property? (Hear.) Surely we have not learned these lessons in vain, and it cannot need another seven years of suffering to fix them on our minds. Vain are the fallacies which have been resorted to to cover these plain truths, so that the simplest understanding cannot fail to comprehend them. Every fallacy has been detected and exposed. (Cheers.)

Where is now the cry—Let us not be dependent on foreigners? We should be only too glad now to be dependent on foreigners, if we could find any on whom we might depend. Where now is the cry of the peculiar burdens on land, which were invisible when our Member in Parliament moved for an inquiry into them? (Cheers.) The peculiar burdens on land were pleaded by those who were unwilling to go into an investigation of them, which was to be accompanied by an inquiry into the peculiar exemptions of land. (Loud cheers.) We have now the admission that the Corn Law is bad—that it is doomed—that it must go. (Cheers.) But we are asked to give time to prepare. I should like to know what time it would take to put the farmers in a right position for repeal.

I have not observed any symptoms of improvement in their capacity to bear a reverse. This law was passed when I was young. I am now becoming grey, but I do not find that the farmers come less frequently into the Gazette, or that they are making such accumulations of property as to enable them to bear a reverse. No; the fallacies have now all disappeared. (Cheers.) A flood of light has been poured upon the question, but we have relied too much on people's knowing what is right, presuming that, when they knew, they would do it. (Cheers.) It was probably necessary that the whole course of this agitation should be gone through. It was needful to make our course clear as the day, before we could carry with us the judgment and energies of the people of this country, as we are now doing. At length, however, we have ceased to rely, to any considerable extent, on means for the diffusion of information. We have given over talking, and are beginning to act. (Cheers.)

I am very willing to go to the highest authority for rules of conduct, and I do not know that I can go to a higher authority than Sir Robert Peel, when he gives advice in honest simplicity. He says, "Register! Register!" and we say Register! Register! too. (Loud cheers.) We willingly bow to such an authority. We believe that the battle is to be fought in the registration courts. We believe that by perfectly constitutional means, we can break the fetters that are around us. By safe and pacific means we shall effect an alteration of the law, and successfully meet our adversaries, with those weapons which they themselves formerly wielded with so much success. (Cheers.) They are weapons which, I hope, our opponents have now used nearly as long as they can serve them. We have now taken them up, and we appeal to this year's registration, and ask them how they like our beginning? We have been only apprentices at the work. We had not, in the last registration, got our hands in. We intend to do better. (Cheers.) We hope to become more dexterous. We admit the imperfect and clumsy nature of the work which has added only 2000 to the West-Riding register this year, but we expect, by practice, to grow more adroit and skilful in the use of the weapons which our opponents have taught us to wield. (Cheers.) Our friends are here for the purpose of pressing this matter still more home upon us. They can give us very encouraging reports of what has been done in other places. They can point out to us the easy and certain road to success. When I say easy, I mean as easy as most things are in the face of determined resistance from those who have the whip hand over us at present. But a day of reckoning is not far distant. (Cheers.)

In due time, we shall have the dissolution of the present Parliament, and I rather think that many who are now occupying places, will receive notice to quit. (Cheers.) Well, then, to stir up our zeal, to tell what has been done elsewhere, to recommend a continuance in that course of exertion which we have begun, to give us the benefit of their hints and observations, our friends are now arrived. (Cheers.) I do trust that the men of Yorkshire will show still something of that courage that distinguished their ancestors when they resisted the Norman invaders. I trust there remains a little of that independence among the people of this district which placed Sheffield at the head of the polling districts of the West-Riding, at the last election. Sheffield then sent a larger majority in favour of liberal principles than any other polling district in the Riding. (Cheers.) Have you lost anything of your former spirit? Are your principles become less valuable? Are they less deeply fixed on your minds by the years of suffering you have passed through? Have not your exertions rather endeared these principles to you, and more firmly fixed in your minds the resolution to persevere until you have succeeded? And succeed you will, undoubtedly. (Cheers.) It is but a question of time, we have said before. And now we say it is a question of very short time. (Cheers.) They who thought the time was not come when we had abundant harvests, see that now the time is come when we must no longer tamper with the food question. Men of the greatest influence now come boldly forward to say that it is unsafe to keep the people in this unsettled state, that there is great danger in it, and that the time is arrived when the question must be settled, not merely by the opening of the ports temporarily to hulk the public into security, but settled for ever by getting rid of the Corn Law at once. (Cheers.) I will not further trespass upon your time at present, but call on Richard Cobden to address you. (Loud cheers.)

Mr. COBDEN then addressed the meeting at great length.

In reference to the apprehension of war with America, he said it was, he was quite sure, a great deal better to go to our brother Jonathan for food, than to go to fight with him. (Cheers.) He (Mr. Cobden) did not like to hear of people's minds becoming familiarised with the idea of fighting, for he conceived that it would be a great deal better to trade with him, than to encourage the idea of going to war with him. (Cheers.) Those states which produced cotton and tobacco, the articles which we consumed, had no desire to go to war with us. (Hear, hear.) And it was only within a few days that he read an account of a dinner at Charleston, in South Carolina, at which the health of the Queen was proposed, and received in the most enthusiastic manner, for that was one of the portions of the United States which produced those articles which we took from America. (Hear, hear.) What were the portions of the states in which there was no desire to go to war with England? The Atlantic cities, the states of Pennsylvania and New England, those which were connected with England by trade and commerce; but in the states of the west, where wheat and Indian corn, and pork and beef, were produced, those articles in which we refused to trade with them, the warlike spirit towards this country was evinced. (Hear, hear.) If we, however, took a different course from that which we at present adopted—if we took from the states of the west their barrelled flour, and pork, and beef, and butter, they would like us as well as the southern states, inasmuch as people do not usually wish to cut the throats of their best customers. Having dwelt at some length on the danger of impending scarcity, and the apprehended famine in Ireland, and shown that the perils of both were aggravated by the Corn Laws, he proceeded to impress upon his hearers the importance of obtaining county qualifications. Your registry next year will be nearly double that of any other. It was a saying of Charles James Fox, that Yorkshire and Middlesex together made up all England. Now when we see Yorkshire, Middlesex, and Lancashire of one mind, I defy any minister to carry on the government in opposition to their principles. I see the Standard has been putting forward a boasting paragraph that we have won but four counties out of forty. Now, I tell the Standard that these counties are of more importance than all the others—that Yorkshire, Lancashire, Middlesex, and Cheshire, contribute infinitely more to the wealth and power, as well as to the intellectual and moral greatness of the country, than all the others put together, and that no government will ever be seen opposed in principle to the voice of those counties. (Hear, and cheers.) It has always been so. Mr. Wilberforce was, thirty years ago, member for Yorkshire. He always voted with the government. This county was considered of so much importance that I remember reading lately, in his life, that when Mr. Wilberforce went to hold a meeting in Yorkshire, at the close of the last century, and at a time of great excitement on the subject of the French war, so anxious was Mr. Pitt to get the adhesion of this county to his principles that he would not allow Mr. Wilberforce to wait until his carriage was ready for the journey, but sent him off in his own. Mr. Pitt sent an express with further directions to his supporters at Stamford, and begged that the result of the meeting should be communicated by express to London. When at the time of the Reform Bill, Yorkshire returned Henry Brougham, it was the signal of the downfall of the boroughmongers; and in 1841, when Mr. Wortley succeeded Lord Morpeth, the defeat of the Whigs was at once taken for granted. And when Yorkshire sends up her members to vote in support of Mr. Villiers for the total and immediate repeal of the corn laws, then, take my word for it, the corn laws will be found to be not only "doomed," but dead. (Cheers.)

Mr. BRIGHT was the next speaker: he illustrated the practical working of the Corn Laws by showing their injurious effect on the trade and industry of the country at every period of their history when their working has been practically felt. Of the present aspect of affairs, he gave the following description:—"My opinion is, that the present prospects of trade in this country are anything but encouraging, and that their being bad and gloomy is entirely traceable to the existing Corn Laws. (Hear, hear.) Six weeks ago, there was, generally speaking, a fair trade throughout the cotton districts, and in some parts the trade was exceedingly brisk, and more than ordinarily profitable. The demand was then constant, and suffered little or no check whatever, until after a long period of rainy and unfavourable weather, the harvest was found to be deficient, and prices gradually rose; and, in addition to this, an alarming rumour was spread abroad of the almost total failure of the potato crop. Now, there is no other cause whatever, to which the present depression of trade in the cotton districts can be attributed, except to this. All the old things which were formerly said are now no longer mentioned, as the causes contributing to this lamentable result. There are joint-stock banks now in Manchester, as there were four or five years ago, yet nobody now thinks of attributing the depression to them. There is at present, also, far more machinery in Manchester than there was then, yet nobody is now foolish or mad enough to trace the depression to the progress of machinery. There has also been a larger production of manufactured articles than before, but no man now saddles the depression on over-production. (Hear, hear.) The truth is, that there is now a great and general cessation from buying those productions, because the people are becoming impoverished as the price of food advances; and here lies the whole evil. (Hear, hear.) And, sooner or later, it is to be feared, we shall have a state of things to deplore, such as we had four or five years ago." In conclusion, he showed the great importance of the present registration movement. "The House of Commons in this country is held in shares. The people have a small interest in it, but somehow or other they never get into the provisional or acting committee. (Renewed cheers and laughter.) We come to the question, 'Are we to stand it any longer?' The Standard says we have gained four counties at three hundred thousand pounds, and that we have as many millions to win all the counties. Now, I say, the money would not deter us if we saw the prospect of such success. (Hear, and cheers.) But take the proportion Lancashire bears to the other counties:—

Cultivated area of England and Wales.....	Acres 28,749,000
Ditto, Lancashire.....	850,000 or 1-33d part.
Rental of Real property in England and Wales.....	£85,802,735
Ditto, Lancashire.....	7,756,228 or 1-11th part.
Rental of Dwelling-houses in England and Wales.....	35,556,390
Ditto, Lancashire.....	1,777,336 or 1-8th part.

I recollect perfectly well when Lancashire went over to the monopolists there was a cry of reaction throughout the kingdom. When free-trade members are returned for that and some other large counties, the rotten-borough members and the nominees of the Lords cannot keep a government in existence for a session. If one-fifth of the grown-up population of your town register, there is no fear of a contest in this county. And why should you not? You have a stake in the country as well as the landlords. Remember, every manufacturer is surrounded by a colony; and when we recollect how capital was wound up a short time ago, how distress and discontent spread, and as like causes produce like effects, we should dread a scarcity now, reflecting what we suffered from it then. (Hear, hear.) You should take up this question as one of life and death to yourselves and to the trade of Sheffield; and if you do as Halifax, Leeds and Huddersfield are prepared to do, and if the small towns will follow your example, as they inevitably will do, your voice—as it was formerly the signal of the downfall of the Whigs—will speak with a voice of thunder in favour of free trade, when you choose to take on yourselves the exercise of the franchise. (Loud and long-continued cheering.)

GORDON THOMPSON, Esq., M.D., next addressed the meeting, and was received with cheers. He said, "Ladies and gentlemen, I am sure I have great pleasure in rising to move the resolution which has been placed in my hands, although at the same time I regret the absence of the gentleman (our worthy Mayor) who was to have moved it; but as he has been called suddenly from town, that duty has devolved upon me. I do not appear before you here in any political character. I appear before you as a member of the League, (cheers,) a body that repudiates political partisanship. (Hear, hear.) It is not sectarian, notwithstanding what the Times may say. It is a body, therefore, that embraces within itself persons of all shades of political opinion. And this it may safely do, for, if I understand rightly the object of the League, it is to promote the comfort, the happiness, and the well-being of the people generally. (Cheers.) You have heard, and I am sure you understand the political economy of the subject. It is impossible, after the lessons we have had, that any person should be so ignorant as not to understand it. But if I do not too far trespass upon your patience, I should wish to say a word on other subjects immediately connected with this, and which have reference to the particular avocation which I myself exercise. (Go on, go on.) You have heard a great deal of famine. Now, I dare say, in reading of famine, you have also read of something else by which it is accompanied—I mean pestilence. (Hear.) There never has been a famine of any duration, that has not been accompanied by pestilence. All of you are sufficiently educated to know what famine is, and what are the effects upon the body of a want of food. It enfeebles the constitution, and deteriorates the strength of the body. Persons under these circumstances are not capable of following their employment as of yore. But when the scarcity is long-continued, then it is that the strength of the constitution becomes thoroughly undermined, for people are ready to have recourse to other things than good and wholesome food to allay the pangs of hunger, for the cravings of hunger must be satisfied; and when people cannot obtain a sufficiency of suitable food, they resort to various expedients to satisfy those cravings. (Hear.) There must be a certain quantity of substance within the body, and when proper food cannot be had, the people then resort to various expedients by mixing with their food or aliment various other things which are not nutritious, or very slightly so; and in this manner it is that the strength of the constitution becomes undermined, and the foundation is laid for diseases of various kinds. (Hear, hear, and cheers.) One person, for example, according to his constitution, may fall into a decline, and another into some chronic disease; and, as Mr. Bright has justly observed, numbers, in a time of scarcity, are thus carried prematurely to their graves. In the last season of distress in this neighbourhood, I have witnessed this repeatedly. But that is far from being all. If it should so happen, and happened it has now, that the seasons are not favourable for the growing of corn, and there is not only a deficiency in the quantity, but the corn is of bad quality, that is a matter which becomes extremely serious indeed. It is then, more particularly, that fevers of the worst description prevail amongst the people. (Hear, hear.) Scarcity of all kinds leads to this result ultimately, and I need not go very far back to show you in what an extremely precarious position we are at this very moment. (Hear.) It is hardly within the memory of man, but it is a matter of medical history, that little more than seventy years ago, (from 1768 to 1772,) for three or four years there was a remarkably great quantity of rain, so that the fields were covered with extensive inundations, and large quantities of land were thrown out of cultivation in various parts of Europe,—France and Germany, for example. The consequence was, that the excessive moisture affected vegetation; and you know how dependent we are upon the food provided by vegetation for subsistence. Not only were the crops deficient, but the quality of the corn became deteriorated. Then the people felt still more severely the scarcity. So severe was the famine that the people mixed roots, the bark of trees, or anything else they could procure, with their food. (Hear.) The flour chiefly used was that of rye, and the quality was so pernicious that putrid fevers appeared in their most malignant form. One was called the famished or hunger-fever, in which the poor creatures lay stretched on their straw, blanched and white, in a state of insensibility, resembling that of a corpse, though still alive. (Hear.) This extended throughout Germany. There was one particular form of disease throughout the same country, called the prickling or creeping fever, because it announced its attacks by a prickling or creeping sensation throughout the body. This was succeeded by a most violent and powerful contraction of the muscles. The features became contracted, and the body bent in various directions. So violent were these contractions, that in many cases, where persons recovered, they never again had the proper use of their limbs. These were the effects of bad food and scarcity. But that is not all by a great deal. These effects were seen in another, but not less awful form in France. (Hear.) The people were seized with excruciating pains in their limbs, in the feet, or fingers. Then, bit by bit, the very flesh rotted from their bones, and their limbs fell off piecemeal. In both cases, it was demonstrated beyond a doubt that the cause was the badness of the corn. (Hear.) This was produced by the excessively wet weather. It affected not only rye, but wheat, oats, and barley were subject to the same disease. We now have had excessive wetness, and it has caused a rot in the potatoes. It is impossible to foresee the extent to which this may go. We are doomed to eat them—millions are doomed to eat them, and it is impossible to say what effects they may produce. (Hear.) At the time I have alluded to, potatoes were not cultivated to the extent that they now are. They were not then generally an article of food. We are yet strangers, therefore, to the consequences that may come upon us. But this let us remember, that all these diseases were preceded by an unusual epidemic among cattle. We have also had an epidemic prevailing among the cattle to a considerable extent. (Hear, hear.) We see too that the products of vegetation have been injured. Supposing a similar series of years to occur, with the Corn Law in its existing state, nothing can save us from famine and pestilence. (Hear, hear, hear.) You may say, perhaps, how is it that the people at the time I have referred to, could not get food from other countries? Was there no corn in Egypt? No, literally, for Egypt was in a state of famine. Was there no rice in India? No, famine was there. And of that famine I will say a few words, for it well illustrates the principle of monopoly. Wherever you find monopoly, it is the same in character. It is a thing with brazen face, with heart of stone, and hands of iron. (Loud cheers.) It so happened, that in India, in 1768, the rains of December failed. The rains failed again in August, 1769, and the scorching sun burnt up everything. The rice crop, on which the Hindoos chiefly depend, failed; and in the latter part of 1769, it became apparent that famine had invaded the lower classes. There was the East India Company, of which they had heard as a company of monopolists. What was the company about? I will tell you, though I blush to say it. The Company had forbidden the people to trade in rice. The Company monopolised the trade. They had it all in their own hands, and foreseeing the scarcity, they bought up all the stores in the country. The famine now became so grievous that there appeared to the majority of the Hindoos no alternative but to perish by hunger, or by their own hands. Rice soon rose to ten times its usual price, and it was out of the power of the poorer Hindoos to purchase. This was the state of things in 1773; and the rice which the Company had bought up, they sold to the people at any price they pleased, making a most enormous profit. In Bengal alone, one of the most fertile and fruitful countries the sun ever shone upon, three millions of people died of famine. (Hear.) Could not they obtain aid from neighbouring countries? They were in a similar state. In Egypt there was famine. At Chinsurah, parents bartered their children for rice; and mothers threw first their offspring, then themselves, into the Ganges. The banks of the river were covered with dead bodies, and the East India Company had hundreds of people employed in throwing dead bodies into the river, till the very water became pestiferous, and the fish were unfit to be eaten. These were the effects of monopoly, (cheers,) and I think these facts bear me out in designating it in the manner in which I have done. (Hear.) I wish to call your attention to these facts. Do you say it is impossible we can ever be in such a state? I tell you that which has occurred may occur again. (Hear.) We are dependent on the elements, and observe, that after a certain cycle of years the seasons recur again in similar series. If we have a certain number of wet seasons, and corn becomes diseased and scarce, it may happen under the present law that we shall neither be able to procure rice from India nor food from other places. What, then, must be the situation of this country, it would be too awful to contemplate. As I do not think I could have given you a better illustration of the effects of monopoly, I hope you approve of the resolution.—(Long-continued cheering.)

The resolution was seconded by Mr. E. VICARS, and carried with acclamation.

Mr. W. FISHER proposed the next resolution, which was to the effect that a Registration Committee should be appointed, to consist of the present committee of the Free Trade Association, with power to add to their number.

The resolution was carried unanimously.

On the motion of Alderman HOOLE, seconded by Alderman TUNTON, thanks were voted to Mr. R. Cobden, M. P., and Mr. J. Bright, M. P., for their unceasing exertions to promote the cause of Free Trade; after which the meeting separated.

PRESTON.

On Thursday evening a public meeting was held in the Corn Exchange rooms (the use of the theatre having been refused by the proprietors of that building) for the advocacy of the principles of Free Trade in the present "food crisis" and for promoting the "registration movement" in North Lancashire. In consequence of the announcement that Messrs. Cobden and Bright would address the meeting, an immense number of applications for tickets of admission was made; but owing to the comparative smallness of the rooms, many hundreds were disappointed. At eight o'clock the place was densely crowded with an audience of about 900, among whom, in addition to the operatives, were many tradesmen, cotton-spinners, and manufacturers of the town and neighbourhood. Of the two latter classes we noticed Messrs. T. Miller, H. Miller, J. German, J. Horrocks, W. Ainsworth, J. Postlethwaite, G. Smith, J. Hawkins, T. Naylor, — Worsley, J. Evans, and W. Eccles. A number of ladies were also in attendance. At a quarter to eight o'clock Messrs. Cobden and Bright entered the room, and were saluted on their way to the platform with loud cheering. Shortly afterwards Mr. Livesey proposed, and Mr. G. Smith seconded, the appointment of Mr. M. Satterthwaite as Chairman. The proposition was carried unanimously.

The CHAIRMAN, after the cheering with which he was welcomed had subsided, briefly introduced Mr. Cobden, M. P., to the meeting.

Mr. Cobden was received with reiterated cheering, and proceeded to address the meeting at great length. We are unable, however, to give more than a few extracts from his speech:—

"I have had the pleasure of meeting you under many circumstances;—I have been with you when trade was good, and when trade was very depressed, and I have always had but one tale to tell you—that high-priced provisions—unnatural society—produce bad trade for masters and bad wages for men. I have told you that high-priced food means low wages, and low-priced food high wages. Since my first acquaintance with you, you have had two periods—one of high, and another of low prices. When I first became acquainted with you in 1839—40, the price of wheat was from 69s. to 70s. per quarter, and you had bad trade and were suffering greatly. Again, during the two years just elapsed you have had low-priced food and very good trade, and wages rising, with every body employed. Now that is just what I always told you would be the result. My predictions have proved true, and I am going to turn prophet again, and tell you what is to happen now; and if, after all the experience you have had during the last seven years, and will have in the next two years, you are not convinced, then you will not be convinced even though one were to rise from the dead. (Applause.) The price of food has risen about 50 per cent. within the last six months—that is, flour for the same quantity of which you paid 1s. six months ago, you must now pay 1s. 6d. for, and meal in proportion. (Cries of hear, hear.) Well, you are going to have bad trade, and for no other reason than that you are going to pay unnatural prices for your food; and it has come on you more suddenly than I should have predicted, and I will tell you the reason. It is because every body knows now—for we have told them—what effects will follow from high-priced food; so that instead of the wholesale dealer buying your manufactures, and the retail dealer stocking his shop with your goods, directly there is a failure in the crops, and the prices of provisions go up, both of them, instead of buying on ignorantly till next spring, as they would have done seven years ago, stop their purchases at once, and the manufacturers find that within six weeks from the rise of provisions business is almost at a stand. (Applause.) This is what never happened before. Even the men who deny the truth of our principles are now acting upon them—the very men who won't admit that we are right, but hold that we are wrong, even they are taking all the precautions which others are taking who are thorough Anti-Corn-Law Leaguers. They are reefing in their sails, and preparing for a storm. What reason can be assigned for this, except that we have had a bad harvest and provisions are high? It cannot be the expense of production, for the price of cotton was never lower—machinery was never better—people never made better goods. There is no reason why trade should be bad (for you have no wars, and no foreign markets cut off), except that food is unnaturally scarce and dear. (Hear.)

You have had rising wages during two years when bread has been cheap, and as certainly as this has been the case, your wages will drop during the next two years if bread be dear. (Hear, hear.) I want this to be as clear as two and two make four; and let nobody persuade you that two and two make five. (Laughter and cheers.)

Is it not lamentable that a subject in which we are all so vitally interested should still be regarded by many as a party-political question? What is the cause of this? Is it mere party prejudice, or is it something else? Is it a bit of false pride (cheers)—a love of caste? Have you men among you who think they are better than their neighbours, and belong to a higher class than their own, if they can only put their knees under the mahogany of some squire of the third or fourth degree (cheers and laughter); and who will forego the principles and interest of their order if they can only be allowed to bask in the sunshine of some one idea'd fox-hunter? If there are some such, I can only say that they take a very mistaken view of the road to their own importance and dignity. There is no dignity and importance in playing second fiddle to anybody. (Laughter.) What is the use of being a second "chop" squire? Why, they only laugh at you if you go a hunting with them. (Laughter.) I will tell you a little incident which happened in North Cheshire. There is a cotton-spinner's son who spends 2000*l.* a year; and his mother boasts he is a credit to the family, "for he does keep such excellent company!" (Laughter.) He keeps half-a-dozen hunters, and his mother is delighted at the manner in which he rides in his red coat and top-boots. (Laughter.) Well, he was riding home after the hunt one day in company with a friend of mine who sometimes goes a hunting too (laughter), but keeps his principles with him. They were riding along the road, with a certain lord and a squire, when this young beau, who spends 2000*l.* a year for his mother, said "I think I will go steeple-chase style, over the fields, straight home," and with that put his horse's head through the hedge, and away he went. The lord immediately turned to the squire and said, "Who is that?" "Oh," was the reply of the squire who had helped to spend the 2000*l.* a-year, "it is one of those cotton chaps from the hills." (Great laughter.) Now, if any of your Preston cotton-spinners' sons think they are promoting themselves by going to hunt with, or meeting at parties any of your North Lancashire squires, why let them be quite assured that when their backs are turned, they are just as respectfully spoken of as the young North Cheshire cotton-spinner was. If anybody asks who he is, they won't condescend to know him, even though they have been drinking champagne at his expense, perhaps (laughter); but will say, "It is one of those cotton chaps out of Preston." (Great cheers and laughter.) Now, it is a great mistake for a man ever to attempt to set up for what he is not. (Hear, hear.) He may be somebody while he sticks to what he is; but he can be nothing when he is a sham. (Cheers and laughter.) A cotton-spinner or manufacturer, aye, and a calico-printer (loud cheers), may be somebody, if he stands by his order and does not repudiate himself. We may be somebody, all of us; we are an order, and there is rank and importance to be attached to the order, provided men have self-respect enough to deserve respectability. (Loud cheers.) Why, what is Manchester become? It has become great in the estimation of the world, and of immensely increased importance in the eyes of statesmen and philosophers, within the last 12 or 15 years. Why? Because, during that time Manchester men have set up for themselves. We have our magnificent institutions, our Athenæum, and others of a kindred kind, but they were not erected by the squires. The same men who started and sustained the Anti-Corn-Law League gave Manchester its Athenæum, and other institutions. It is the men who have set up for themselves who have made Manchester something in the eyes of the world; and Preston will be elevated in the eyes of the world, not by men who turn their backs on their order, and won't subscribe to the Anti-Corn-Law League because it is a vulgar body, but by those who stand out in defence of the principles of commercial freedom, and who are not ashamed to stand up for their order and defend it in any society in which they may be placed. (Loud cheers.)

I know it is the opinion of the Lancashire conservatives that Sir Robert Peel will repeal the Corn Laws, and therefore that they need not stir in the matter. Oh! but if I was only Sir Robert Peel, I should not like to have such a party to work for as he has in Lancashire. (Cheers and laughter.) They assume that he is at heart a Free Trader; a man of two views; one public and one private. He is obliged to talk a little of monopoly in public, but in private he is a good Free Trader. (Cheers.) Well, they say he can do it; but how? He has colleagues that won't let him do it. Do you suppose that the Duke of Wellington, the Duke of Buccleuch, Lord Stanley, and Sir Sidney Herbert, are all wanting to repeal the Corn Laws? I suppose the party that follow Sir Robert Peel consider he wants to do it because he will have all the glory; but his colleagues won't let him; they stick by their order; they are not sons of cotton-spinners, as Sir Robert is. How is he to do it? I will tell you. If the Conservative party in Lancashire had joined the League, and said, "We are Conservatives still, but on this question of Free Trade we take a merchant's and manufacturer's view; it affects our interests, and we will go for Free Trade, and when that is carried we will be Conservatives still;" if they had said this, what would have been the effect? Why, Sir Robert Peel would have pointed his colleagues to what was going on in Lancashire, and said, "If we don't give them the repeal of the Corn Law, we shall have no party to support us at all in Lancashire; if you'll let me repeal that law, then I undertake that those men of principle and sturdy independence will be our supporters still; but if not, we can have no party in Lancashire or Yorkshire, and how can any Government go on that has no support in those two important counties?" That would have enabled Peel to dictate to his colleagues. (Loud cheers.) But at present his colleagues in the Cabinet may fairly meet him with the argument that the Conservatives of Lancashire are opposed to Free Trade, and that the League agitation is a movement confined to liberal politicians. If I were Prime Minister, defend me from the Conservatives in Lancashire, for they want Peel to do something, and they won't help him! (Cheers.) Now, if Sir Robert Peel fall by this question—and I predict he will fall by it; nay, he is falling now—if the Cabinet be dissolved, then might be inscribed over his political tomb, 'Died from the imbecility of his party in Lancashire and Yorkshire.' (Loud laughter.) The hon. gentleman resumed his seat amidst loud cheers.

The CHAIRMAN then called upon Mr. BRIGHT, who was received with prolonged cheering, which was very frequently renewed throughout the course of his speech. We have not space, however, for even an outline of his address; but must content ourselves with subjoining an extract or two illustrative of the severe pressure which has already begun its infliction of privations on the working man, and to produce threatening symptoms of speedy commercial stagnation. We find, he said, we are approaching a period of famine, and that there is a very remarkable sensitiveness in trade. The vast industry and commerce of this country, which at one time seemed firmly fixed on a rock, from which nothing could shake it, totters the very moment we approach a period of scarcity. Now, trade is the source of life in this district. Your town would be comparatively a wilderness if no more cotton were to come into it, and your river, about which you are taking so much trouble in order to make Preston a port, might as well be dried up for all purposes of navigation. You bring cotton from the East Indies and America; you work it up into a variety of articles, of which you export some, and some you sell to your countrymen at home. Now it is absolutely necessary that this trade should be extended, or else the prosperity of Preston can by no possibility be preserved. For instance, an increasing population should have an increasing trade, else it must deteriorate in condition. Now Preston has a population of 60,000, and every year there is added to that probably 1000 or 1200; so that the population of 60,000 would be increased twelve months' hence, if from no cause an unusual number leave the town, to 61,000. Of this, 900 at least belong to the class who live by their labour. You see now the necessity there is that between now and twelve months hence there should be such an extension of manufactures and trade as will give the requisite quantity of employment and remuneration to the additional 900. And if that extension do not take place, then those 900 new hands must compete with the population you already have; and the tendency of an increasing population, with an increasing demand for labour, must be to make labour less profitable, and of consequence, reduce wages. (Hear, hear.) How are we to increase it then? Your trade consists partly with your home customers, and partly with your foreign; but at this moment the former is every week being dried up by the Corn Law. There is not a man in Preston who, if he be not a stingy fellow, would not choose to have as good clothing on his back the next six months as during the past six; but at this moment there are thousands and millions in Great Britain and Ireland paying fewer visits to the clothing shops than they paid within the last twelve months. There are being now paid 400,000l. per week more for food than per week six months ago. 400,000l. per week make 20,000,000l. in a year—a sufficient sum to make 20 railroads, each 30 miles in length. (Hear, hear.) Last night I made inquiry at Blackburn, and was told by one person that whereas six months ago he got eight pounds of bread for one shilling, he now only gets five pounds and a quarter; and the quality is not so good, for the wheat this harvest is of inferior quality, and the Corn Law prevents good qualities from coming in to be mixed with it. This is just the same as if when a working man comes in to breakfast, dinner, or tea, and proceeds to cut some slices of bread for his family, he should find that out of three loaves somebody had walked off with one, or more than that, nearly one and a half. (Laughter.) This is not a figure of speech; it is matter of fact. The same party told me that 240 pounds of meal, worth 28s. 6d. or 29s. six months ago, are worth 42s. 6d. now. I don't know whether it would be of use making any argument after such a statement. I advise every working man here to look the first 10 minutes he has to spare through his expenditure, and see what he was paying six months ago and what he is paying now, and he will find that he is actually paying now by the plunder of this mis-called protection to his industry (hear), twice the sum he ever paid in his life per week for the education of his children. (Cheers.)

Mr. Bright then referred to the suffering amongst the working-classes, and the depreciation of property in this town between 1838 and 1842, and continued. In the recurrence to that state of things, it seems to me that Providence in his mercy is bringing before us again some of the awful pictures we lately saw in order to warn us of the risk we run while we thus deliberately violate the plainest law of nature! (Cheers.) During my 18 years' connection with the cotton trade of Lancashire, I have never known a reverse so sudden, and sad, and universal, as has taken place within the last six weeks. I believe there never was anything like it before—certainly nothing like it since the peace. There is no cause for this, I believe, but that which we have assigned, viz., a partial failure of the harvest, and a very serious and almost universal failure in the potato crop. Now how long, think you, will it be ere this stagnant eddy in the commercial world will be felt by the working man? The first effect of a reverse is felt by the hand-loom weavers. There are many such remaining at Burnley; and when there on Monday night, we made some inquiry into their condition, and were told that they are making not more than one-half of what they earned some time ago. (Hear, hear.) But the evil will not stop with them. It did not before; it went on attacking all classes till even the very richest felt themselves on the verge of ruin; and its progress was not staid till after two good harvests, and we had—what I believe we should always have with Free Trade—plenty of provisions at moderate prices. (Hear, and cheers.) Now we are met here not so much for the purpose of denouncing the Corn Law as to devise means for its overthrow. (Cheers.) We have had Cabinet Councils lately to discuss what is to be done if we have famine, and yet what every man looks to is precisely what the Cabinet say they will not do. Possibly they may reconsider their decision. The consumption of potatoes, owing to the farmers being desirous to get rid of them at once lest they rot away altogether, is going on at more than the ordinary rate; and next March or April, probably, people will be wondering if they are to be got at any price. (Hear.) But if the potatoes be gone, are the potato-eaters to be starved? I think not. If the starvation process go on quietly—if one man starve quietly here, and another in Buckinghamshire—Government don't care; but when the people starve, that is a different matter; and he must be a man of harder nerve than Sir Robert Peel or the Duke of Wellington either, who can withstand the clamorous of a people reduced to starvation. (Loud cheers.)

Mr. Bright, on concluding, was greeted with hearty cheering.

Mr. J. LIVESSEY, in proposing the following resolution, said that he was determined to devote all his energies for the next ten weeks to the task of wresting this division of the county from further upholding the Corn Law. It was the determination of the committee to change the register by 3000; they would put on 2000, and put off 1000 (loud cheering); and then they could with confidence go to the poll and return two Free Traders for North Lancashire. He moved "That this meeting, viewing the Corn Law as an act of injustice, is determined to assist, by acquiring county votes, and by every other means within its power, in obtaining its total and immediate repeal."

Mr. G. SMITH seconded the motion, which was then put from the chair, and unanimously carried.

R. SEGAR, Esq., then rose, and was received with cheers. He said—I rise to propose a vote of thanks to Mr. Cobden and Mr. Bright for the very admirable speeches they have made to us to-night, and, although it is not mentioned in the written motion, for the very great services they have rendered to the country during the last five or six years. I don't stand here as a cotton-spinner or manufacturer; my occupation, as a lawyer, consists in protecting honest people, or rather in taking care as far as I can that people behave honestly to each other. (Cheers.) And speaking as a lawyer, I must say that in my judgment the Corn Law is not an honest law. (Loud cheers.) It is no small pride to me, though coming in as I do at the death, to remember that I was one who started with the hounds at first. The repeal of the Corn Law was first proposed at one of our elections, when we had the honour of having that venerable supporter of its repeal, Colonel Thompson, as our candidate. Undoubtedly we have fought the battle here with worse and better success; at present we are triumphant; and triumphant for the borough, we will be triumphant for the county. (Enthusiastic cheers.) I am satisfied that that is a matter not so difficult to accomplish. When you have been told today by persons who have made it a matter of calculation, that Preston alone can win this division of the county to the cause of justice and humanity, is it to be said that Preston is to draw back? (Hear.) If you believe that what you have been told is true, why then a heavy responsibility rests upon you if you fail to discharge the duty. (Hear, hear.) No; Preston stands in a most important position with respect to agriculture, and owes a good deal to it; she gets good hands from the country, a great supply of food, and always near at hand; and certainly I should be the last to advocate this question if it were against the interests of agriculture. (Great cheering.) But it is because the Anti-Corn Law League have already done so much for agriculture that it is beginning to rise in favour with the farmers. (Hear, hear.) Does any man doubt that there would have been such a quantity of food at this moment, if the exertions of the League had not roused the squires to exertion? So far from thinking that the repeal of the Corn Laws will be injurious to the science of agriculture, I am quite satisfied that they are the most grievous bane it has ever had to contend against, and that, until people can turn their attention to what they can best do, and grow best, in the most scientific and abundant manner, it is impossible that it can ever make any progress. (Renewed cheers.) But is it against the landowners? God forbid that the landowners should be the cause of a small quantity of food among the people! (Cheers.) Who will deny that the happiness of the wealthy must be greatly increased by abundance of food, and consequent prosperity of the people? (Hear, hear.) When all can get a comfortable living, how many people will there not be devoted to the arts and all other luxuries and means which gratify the taste of the wealthy? (Hear, hear.) It is really no battle between the agriculturist and manufacturer, but a battle of sound principles against unsound ones—of intelligence, enlightenment, and experience, against prejudice and error—it is a battle, not of classes, but principles. (Loud cheering.)

The motion was seconded by Mr. W. AINSWORTH, and carried by a show of hands.

Mr. COBDEN rose to acknowledge the compliment, and was again hailed with the cheers of the meeting. He said—I cannot help referring to my friend Segar's eloquent speech, and I only wish we heard him oftener. (Cheers.) He has put into a small compass, I think, and in language as beautiful as convincing, the whole of our question, that this is a battle of intelligence against ignorance and prejudice. As regards agriculture, it is a curious fact, that all the best farmers are with us for repeal. I met Lord Ducie at the meeting at Birmingham last week, and he told me an amusing anecdote. His lordship has an annual sale of cattle; well, he had a bull designed for sale, and he says to the bailiff, "I'll call him 'Cobden, the Farmer's Friend.'" (Loud laughter.) And on the day of sale there the animal appeared, with a large label, "COBDEN, THE FARMER'S FRIEND." The bailiff, somewhat dismayed, expostulated. "My lord," said he, "if you sell him with that name, you won't get more than half his price." (Laughter.) "Never mind," replied his lordship, "I'll risk it." Well, the animal was sold, and he brought a capital price, a great deal more than he was worth. (Loud cheers and laughter.) I think, that is an indication at all events, that among intelligent farmers that horror of the Leaguers which they once felt, as if they were going to rush in, and carry off their cattle, is going away.

Mr. R. ASCROFT said—I rise to propose a vote of thanks to the mayor for the use of the rooms, which, on application, he granted at once.

Mr. LIVESSEY, in seconding the motion, said they had been denied the use of the theatre, and afterwards he considered insulted, by its being offered to them at ten guineas, though three guineas was the highest ever charged for other persons. They were determined to stand it no longer. (Cheers.) They never could get a place without asking it as a favour. Both the last and the present mayor had acted with great liberality, but they could not depend upon all future mayors doing the same, and therefore they were determined to build a public hall, to be used for all legal purposes. (Great cheering.) It should be in shares of 5l. He was willing to take twenty shares (cheers), the chairman and others were also willing to take shares; and besides it being a great accommodation to the town, he thought it would not be a bad pecuniary speculation. He begged to second Mr. Ascroft's motion of thanks to the mayor.

Mr. BRIGHT stated that they had built a hall in Rochdale for about 2000l. in 5l. shares, and that it was scarcely a single day unoccupied, and fetched the average rate of interest.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. COBDEN then moved a vote of thanks to the Chairman, and added, we must have North Lancashire so safe as that we shall be able to return two Free Traders—the one a manufacturer and the other a landowner, provided you can find an honest and disinterested politician. For the former, I think you have got a man in Preston who ought to sit in Parliament when the register is finished. (Cheers.) With that hint I beg to conclude, and move a vote of thanks to your chairman. We will give him three cheers for Free Trade, and I'll be the fagman.

The motion was instantly agreed to, and three cheers given in addition for Messrs. Cobden and Bright.

The meeting then broke up.

MR. COBDEN AND THE SIECLE.

Mr. Cobden has addressed the following letter to the editor of the Siecle, in reply to the strictures made by the editor of that paper upon one of his speeches on the export of corn, &c.:

"You will permit me to rectify an error which has crept into one of your last numbers, relative to the views of the Anti-Corn-Law League upon a question of which the importance extends to all Europe, and is still further increased by the difficulties of the moment.

"The incorrectness of the report transmitted to you of one of my recent speeches, delivered in our Free Trade-hall, has influenced your remarks, and induced you to declare that I should accept, favourably, measures tending to restrict the exportation of corn. Nothing in the world is, or can be more repugnant to my opinions and my designs. My conviction, perfectly similar to that which you have yourself so ably expressed, is that the result of such a doctrine, if it was carried out, would be to give the coup de grace to all external trade. If you will allow me the favour, I will avail myself of the present occasion to expose the principles and the motives on which the League is based. The name of the 'Anti-Corn-Law League' seems at first to indicate an association exclusively directed against the landed monopoly. Such is not, however, the real aim of our agitation.

"The League is the apostle of commercial liberty in the vastest and most universal sense of the term. Under our principle are included all classes of produce, natural or manufactured, and we are the adversaries of the protection granted to the silk manufactures as well as the opponents of our laws relative to grain. But we have concentrated our attack upon those laws, because of all monopolies it is that which acts in the most effectual and oppressive manner, and because if we succeed in abolishing it, the landowners, roused by their personal interests, will themselves execute the remainder of the task. They will spare us the labour necessary to bring about the abolition of the other privileges. In a word, monopoly is an immense arch, of which the Corn Law is the key-stone. Detach that key-stone, and the monument will fall by its own weight. I venture to hope that your readers witness with some interest the struggle which we are carrying on, with the object of overthrowing all the barriers which are opposed to the free exchange of the produce of industry. I will here observe, that seven years ago all the members of the League united were scarcely sufficient to fill a very limited space; but that now our principles are supported by the majority of the middle classes, in England, and have found still more numerous defenders in intelligent and enlightened Scotland. I will observe, in conclusion, that our question at present remains suspended over the head of the Government as a problem, the solution of which masters and gods them. This rapid development of public opinion springs from the permanent agitation kept up by the League, and from the discussions of which it has been made the centre. It is too true that our efforts have but little awakened public anxiety abroad, and that because we have carefully kept our acts within the legitimate and strict limits of our internal management. We have done so, and we shall do so still, for we do not think it necessary to the success of our cause to see other nations following our progress step by step. On the contrary, the less nations apply themselves to the negotiation of treaties, and the less they endeavour to stipulate for a certain commercial reciprocity, the more shall we rejoice. The intervention of diplomatists or propagandists awakens susceptibilities and national jealousies, and from that very circumstance retards the spread of the principles of freedom. The true tactics of nations, as of individuals, should be to buy in the lowest and to sell in the dearest market, and that without caring what others may do. And our faith in the truth of our principles is so great, that in our eyes the prosperity which England will enjoy when she shall establish the system of free intercourse will suffice to drag the world in her wake, and to excite in the hearts of civilised nations a sort of rivalry in imitation."

THE SCARCITY IN HOLLAND.—THE HAGUE, Nov. 19.—In the sitting of the Second Chamber of the States General to-day, the project of law for encouraging the importation of provisions was adopted, after a long debate, by a majority of 17 to 5.

LORD JOHN RUSSELL'S LETTER

TO THE ELECTORS OF THE CITY OF LONDON.

GENTLEMEN.—The present state of the country, in regard to its supply of food, cannot be viewed without apprehension. Forethought and bold precaution may avert any serious evils—indecision and procrastination may produce a state of suffering which it is frightful to contemplate.

Three weeks ago it was generally expected that Parliament would be immediately called together. The announcement that Ministers were prepared at that time to advise the Crown to summon Parliament, and to propose on their first meeting a suspension of the import duties on corn, would have caused orders at once to be sent to various ports of Europe and America for the purchase and transmission of grain for the consumption of the United Kingdom. An Order in Council dispensing with the law was neither necessary nor desirable. No party in Parliament would have made itself responsible for the obstruction of a measure so urgent and so beneficial.

The Queen's Ministers have met, and separated, without affording us any promise of such seasonable relief.

It becomes us, therefore, the Queen's subjects, to consider how we can best avert, or at all events mitigate calamities of no ordinary magnitude.

Two evils require your consideration. One of these is the disease in the potatoes, affecting very seriously parts of England and Scotland, and committing fearful ravages in Ireland.

The extent of this evil has not yet been ascertained, and every week, indeed, tends either to reveal unexpected disease, or to abate in some districts the alarm previously entertained. But there is one misfortune peculiar to the failure in this particular crop. The effect of a bad corn harvest is, in the first place, to diminish the supply in the market, and to raise the price. Hence diminished consumption, and the privation of incipient scarcity by which the whole stock is more equally distributed over the year, and the ultimate pressure is greatly mitigated. But the fear of the breaking out of this unknown disease in the potatoes induces the holders to hurry into the market, and thus we have at one and the same time rapid consumption and impending deficiency—scarcity of the article and cheapness of price. The ultimate suffering must thereby be rendered far more severe than it otherwise would be. The evil to which I have adverted may be owing to an adverse season, to a mysterious disease in the potato, to want of science, or of care in propagating the plant. In any of these cases Government is no more subject to blame for the failure of the potato crop than it was entitled to credit for the plentiful corn harvest which we have lately enjoyed.

Another evil, however, under which we are suffering, is the fruit of Ministerial counsel and Parliamentary law. It is the direct consequence of an Act of Parliament, passed three years ago, on the recommendation of the present advisers of the Crown. By this law grain of all kinds has been made subject to very high duties on importation. These duties are so contrived that the worse the quality of the corn the higher is the duty; so that when good wheat rises to 70s. a quarter the average price of all wheat is 57s. or 58s., and the duty 15s. or 14s. a quarter. Thus the corn barometer points to fair, while the ship is bending under a storm.

This defect was pointed out many years ago by writers on the Corn Laws, and was urged upon the attention of the House of Commons when the present Act was under consideration.

But I confess that, on the general subject, my views have in the course of twenty years undergone a great alteration. I used to be of opinion that corn was an exception to the general rules of political economy; but observation and experience have convinced me that we ought to abstain from all interference with the supply of food. Neither a Government nor a legislature can ever regulate the corn markets with the beneficial effects which the entire freedom of sale and purchase are sure of themselves to produce.

I have for several years endeavoured to obtain a compromise on this subject. In 1839 I voted for a committee of the whole House, with the view of supporting the substitution of a moderate fixed duty for the sliding-scale. In 1841 I announced the intention of the then Government of proposing a fixed duty of 8s. a quarter. In the past session I proposed the imposition of some lower duty. These propositions were successively rejected. The present First Lord of the Treasury met them in 1839, 1840, and 1841, by eloquent panegyrics of the existing system—the plenty it had caused, the rural happiness it had diffused. He met the propositions for diminished protection in the same way in which he had met the offer of securities for Protestant interests in 1817 and 1825—in the same way in which he met the proposal to allow Manchester, Leeds, and Birmingham to send members to Parliament in 1830.

The result of resistance to qualified concession must be the same in the present instance as in those I have mentioned. It is no longer worth while to contend for a fixed duty. In 1841 the Free Trade party would have agreed to a duty of 8s. a quarter on wheat, and after a lapse of years this duty might have been further reduced, and ultimately abolished. But the imposition of any duty at present, without a provision for its extinction within a short period, would but prolong a contest already sufficiently fruitful of animosity and discontent. The struggle to make bread scarce and dear, when it is clear that part, at least, of the additional price goes to increase rent, is a struggle deeply injurious to an aristocracy which (this quarrel once removed) is strong in property, strong in the construction of our legislature, strong in opinion, strong in ancient associations, and the memory of immortal services.

Let us, then, unite to put an end to a system which has been proved to be the blight of commerce, the leave of agriculture, the source of bitter divisions among classes, the cause of penury, fever, mortality, and crime among the people.

But if this end is to be achieved, it must be gained by the unequivocal expression of the public voice. It is not to be denied that many elections for cities and towns in 1841, and some in 1845, appear to favour the assertion that Free Trade is not popular with the great mass of the community. The Government appear to be waiting for some excuse to give up the present Corn Law. Let the people, by petition, by address, by remonstrance, afford them the excuse they seek. Let the Ministry propose such a revision of the taxes as in their opinion may render the public burdens more just and more equal; let them add any other provisions which caution and even scrupulous forbearance may suggest; but let the removal of restrictions on the admission of the main articles of food and clothing used by the mass of the people be required, in plain terms, as useful to all great interests, and indispensable to the progress of the nation.

I have the honour to be, Gentlemen,

Your obedient servant,

Edinburgh, Nov. 22, 1845.

J. RUSSELL.

LORD MORPETH'S LETTER TO EDWARD BAINES, JUN.

Castle Howard, Nov. 24, 1845.

My dear Mr. Baines,—I perceive that you are about to have a meeting at Leeds to promote the qualification of electors, with a view to further the objects of the Anti-Corn-Law League.

You will probably remember being present upon an occasion when, amidst very strong surrounding inducement, I forebore from pledging myself to the entire extent of those objects. All that has since intervened, all especially that is now occurring, a fellow feeling with my old friends in the riding (although I less than ever anticipate any probable renewal of a political connection between us), and a sense of what has been effected by the Anti-Corn-Law League to advance their great end, alike combine to put an end to all further doubt or reserve on my own part, and I write this without concert or consultation with any one else. The contribution I enclose for your immediate purposes is of very trifling amount; it would not be easy to foresee what calls may not be made upon any of us in the course of the ensuing year; but I wish to record in the most emphatic way I can my conviction that the time is come for a final repeal of the Corn Laws, and my protest against the continued inaction of the state in the present emergency.

Believe me, dear Mr. Baines, yours very faithfully,

Edward Baines, jun., Esq.

MORPETH.

THE MANCHESTER DEPUTATION AND THE PREMIER.—On Monday last the deputation from the borough meeting of the preceding Thursday, consisting of W. B. Watkins, Esq. mayor of Manchester; Mark Phillips, Esq. M.P.; Joseph Brotherton, Esq. M.P.; R. H. Greg, Esq. and Mr. Alderman Kay, had an interview of half an hour's duration with Sir Robert Peel, who received them very courteously. The mayor read the memorial, to which the Premier seemed to pay great attention. Sir Robert Peel afterwards conversed with the deputation on the condition of the potato crop, the state of trade, &c. The right hon. baronet said that he hoped the deputation would excuse him expressing any opinion, but that he would communicate to his colleagues what had taken place. The interview then terminated.

FREEDOMERS' BUILDING SOCIETY.—Meetings to promote the objects of this society will be held in Failsworth next Wednesday; in Bury on Thursday; and in Farnworth on Friday. We are glad to see the spirit with which its operations are carried on, and have no doubt that it will speedily be recognised as a great fact.

OPENING OF THE PORTS.

MANCHESTER.

MEETING OF THE WORKING-CLASSES.—At a preliminary meeting of the working classes, held at the King Inn, Oldham-street, Manchester, yesterday evening, Nov. 21, the following resolutions were unanimously adopted:—

"That it is the opinion of this meeting that, in consequence of the great distress which now prevails amongst the working-classes, owing to the failure of the crops and the still greater privations that are likely to occur, the working-classes are loudly called upon, and are in duty bound, to use all their efforts to make known their awful condition to her Majesty's ministers, that some measure may be adopted to relieve them.

"That, in the opinion of this meeting, some speedy mode of relief should be proposed to her Majesty's Government, and no method appears to us more practicable than that of opening the ports of Great Britain and Ireland to receive foreign corn free of duty.

"That this meeting pledges itself to use every legal effort in its power to call a public meeting for the purpose of forwarding to her Majesty's government the opinion entertained in the above resolutions."—Manchester Times.

BOLTON.

(Abridged from the Bolton Free Press.)

An adjourned meeting was held on Friday evening in the Temperance Hall, Little Bolton. Before eight o'clock the hall was completely filled, including the galleries, aisles, and every other available place, so that at least there would be upwards of 2000 persons present.

The MAYOR took the chair and said, on his way to the meeting a person had presented to him a note from Peter Ainsworth, Esq., M.P., and which, with their permission, he would read to them. The note was then read and it stated that, on his arrival at home from the meeting held in the forenoon, he found some friends from a considerable distance, and regretted he could not be present. He requested the Mayor, however, to state to the meeting that he fully concurred in the views of the requisitionists, and believed that, on account of the failure in the potato crop, and the deficiency in grain, her Majesty's Government ought, for the welfare of the nation, to open the ports. The Mayor then added that he should be glad to hear any remarks upon the subject, and hoped the speakers would confine themselves to the particular objects they were met to consider.

HENRY ASHWORTH, Esq., was received with loud and continued cheering. As soon as it had subsided, he proceeded to say that they had heard the object for which they were met, and he rose to propose a resolution in accordance with that object, namely—"That this meeting views with feelings of alarm the deficiency of the harvest, and the failure of the potato crops in many parts of Great Britain and Ireland, and which produce the greatest apprehension among all classes of the community, and imperatively require the consideration of her Majesty's Government." After some introductory remarks, Mr. Ashworth proceeded to show how the present state of the country was likely to affect the condition of the industrious working classes. It was obvious he said, that if the wishes and desires of the people were complied with, it must be through the pressure from without. With regard to the present question, as to a scarcity of wheat, it might be inferred from its present price. A short time ago it was 45s., and now it was 65s.; or in other words, bread that was 4½d. for the lb. loaf was now 6½d. (Hear, hear.) Oatmeal and other provisions had risen to a greater or less extent, and if these high prices continued, the pressure would increase and be unavoidably productive of distress and misery. Although they were supposed to live by the sweat of their brow, still seasons and times would overtake them when it would become their duty to exercise discretion, and adopt some plan whereby they could procure a sufficiency of food from other sources; and, he believed, the present was an occasion when they were called upon to do so. It was not only a duty they owed to those there, but to those living around them, and trusted they would give such a measure that support this evening which it really and truly merited. As a Christian duty they were called upon to support this measure; but he would not enter upon that point, as others would succeed him in speaking, who would, no doubt, dwell upon it in a more able manner; he would, however, address a few observations to them in a civil and social point of view. He had told them of the difference between the price of bread now and a short time ago. That morning he had had placed in his hands, by some of his workpeople, a statement of the difference between the cost of bread to their families now and a short time ago; and out of the number he had selected four families, which would be about an average. These four had about thirty-four members in their families, taking them together, and he found the increase amounted to from 5s. 6d. to 7s. 1½d. per week—or, in other words, rather more than an increase of a penny a day for each individual, young and old. Now, in the borough of Bolton there were about, he would say, at least 50,000 individuals, and taking the locality round about, there would be 50,000 more. Supposing them to be all as well fed as his own workpeople (which he trusted they were), 100,000 persons, at a penny a day of a sacrifice, in Bolton and its locality alone, would, from the present increase in the price of grain, amount to £3000 this week, as compared with its late price. (Hear.) This, he conceived, was entirely given away by the community here to persons with whom they had no direct interest—for the corn was not grown at our own doors. The shopkeepers might suppose that it did not affect them, but they were mistaken; for the money passed through the hands of the shopkeepers, and milliners, and provision dealers. The shopkeepers might fancy their condition improved by the large stream of money passing through their hands; but they would find out that, although the money did come in greater supply, they got no more by a loaf of flour sold at 6s. than one at 4s. (Hear, hear, hear.) And then, if more money was paid to the flour-dealer, of course the tailor, the grocer, and other tradesmen must necessarily receive less; for it was impossible that a man could pay his money twice over; if it was spent in food it could not go in clothing. This was the state of the question as regarded the shopkeepers. A short time ago there was a disposition amongst the assistants in shops to have their hours of labour shortened, and he was glad to witness that spirit, because it denoted that their labours were too great; but what would be the case if bread were dear? Their labours would be lightened—the shops would be kept open till a later hour—less assistance would be required, and probably one-half of them would be discharged. Then, if the shopkeepers cannot sell, they will not buy; the merchants in Manchester will not buy of us, and the result will be, that there must either be less employment, or they must stock their warehouses with the goods. The revolution then would fall upon the operatives—buyers would cease, sellers would cease, and trade become as stagnant as it had been of old. The next question was, could a sufficient quantity of grain be imported? He had told them before that other countries were scraping together as much food as possible, and it would appear, therefore, that we were left to our own resources. But America was stored with grain, and if it was only a small amount that they imported it would tend to lessen the price. Instead of creating a rise, at all events, by opening the ports, they would have it at the common price of the world, and if so they would have no cause to murmur. (Applause.) He was happy to congratulate them on the willingness which had been manifested in various towns, by bodies corporate and other authorities, to obtain such a desirable object, and was glad that Bolton was likely to be as prominent as the rest. After alluding to the memorial of the spinners' association, which appeared in the Guardian of Wednesday last, he proceeded to say that it was an enlightened document, and reflected the highest credit upon them as a body of operatives. He then referred to the periods from 1838 to 1842, and compared it with the period from 1842 to 1845. In the former period, about 1000 houses were empty in the borough, in one year, and there was a scarcity of employment—machinery remaining idle; but in the latter period wages rose, and, instead of persons being idle, a sufficient number could not be procured—the town became prosperous—and what was a singular fact, during an entire year, in Little Bolton, no poor-rate was required. Food was cheap when wages were high, and dear during the period of depression; rates were also from two to threefold more, and soup kitchens and other plans had been resorted to to keep the people from actual starvation. It was a strange coincidence, but it was a fact, that good and bad times had always been according as food was dear or cheap. After alluding to the pain it caused him to see a person in the humiliating position of distress, and the awful effects it had in producing crime, he concluded by moving the resolution, amidst loud repeated cheering.

C. J. DARDISHIRE, Esq., was received with applause. He had great satisfaction in seconding the resolution proposed by Mr. Ashworth. He congratulated the meeting upon the numbers and earnestness with which they had assembled, to testify their sense of present responsibilities and the duties they imposed, and after explaining the absurdity and danger of delay in providing for such an awful emergency by immediately opening the ports, sat down amidst general applause.

The resolution was carried unanimously amidst much cheering.

THOMAS THOMASSON, Esq., rose to move the next resolution, which was as follows:—"That this meeting has, by painful experience, been taught that the prosperity of all classes depends mainly on the price of food; that an abundant and cheap supply of the necessaries of life has always been coincident with increased employment and a higher rate of wages, whilst dearth and scarcity have been attended with diminished demand for labour, and a reduction in the earnings of the working classes." He was much pleased in the morning of that day at the meeting at the police-office, to hear a working man, in offering reasons for adjourning the meeting, say, "This is our question more so than yours" (employers). Mr. Ashworth had clearly shown them that it was a working man's question; and without any reference whatever to Mr. Ashworth's statement of the case, he (Mr. Thomasson) had made a calculation as to the probable increase paid by inhabitants of Bolton for food, and he had come to the conclusion that at least 2500*l.* a week more was spent in food than was spent for the same purpose a few months ago. Now, they were all working as hard now as a few months since, and at the same rate of wages, but their food cost them more by that amount each week than at the period alluded to. If their employers had reduced their wages that much, they would have made a pretty noise. (Laughter, and hear, hear.) It would be a very useful subject to consider as to who pocketed the difference. He would have them not to depend on anybody's statement, but make due inquiry for themselves. Let them make calculations, and ask their wives at home how much more was paid for flour, oatmeal, &c., than was paid three or four months since? Now, that 2500*l.* was a mighty sum if it was properly examined. As an illustration he would give them an instance. In his new mill about 250*l.* a week were paid in wages. Now it would take ten such mills as that to pay in wages the amount which they now paid in food in addition to what they paid a few months since. Such was the effect produced by the late advance in the prices of food. It was tantamount to workpeople being employed at ten mills all the week for nothing. Now, as to the food, there was always enough in the world for the people, but sometimes it happened to be in one place and the mouths in another, and since they could not take the mouths to the food, it was requisite that the food be brought to the mouths. (Hear, hear.) He compared this country to a union workhouse, wherein there were 28,000,000 of persons—the landowners representing the board of guardians, and Sir Robert Peel the governor. The avowed object of Sir Robert Peel in introducing the present Corn Law—for, with all due reference to the opinions of others, he must say this was a Corn Law question—was, to provide such a supply of food for the inmates of the bastille, as should be indicated by 5*s.* to 58*s.* per quarter as the price of wheat. Then came the question—how far were they disposed to consent to that arrangement? Mr. Ashworth had shown them the distressed state of the country four years since, the great prosperity that had since taken place with low prices of grain, and the dangers that now threatened to meet them with high prices. Other countries were resorting to America for supplies of food, and it now seemed scarcely probable that we should get any were we to go for it; but at all events whether was it better to run the risk or not? The question why are the ports shut? might be very properly offered to any one inquiring, why should they be opened? He was very much amused the other day by the collective wisdom of this borough. It had been said all men were for themselves; that working men did all they could to secure to themselves good wages, and that bleachers had a combination for the upholding of prices. That was said to justify the landowners in keeping up the prices of food. But whoever heard of bleachers applying for an Act of Parliament to keep up the prices of bleaching? And when the hand-loom weavers applied to Parliament to have a fixed rate of wages, they were told, in a pitiable manner, that Government could not fix the rate of wages. Now, if they could not fix the rate of wages, why should they try to fix the price of food? It had been said that Corn Laws had been in existence for 300 years, and it appeared that because such was the case, it was expected that we were to be troubled with them to the end of the chapter. (Laughter.) Now, supposing if, in going along the street, a person met with a fellow-townsmen rolling along in his carriage, but who unfortunately had a wooden leg, or one similarly circumstanced but blind of an eye, would he say what a fine thing it was to have a wooden leg, or that it was a capital thing to be blind of an eye? (Laughter.) Now, inasmuch as the persons alluded to had been prosperous through industry and perseverance, but had the misfortunes described, so it appeared were Englishmen to be saddled with Corn Laws hereafter, because they had, through an energetic application of their industry, prospered, notwithstanding these laws had existed for 300 years. But some seemed scarcely to think that there was anything amiss—that there was no scarcity at all. It was said that railways, to the amount of certain large sums, had been projected, and that over speculation was the cause of the stagnation now in the country. Now, admitting that persons had brought distress upon themselves by railway speculation, was that any reason why the working man who did not speculate, but who minded his business the whole of the day, should pay more than a natural price for his food? (Hear, hear.) He (Mr. Thomasson), speaking of wages, said as an employer, he found profits greater, as well as the workman his wages higher, when the price of food was low—when the operatives were boldly asking for advanced wages, and the employers durst not refuse them, lest they might be stopped. But, on the other hand, when the prices of food were depriving the workman of gaining a comfortable livelihood, he was then humble indeed, expecting a reduction in his wages, and afterwards patiently submitting to the same. Then he could tell them that his (Mr. Thomasson's) profits, as an employer, had fallen off. There was no mistake about that; it was clear enough to him. (Hear, hear.) He should suppose they would not hear any more of cheap food meaning low wages, at all events. Now, there was the working man's short time agitation, in which he sympathised with them, though, perhaps, he did not agree with them as to the mode of gaining their object. That would be affected by the price of food. He thought agitation would be less when the hands began to work eight or six hours per day, and whatever opinions other men might have, these were their prospects now. His opinion was decided; for he did not think, if the ports were opened to-morrow, the evil would be fully overcome. Any man, who would take the pains to examine for himself, could not fail to be alarmed. But admitting, as some might suppose, that there was some doubt whether scarcity existed, why, they could not fill a bucket more than full of water, and if we did not want the food it would not come. That was all. There was no damage done. He did not wish to enter into the question as to whether the ports having been once opened, they would afterwards be shut, but let them once be opened, and who would try to shut them again? (Applause.)

MARTIN CUREY, a working mechanic, appeared on the platform, and said he felt a deep interest in the question of opening the ports. In 1842 he was out of employment by the bad times, and had to go from this to his native town of Knaresborough. Wheat was then selling in that market at 10*s.* a bushel, that was 80*s.* a quarter—a pretty price for a man out of work to pay. (Laughter and applause.) For his part, from his experience, he should always support "Free Trade and no Corn Laws." (Loud applause.) Three weeks since he had been obliged to be in the same neighbourhood again. He found when he got home here that something had been said in the town council of this borough about the Corn Law for the benefit of the farmer and the farm labourer. He would tell that councillor what he (the speaker) has found at Martin-le-Moor, in Yorkshire. He found a labouring man who had hired from Martinmas to Martinmas, as they call it, and what was that man's wages? Mind, the Corn Laws were passed to keep up that man's wages. His master gave him 9*l.* a year, or 3*s.* 5*d.* a week. That man was 22 or 23 years of age, he ploughed, he sowed, he mowed, he reaped, he reared, he thrashed, and he did all sorts of laborious work for those wages, and yet he was told he was a protected labourer. (Much laughter.) He was stating nothing but what he could prove, the man's master was a relation of his, being his wife's half-cousin. (Renewed laughter.) Well, they went to look round the farm, and then they came back. (Laughter.) Well, they must come back (laughter), and when they got back he found a man there who used to live at Bolton, but who had now an estate in that district, and they began to talk about the Corn Law and about the harvest. The farmer said, this year his sheaves yielded from one-third to one quarter less of wheat than they did last year. (Hear, hear, hear.) He helped them to thrash, and they must know that in thrashing they made the wheat into three sorts of grain for food, and the third was the commonest kind of all, and upon that the servants and labourers lived. They must recollect he had told them that the man's wages were only 3*s.* 5*d.* a week, and all his food came out of his master's stores; the man had neither tea nor coffee, and it would be quite sufficient to reckon the cost of his maintenance at 4*s.* 6*d.* a week. Now taking 3*s.* 6*d.* his wages, and 4*s.* 6*d.* the cost of his food, they found a strong labouring man receiving no more than 8*s.* a week in an agricultural district. And what was the first news he heard when he returned? A person reading a newspaper, in which a respectable man, a member of the Town Council, was set down as saying that the Corn Laws were passed for the benefit of the farmer and farm labourer. Having a knowledge of both parties, he would tell that man that he lied. (Much laughter and applause.) The Corn Law neither benefited the agricultural nor the manufacturing labourer. He expected to have seen Mr. Ainsworth there to night. "Mr. Ainsworth," said the speaker, "should have been her. (Much laughter.) We are on the eve of an election, and when it happens, I warrant he'll come to see me (laughter and cheers), and all I can say, he ought to have been here."

The Mayor: The motion was then put and carried.

Mr. P. R. ARROWSMITH rose, and was received with much cheering, to move the next resolution, as follows:—"That the recollection of the calamities which afflicted this borough and the whole country during the period of high prices of food from 1838 to 1842, renders it impossible to contemplate the recurrence of a similar state of suffering without intense anxiety and alarm, and, fearing a recurrence of those sufferings, this meeting considers it the duty of Government to open the ports for the free admission of all kinds of food; that this remedy, to be effectual must be applied immediately, and this urges the imperative necessity of doing it without delay, by means of an Order in Council, feeling assured that such a measure, dictated alike by prudence, justice, and humanity, would have the sanction of Parliament and the enthusiastic approval of the nation." He noticed the distressed condition of this town during the period referred to in the resolution, and asked them whether they wished to see Bolton again in a state of siege, with the army of famine surrounding it—its 1,500 empty houses—its workshops and mills shut up, and the working people paupers and beggars in the streets—and a repetition of those riots, which, thanks to the local magistrates, had passed off without bloodshed. (Hear, hear, and applause.) Famine would be followed, as it always was, by plague and pestilence (Hear, hear.) They always marched together. Let them ask any medical man, and he would tell them they were inseparable companions. The last speaker had alluded to the state of pauperism in 1843. It would not be difficult to account for what seemed to him to be a contradiction. He contrasted the pauperism of 1839 and 1843. Now they would recollect that from 1838 to 1842 were years of scarcity, and the price of food was high. It would not so much appear in the first year as in the last. There was a spirit in Englishmen which led them to endure great privations before they would resort to the parish for relief; they would first sell their decorative articles of furniture, then articles of necessity, and next clothing, before they would apply for relief; and when such families were reduced to pauperism, it required a long time before they could recover the position from which they had been driven. Alluding to the working of the present sliding-scale, he showed that while the average price of wheat was about 63*s.*, really good wheat was fetching 80*s.* a quarter, while that which was unsound, and unfit for human food, was only selling for about 46*s.* a quarter, and this, keeping down the averages, maintained an excessive duty—being even now 14*s.* a quarter—and prevented the importation of foreign corn. Noticing some assertions made in the Town Council, with respect to the productions of the present harvest, he quoted the Mark Lane Express, the organ of the farmers and monopolists, which distinctly stated that the late harvest in this country was deficient both in quality and quantity. He concluded by a powerful description of the responsibilities of Sir Robert Peel and Government, under present circumstances, and said, that whether they considered the question as public men or private individuals, as Christians, as employers or employed, as working men or as capitalists, there was nothing but Free Trade that would place them in their right position, and give peace and plenty to the land. (Much applause.)

Mr. ROBERT BLINKHORN said that a tax on bread was the devil's tax, but he was not only for doing away with that tax, but for putting working men upon the land that they might earn their own bread. He agreed with what Mr. Arrowsmith had said about persons selling their furniture before they would become paupers. In the late bad times he had disposed of about £80 worth, and had not yet been able to be as comfortable as he was before. He said let them have Free Trade and the land, and then they could all shake hands together. (Laughter and cheers.)

Mr. EDMUND ASHWORTH rose to second the resolution amidst applause. He ably, and to the meeting, most satisfactorily replied to the land and foreign trade notions advanced by some of the speakers; but our space forbids us giving even an outline of his excellent address.

Carried unanimously. (Loud applause.)

Mr. JOHN DEAN moved—

"That a memorial, founded upon the above resolutions, be adopted by this meeting, signed by the chairman on behalf of the meeting, and forwarded forthwith for presentation."

Mr. JAMES MORRIS seconded the resolution.

Mr. JAMES PARKINSON moved an amendment to the effect that it was the opinion of the meeting that the arguments which applied to the opening of the ports temporarily, for the free admission of grain, proved the necessity and advantage of the total extinction of all restrictions upon the food of the people. (Cheers.)

The Mayor, after examining the amendment, said it did not come within the scope of the requisition, and he should request that it might not be pressed.

Mr. PARKINSON said, having asserted the principle, he would withdraw the amendment. (Much applause.)

The meeting after returning thanks to the Mayor broke up.

There was also a meeting of the Town Council of Bolton, on Wednesday, which is the more remarkable, as the bulk of the members are Conservatives, but so strong is the public feeling at Bolton, we are informed, that they felt themselves obliged, though reluctantly, to go with it. They adopted the memorial unanimously.

ASHTON-UNDER-LYNE.

In pursuance of a requisition, numerous and respectfully signed, a public meeting, convened by the Mayor of the borough, was held on Wednesday evening, at eight o'clock in the Town Hall of Ashton-under-Lyne, "to take into consideration the propriety of memorializing her Majesty's government in favour of opening the ports for the free admission of grain and all other kinds of provisions, to avert the calamities likely to arise from the scarcity of food, owing to the failure of the potatoe crop, and the defective quality of the wheat harvest." Every seat in the large hall was occupied for several minutes before the appointed hour, no less than 1,500 persons being present when the mayor, John Mellor, Esq., entered and took the chair.

On the platform we perceived, on either hand of the chairman, Abel Buckley, Esq., Samuel Higginbotham, Esq., James Lord, Esq., John Whittaker, Esq., Alfred Reyner, Esq., Nathan Lees, Esq., George Higginbotham, Esq., Frederick Reyner, Esq., Thomas Mason, Esq., Henry Lees, Esq., Ralph Kershaw, Esq., J. H. Southam, Esq., B. M. Kenworthy, Esq., Hugh Mason, Esq., Nathaniel Buckley, Esq., William Henry Sutcliffe, Esq., J. R. Coulthurst, Esq., Henry Gartside, Esq., Booth Mason, Esq., James S. Buckley, Esq., Samuel Earnshaw, Esq., Dr. Campbell, William Redfern, Esq., Joseph Fletcher, Esq., Edward Hyde, Esq. The meeting was not confined to party, the mayor and many of the gentlemen around him being of conservative politics, and supporters of the present government; and some of the resolutions which were adopted being proposed, and others seconded, by conservatives.

The CHAIRMAN, on opening the proceedings of the evening, observed that he was present on that occasion simply in his official capacity. He would therefore abstain from any expressions of his own opinion, and felt satisfied that those then assembled before him would give him during the evening's proceedings all proper support, and that each speaker would, in addressing him, confine himself to the specific business of the meeting. (Hear, hear.) He hoped, also, that they would maintain order in all their proceedings, and that harmony and regularity would prevail amongst them. (Hear, hear.) He would now call upon Mr. Buckley to move the first resolution.

Mr. ABEL BUCKLEY, on moving the resolution, observed that as there were others present who would address the meeting at some length on the subject which had called them together, he would content himself by simply moving the resolution, which was as follows:—"That the deficiency of the harvest, and the failure of the potato crop in many parts of the United Kingdom, have produced the utmost apprehension among all classes of the community, and are circumstances imperatively requiring the immediate consideration of her Majesty's government."

Mr. ALFRED REYNER seconded the resolution. The country, he said, had arrived at a crisis of a most momentous character. A great advance had suddenly and universally taken place in the price of provisions, and there was no man before him, especially if he had a family to support, who had not already grievously experienced the ill consequences of this rise in prices. Within the last eight or ten weeks the price of food had risen on an average certainly not less than 50 per cent. (Hear.) This was assuredly a matter of the most serious consideration. The man who had before to lay out but 16s. a week for food for himself and family, had now no less than 24s. before he could procure the same amount as before of the necessities of life. (Hear, hear, hear.) The extra 8s. which it was now necessary for him to expend for provisions were formerly laid out in the purchase of clothing and other comforts, but as this weekly sum was now otherwise absorbed, the state of the cloth trade must necessarily suffer, and to an extent which they were not yet willing to anticipate. Within the last few weeks there had been a great diminution in the production of yarn and cloths, together with a very serious falling off in the prices of such as had been sold. (Hear, hear.) There was not a manufacturer in the district who did not suffer from this state of things, and it was impossible for the manufacturers to be seriously injured without the operatives suffering along with them. (Hear, hear.) In the concern with which he himself was connected, the falling off in prices would occasion a difference in their yearly receipts of about £8,000. This was but a single instance of the injury which the present rise in prices was effecting on all hands, and which would continue to increase until the price of food was lowered by the opening of the ports. (Hear, hear, hear.) Unless the ports were opened, the condition of the country during the coming winter would be such as it was perfectly frightful to contemplate. He now begged to second the resolution.

The resolution was then put from the chair, and unanimously carried.

Mr. JOHN WHITTAKER, on moving the second resolution, said that he was still, as he had long been, a strenuous opponent of the Corn Laws, belonging, as he did, to a party, though not a political party, which opposed, not only those laws, but all other laws which restricted the free importation of food. (Hear, hear.) He would now earnestly call upon the Government, considering the present gloomy state of the country, to suspend the Corn Laws at once, and to throw the ports immediately open, so as to admit into the country, during the coming scarcity, all kinds of food duty free. (Hear, hear.) It was a pleasure to him, on so important an occasion, to see gentlemen, differing from himself in political sentiments, coming forward to take an active part in the proceedings of the evening. (Hear, hear, hear.) Their so doing showed that the case was one of great necessity, and one involving the most important interests of the community. (Hear, hear.) He hoped that similar demonstrations, independent of all party considerations, would take place immediately throughout the country, certain as he was that if such were the case the eyes of the government would be speedily opened to the real nature of its duty, and to the extent of its present responsibility. The resolution which he was called upon to propose was as follows:—"That the recollection of the calamity which afflicted this district and the whole country during the period of high prices of food from 1838 to 1842, renders it impossible to contemplate the recurrence of a similar state of suffering without intense anxiety and alarm." During the period referred to in the resolution, they all knew that property had sunk in value 30, 40, and in some instances 50 per cent., and that, in many instances, the property of the tradesman, which he had accumulated by his labour, was brought to the hammer and sacrificed, because he was unable to bear up against the pressure. Working men, generally, perhaps, had no property to lose, but they had that to lose which to them was of as great value as was property to others,—their labour. (Hear, hear.) From 1838 to 1842, in Ashton-under-Lyne, and in all the towns around it, three or four days in the week was the utmost time for which the mills were at work. At that disastrous time there were hundreds in that very parish who had to part with their furniture, even with the most necessary portion of it, in order to procure the means by which to purchase the necessities of life. But why should he dwell upon the miseries of that period—miseries which were so generally shared, and which were yet so fresh in the recollection of every one before him? A recurrence of those miseries was now to be apprehended. It might be said that as yet the exigency was not so great as it was then, but they had every reason to fear that a storm was gathering on them, which, when it burst in all its fury, would reduce the country to greater straits than before. (Hear, hear.) They were already familiar with some of the indications of coming disaster. The price of provisions had greatly risen throughout the length and the breadth of the land. The wheat harvest was deficient, and the potato crop had almost perished. Potatoes, which could have been purchased in Manchester for five or six shillings a load a short time ago, could not now be procured for less than eight shillings, and even then about one-third of them turned out to be bad. (Hear, hear.) If this were the case now, what might they not expect after Christmas? What would be the result of all this upon the manufacturing industry of their country? (Hear, hear.) Even already had the employers of Bolton met to consider the propriety of going into short time, and if they should throw themselves upon short time at Bolton, it would not be long ere their example would be followed at Manchester, and it followed there, it would soon be felt and acted upon at Ashton, and in all the surrounding towns. (Hear, hear.) Under these circumstances, what should they do? They should do precisely what many other towns had done, and which he trusted every important town in the kingdom would speedily do—they should memorialize Sir R. Peel and her Majesty's government to throw the ports open at once; and if the people were firm and true to themselves during the approaching crisis, the day was certainly near at hand when plenty would again smile upon them, and when regularity in the supply of so important a commodity as the people's food, would succeed the precarious mode in which it was at present secured.

Mr. HUGH MASON, on seconding the resolution, congratulated the Mayor of the borough on his presiding over such a meeting as was then assembled, and more especially when he remembered that he was a Mayor of Conservative politics, (hear, hear,) and also when he saw around their chief magistrate, as he then did, both on the platform and in the body of the meeting, many gentlemen of the same political creed as their chairman entertained. (Hear, hear.) It gladdened one's heart thus to see men casting aside all the trammels of party, and, at the call of their common humanity, and when the interests of their common country were at stake, coming forward to join heart and hand for the purpose of relieving the sufferings of the people. (Hear, hear, hear.) It could not be said that this was a question which only affected a class—it could not be said of it, as it had been said of other questions, that it was a manufacturers' question. (Hear, hear.) No, it was a question which equally affected the manufacturer and the operative—it was a question which came home to all—it was a bread-and-cheese question, a knife-and-fork question, and one which came home to the doors of all. (Hear, hear.) The Manchester operative spinners had already taken up the subject, and had sent forward a forcible representation of the prospects of the country, and a request to the Government that they would open the ports, in order to provide the people with a sufficient supply of food. (Hear, hear.) He had great pleasure in seconding the resolution.

The resolution was then put, and carried unanimously.

Mr. S. HIGGINBOTHAM proposed the next resolution, which was, that the immediate opening of the ports, for the free admission of grain and all other kinds of provisions, is a measure obviously required to prevent a serious revulsion of trade, and consequent grievous suffering to the whole of our industrious population.

Mr. T. MASON seconded the resolution, which was carried with acclamation.

Mr. L. KERSHAW proposed the next resolution, which was, "That the meeting earnestly and respectfully called on her Majesty's ministers to suspend immediately all laws which restricted the admission of grain, and other provisions, into the ports of the empire."

Mr. F. REYNER seconded the resolution, which was carried unanimously.

Mr. G. HIGGINBOTHAM moved the adoption of the memorial, and referred to a report which he and some others had drawn up, showing the wretched state of the inhabitants of that town during the years 1841 to 1842, and warned the Government against the danger of allowing a like state of things to arise again. They had, he believed, heard a fact which would show in a most striking light the state of the manufacturing districts, namely, that a meeting of the cotton spinners of Bolton had recently taken place for the purpose of taking into consideration the propriety of working short time. (Hear, hear.) To return to the subject of provisions, he should remark, that any one who was acquainted with the markets of Manchester five weeks ago, and had been absent during the intermediate time, could scarcely credit the change which had taken place in that period in the markets. The depreciation was so great, that a gentleman, upon whose word he placed the greatest reliance, assured him that cloth could be purchased in Manchester at the same price for which it was sold in 1842, and every one present who was acquainted with the state of Manchester could, he believed, bear out that statement. (Hear.) The manufacturing districts were threatened with a period of great difficulty, and there was no hope for them, unless in the repeal of the laws which increased the price of provisions. (Cheers.)—Since 1819, up to the present time, the changes from cheap to high prices of food occurred at intervals, and always produced the most serious depreciation of trade; and he was convinced, from his experience, that an alteration in the laws, which should enable the people to obtain cheap food, would be the salvation of the country. (Cheers.) He concluded by moving the adoption of the memorial by the meeting.

M. C. H. LEES seconded the resolution, which was unanimously agreed to.

Mr. B. MASON, the vice-president of the Conservative Association of Leeds, came forward to move the next resolution. He said that it afforded him the highest gratification to see men of every political opinion united at that meeting, and to see that it was altogether devoid of every party tinge. (Cheers.) At a period when they saw several millions of their fellow-countrymen in danger of starvation, they surely ought to forget all party squabbles, and do their duty to their fellow-countrymen, by expressing their opinion of the danger which was to be apprehended in the present state of things; to declare that, in consequence of the failure of the potato crop, and a deficiency in the harvest, there could not be enough of food in the country for the winter's consumption, whilst the government calmly contemplated the dilemma, without making any exertion to avert the threatened evil. (Hear, hear, hear.) It was time that they told the government a little independent truth; (cheers;) that they were the servants of the public; (cheers;) that the people of England paid them their wages for governing the country, (cheers,) and that they had now a noble opportunity of doing their duty. (Hear, hear, hear.) If Sir Robert Peel was too aristocratic for the consideration of such matters as potatoes, or the people, let him remember that his father was a cotton spinner, and that he owed his position as much to the wealth which his father acquired by his dealing in cotton as to his own abilities. He knew very well how galling it must be to the aristocracy to have for their master the son of a cotton-spinner, [hear, hear.] They were compelled to take him for their leader, and submit to his behests, because they could not find a man in their own ranks with capacity or experience enough either to form a cabinet, or to carry a bill through Parliament [hear, hear.] He believed that Sir R. Peel was anxious, if it were in his power, to do justice to the people of England. He believed that the Premier was only waiting for a demonstration of popular opinion on this question of food intelligible enough to convince even the Iron Duke, and powerful enough to relieve himself from individual responsibility. Let them, then, cordially unite, confident as they were that their co-operation in this great matter was only what the Premier required and was waiting for, in order to take those steps by which alone hunger and starvation could be driven from their homes during the gloom and desolation of winter. He would now move the resolution, which was as follows:—"That the following gentlemen be appointed a deputation to wait upon Sir Robert Peel, for the purpose of presenting the memorial this day adopted, namely, the Mayor, Abel Buckley, Esq., Samuel Heginbotham, Esq., and John Whittaker, Esq."

Mr. W. HIGGINBOTHAM seconded the resolution.

Mr. PRILLING (a Chartist), before the resolution was put, wished to say that it must be grateful to every one to witness gentlemen of all shades of political opinion coming forward with a view to help their poorer fellow subjects, and he hoped that on all occasions in which the interest of the people required it, men of all parties would act together harmoniously, with the great common object of benefiting the public (hear, hear).

Mr. HENRY GARBIDE moved the thanks of the meeting to him. He was sure such a mark of approval would be received as it ought by the mayor, emanating as it did from a meeting composed of men of all opinions in politics (cheers). He took the present meeting as a proof that the old landmarks of party were about to be set aside, and the condition of the whole people consequently elevated.

The resolution having been seconded and passed with acclamation, the meeting separated.

STOCKPORT.

BOARD OF GUARDIANS.—At the usual weekly meeting of the board of guardians, held on Monday last, a memorial was adopted to the Government, praying for an immediate opening of the ports, for the free admission of foreign provisions. The motion was made by Mr. Alderman ORME, deputy-chairman, seconded by Mr. LITTLEWOOD, and was carried all but unanimously. The question of any great or sudden rise in the price of provisions, was admitted on all hands to be one of very serious import, as regards the position of the board, as well as the interests of the rate-payers.

A large meeting, convened by the Mayor, was held at the Court-house on Thursday evening last, Nov. 26, when a Memorial to Sir R. Peel, to open the ports, was carried with acclamation, without a dissentient voice.

LEICESTER.

In compliance with a requisition from 120 of the gentry, manufacturers and tradesmen, and another from 300 of the operatives, of Leicester, the Mayor, Edwd. Weston, Esq., called a public meeting, which took place on Thursday evening, in the New Hall.

The MAYOR having been called to the chair, and expressed his concurrence in the object of the meeting, read a letter from Isaac Hodgson, Esq., banker and county magistrate, expressing his cordial approval of the meeting.

Robt. BREWIN, Esq., of Birstall-house, (a magistrate and ex-mayor) moved the first resolution, declaring the deficiency of provisions, &c., and denouncing the apathy of the government.

J. MELLOR, Esq. (a magistrate and ex-mayor), seconded the resolution, which was unanimously adopted.

W. BIGGS, Esq., moved a similar resolution, and strongly condemned the government.

The Rev. C. BERRY seconded the resolution. His opinion for many years had been, that all laws which impeded industry were unjust; and, like all unjust things, injurious to the people. He had come to that meeting as a man, and as a citizen. But he had come there also as a Christian minister, for he thought it to be especially the duty of Christian ministers to advocate the cause of the poor and the oppressed. A system which produced an artificial scarcity was unchristian, cruel, and diabolical. (Cheers.) The Rev. Gent., after some further remarks upon the system, commended to the audience the line of truth and justice; and having warned the monopolists from the history of the past, concluded amidst loud applause.

The resolution was unanimously agreed to.

Dr. NOBLE, a magistrate, moved the third resolution, which affirmed the injustice and impolicy of commercial restrictions. He declared his belief that they were not only injurious to the operative, the manufacturer, and the merchant; but that they conferred no benefit upon the farmer, and were, in the long run, injurious even to the landlord. Having briefly enforced these opinions, he said that the people would be greatly to blame, if they permitted the present law to exist without such an expression of opinion as no statesman could disregard. He also expressed his opinion that the present was a most favourable time for such a course. He then observed that, if the poor could not live well, their power of resisting the influence of a variable climate like ours, would be diminished: famines were always followed by disease; great epidemics had been preceded by a diminution of the supply of food. The Doctor concluded by expressing a hope that the British Government would yet become wise, and avert the calamities which threaten the country.

RICHARD HARRIS, Esq., (a magistrate) seconded the motion.

Mr. HEALEY, a tenant-farmer, seconded the motion, which was carried unanimously. An address to the Queen, for total repeal, and opening the ports in the interval, was agreed to, and the meeting broke up without disagreement,—being the first time on this question for years.

DEVONPORT.

BOARD OF COMMISSIONERS.—This body met on Friday, the 21st instant, for the transaction of public business. Mr. JAMES moved a resolution to the effect that a memorial be presented to her Majesty's Government, praying the ports to be thrown open for the admission of corn into the country, with a view to the relief of the poor. Mr. HUNT seconded the resolution, and it was carried unanimously. The meeting then broke up.

CANTERBURY.

TOWN COUNCIL.—At the meeting of the council on Tuesday, Mr. MIETTE brought forward his motion to memorialise the Queen to open the ports; he said, the late harvest was deficient, and unless timely measures were resorted to for the free admission of grain, the consequences to the poor especially would be appalling. There were at least four millions of the population at starvation point. He glanced at the countries which had hitherto been exporters, but had become closed through the causes stated, and concluded with the following:—"That in consequence of the great failure of the potato crop, the staple food of a great portion of her Majesty's subjects, and the deficiency in the growth of wheat, he begged leave to move 'that a memorial be presented to the Queen, humbly beseeching her to open the ports with the least possible delay, for the free admission of corn and other provisions.'"

Mr. Alderman PLUMMER seconded the motion. In doing so, he adverted to the deficiency of the potato crop, which would necessarily lead to an increased consumption of wheat; to furnish which the ports ought to be opened, as the late harvest in this country was inadequate to meet the demand, and they had heard from good authority, and prior to the harvest, the quantity of corn in hand was very small. He also pointed out the pressure which a restricted supply would have upon the lower classes.

Mr. SMITHSON did not dispute what had been urged, but after the generally understood determination of Government, thought the resolution too limited, and suggested the addition of a few words, leaving it optional to open the ports, "or to adopt such a measure as her Majesty might deem the best adapted for the general interest."

This suggestion not meeting with approval, the resolution was submitted, and carried nem. dis.—Canterbury Journal.

GLASGOW.

In terms of placards widely circulated throughout the city and suburbs, a public meeting of the inhabitants of Glasgow was held to-day on the public green, at three o'clock, for the purpose of considering the present alarming crisis in connection with the scarcity of potatoes in the country, and with the view of petitioning her Majesty to cause Parliament to assemble immediately, in order that means may be devised and measures adopted for providing food for the people under the present appalling crisis, and that they should do this by opening the ports. The meeting, which was got up and conducted entirely by the working-classes, was highly satisfactory.

On the motion of Mr. ANDREW RANKEW, Mr. David Allan was unanimously called to the chair.

The CHAIRMAN, after a few appropriate remarks as to the nature and tendency of the bread-tax, in connection with the present scarcity occasioned by the failure of the potato crop, and the probable effect of the same upon the condition of the country, concluded by reading the placard calling the meeting. He then called on

Mr. RANKEW, who, in a few pithy remarks on the condition of the people at the present time, moved the following resolution:—"That this assemblage of the operatives of Glasgow and neighbourhood, having been convened in consequence of the present alarming crisis, arising from the great and unlooked for calamity which has been occasioned by the failure in the crop of that food which is principally consumed by us, we hereby agree that immediate and energetic steps be taken to meet the present and future evil."

Mr. ADAMS seconded this motion, and it passed unanimously.

The next resolution, which pledged the meeting, in the terms of the placard calling them together, to petition her Majesty on the subject of the bread-tax and the scarcity of potatoes, was moved by Mr. D. Graham, seconded by Mr. John M Beth, and unanimously adopted.

Mr. HENRY VINCENT said, the necessities of the country required prompt and energetic measures to be taken to compel her Majesty's Ministers to do justice to a starving and oppressed people. His opinions were well known to them all. He had always held that no justice would be done to the people of England till all classes were represented in Parliament; but, at the same time, when he saw the pressing necessities of the country—when he saw the iniquitous tendency of the corn monopoly, when he found that it only benefited the aristocracy and the monopolists, that it was destroying our trade and commerce, embarrassing the working classes, lowering their wages, and raising the price of food; when, in the midst of this deplorable state of things, he witnessed a sudden dispensation of Providence which deprived them of a large proportion of their annual supply of food,—in the face of such facts, he must say the time was come to tell the Ministry to have done with their party cavillings, with their nonsense about the advantages of protection, and to tell them that the first and greatest duty of a Legislature was to protect the people from starvation.—(Cheers.) Let them remember that they not only felt at this moment that they were on the eve of a great crisis, from the fact that provisions were rising in all parts of the country, but also from the immense absorption of capital in railway and other pursuits. It was clear to every man's mind that they were placed in circumstances of the greatest peril, and unless the Government did something to relieve the pressure of their present necessities, he could see nothing before them but calamities of the most fearful kind. (Hear.) It was not only England that had a right to raise her voice in this emergency. Look at Ireland, so long borne down and oppressed by a base aristocracy—look at Ireland suffering under a calamity that could not be over-exaggerated, and ere long likely to produce actual starvation in the most populous districts of that country, unless the charity of a large proportion of the people should mercifully intervene. (Hear.) And why should they rest on charity for a supply of the commonest necessities of life? Why should the supply of food depend on the resources of one country when the world was so large, and when the Almighty had blessed it with the power of producing more food than was necessary for the sustentation of every man? (Cheers.) Why should they tolerate a monopoly, the only effect of which was to prop up the power of an aristocracy always opposed to the rights and privileges of Englishmen? (Cheers.) He felt persuaded that the occurrences of the present age were teaching the working population the value of those economical principles inherent in the great doctrine of Free Trade. They cried for Free Trade on several distinct grounds—First, that they might have a proper market for the industry of Britain, and might receive in return for the produce of that industry such commodities as other climates might produce; Secondly, they cried for Free Trade that they might teach the aristocracy of this country that they ought not to live out of the miseries of the people of England—that they were not to let them have a monopoly in the church, and in the army, and in Parliament, and then to let them enter into a little retail business in cheese, and butter, and grain, on their own account,—(cheers and laughter)—to teach them that they would not enable them to advance the price of their peculiar commodities by interfering with the commodities of others. They wished to teach them the same necessity as themselves, of living on their own property by their own labour, as honest people should—that they were not to be always putting their hands into the pockets of the widow and the fatherless, or entering the house of the poor Irishman; but to teach them another doctrine which, by the blessing of God, they might soon learn to learn—for he believed the Cabinet Council itself, which had been so often divided on this question during the last four or five weeks—he believed that the Council itself discerned the appearance of a little revolutionary cloud, not larger than a man's hand, beginning to overspread the political horizon; the prelude of that hurricane of a people's power which would throw down this monopoly for ever. (Great cheering.) In the third place, they wanted Free Trade to arm themselves with greater power to obtain for the people the right of the elective franchise. Mr. V. here proceeded to point out the strength of the legislative monopoly possessed by the aristocracy, and to show how all kinds of monopoly were so connected together as that each was formed to strengthen the other; and in conclusion exhorted the people to strenuous efforts in the great cause of Free Trade, and in the promotion of every other measure by which their rights and privileges could be extended and consolidated, and inculcating temperance as one of the most effectual means by which all that was desirable for the good of the people might be with greater ease accomplished. (Cheers.)

A long and able address, denouncing the bread-tax, calling for its abolition, and praying her Majesty to call her ministers and Parliament together to consider and adopt measures to meet the present distress, was moved by Mr. Charles M'Kay, seconded by Mr. John Adams, and carried unanimously.

The meeting quietly separated. — Glasgow Saturday Post.

DUMFRIES.

At a meeting of the seven incorporated trades of Dumfries, held on Monday last, a memorial was brought forward by Mr. WILLIAM RICHARDSON, convener, to be transmitted to Sir Robert Peel, and laid before her Majesty's Government, regarding the present prospect of an inadequate supply of provisions generally throughout the country; and urging the necessity of Government opening the ports for the admission of foreign grain duty free. The proposition was seconded by Deacon UNDERWOOD, and unanimously agreed to; and a vote of thanks was given to the convener, for bringing the measure before the meeting. Mr. Richardson has received a letter, acknowledging the memorial, from Mr. G. Arbuthnot, in the name of Sir R. Peel.

FREE IMPORTATION OF FOOD.—A requisition to the Lord Mayor is going round for signature for a meeting of the Common Council, and a meeting of the merchants and bankers is also about to take place, upon the subject of petitioning the Queen to open the ports. The following is a copy of the requisition to the Lord Mayor:—

"TO THE RIGHT HON. THE LORD MAYOR.

"We, the undersigned, members of the corporation, respectfully request your Lordship will call a special Court at your earliest convenience,

"To consider the propriety of petitioning Her Majesty to take all such means as she may constitutionally possess for throwing open the ports of the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Ireland for the free importation of food."

STIRLING.

On the evening of Friday last, 7 o'clock, a public meeting of the inhabitants of Stirling was held in the Court Room, for the purpose of memorialising the Ministry to open the ports of Great Britain and Ireland, for the free admission of foreign grain.

On the motion of Mr. RANKIN, Provost Galbraith was chosen chairman, and E. Gentleman, Esq., clerk to the meeting.

Provost GALBRAITH said that those present were doubtless acquainted with the object of the meeting. A numerous and respectfully signed requisition had been sent to him, desiring him to call a public meeting of the inhabitants to consider the present state of the country, and to solicit the Premier to open the ports for the free admission of foreign grain. He (the Provost) entirely agreed with the requisitionists in every point, and, therefore, he had no hesitation in calling the present meeting. There was every probability of a great scarcity of food in the country, owing to the failure of the potato crop, and every legitimate means should be employed to remedy the evil. He did not intend to make a speech on the subject of the Corn Laws, as there were gentlemen present who would do so, and who had considered them in all their bearings upon the mass of the population.

Baile SMITH, in proposing the second resolution, said he felt much pleasure in responding to it. The motion, however, was so complete in itself, that he deemed it quite unnecessary to make any speech in support of it. It was an expression of opinion, on the part of the meeting, on the state of the potato crop, and the consequences which were likely to follow, if, in this emergency, the country was left to its own resources. Every one present must be aware of the state of the potato crop, nor did the people of Scotland stand singular in this calamity; the disease had spread over every country where the potato was produced, and unless some other food was procured in their place, no doubt but great misery would be the consequence. He had no hesitation in saying, if no barrier was placed in the ways of Providence, a sufficient supply of wholesome and nutritious food could readily be procured to counterbalance the deficiency in the potato crop.

The motion was seconded by JAMES PRENTICE, Esq., and unanimously agreed to.

Mr. W. FORBES moved the third resolution. He spoke at considerable length, and concluded by expressing his conviction that they should shortly have to meet again, not so much to lament over the miseries of the people as to rejoice in the victory of justice and humanity over fraud, cruelty, and oppression.

Mr. JAMES HENDERSON, iron merchant in seconding the motion, said, that as long as the obnoxious, and injustice of man was permitted to thwart the ways of God's providence, so long would the judgments of God poured forth on the earth. There was also a striking resemblance between Sir Robert Peel and Rehoboam, of whom they had doubtless all read in the Bible. Rehoboam, when the people went to him with a petition to lessen their burdens, instead of listening to the advice of the old men, and complying with the people's request, gave ear to the counsels of the young men, and told the people that he would not only not lessen their burdens, but would increase them, and, in place of chastising them with whips, he would chastise them with scorpions. He would conclude with one word. Sir Robert, he doubted not, would just write them back, in answer to their memorial, that he would never mind them; for he has a heart like a stone—it would neither melt nor burn. Doubtless the people were all guilty in backsliding from the Lord, but the head of the House was far worse. It will be three months, even were the ports open, before they could get any supply, for the Baltic was now frozen. He would have them tell Peel, that every one who died of the famine, their blood would be required at his hand. The prophet of old threatened the people that they should have their bread by weight and their water by measure; but God never made a being but he allotted surface for its upbringing, but the evil ways of man had frustrated the designs of Providence; and, let men say what they like, they were now reaping the reward of their iniquity in the visible outpouring of the judgments of God.

Mr. E. JOHNSTONE, in moving the fourth resolution, traced the history of the potato disease from its first breaking out in the countries on the Continent—in Holland, Belgium, and France—and made some pertinent remarks upon the scepticism of the people, till conviction had forced itself upon them by the disease appearing among themselves, and increasing to such an extent as to induce the Government to appoint a commission to inquire into the nature of, and the best remedy for, the distemper. He earnestly trusted that the efforts now making here and elsewhere would be crowned with the desired success.

The motion was seconded by Mr. Peter Ferguson, and unanimously agreed to.

Baile STEEL moved the fifth resolution, but considered it unnecessary to say anything in its support. The iniquity of the Corn Laws was well known to every one present. The country, or rather, the unanimity of the people, had done many things as great as procuring the repeal of these iniquitous laws, and he doubted not, if the people would now stand true to themselves, they would also get their just demands in this. Many, many meetings had been held against these laws—not one had been held in their favour—which was proof positive that they were radically wrong.

Mr. THOMAS FERGUSON seconded the motion, which was also unanimously carried.

A vote of thanks was then passed to the Provost for his conduct in the chair, and the meeting separated.

DYSART.

On the evening of Thursday the 20th current, a public meeting of the inhabitants of the Parliamentary burgh of Dysart, called by the managers, was held in the Relief-church, to consider the propriety of memorialising the Queen respecting the necessity of a total and immediate abrogation of the Corn Laws.

The meeting was numerous and respectable; addresses were delivered enforcing the importance of taking every lawful measure to effect an abolition of the bread monopoly, that the evils of the crisis now evidently impending over the country may be averted, and a memorial to her Majesty to this effect was unanimously adopted.

STAR.

A public meeting of the inhabitants of this village was held in the school-room here, on the evening of Thursday last, when a memorial to her Majesty, praying for the free admission of corn and other provisions into the United Kingdom, was adopted. What has become of our neighbours of Markinch, that they are not moving in this important matter?—Fife Herald.

MR. BOUVERIE AT KILMARNOCK.

On Wednesday the 19th, Mr. Bouverie addressed his constituents in the Town-hall of Kilmarnock, to render an account of his stewardship. He described the various discussions of the last session in a caustic style, and in reference to the Corn Laws he said: They saw France, and Belgium, and Russia opening their ports to get food; while the laws of this country prevented us from seeking it. When a large portion of the crop of food was destroyed, and no one felt certain how much longer a great part of the rest would be preserved, was it not a question of life and death to millions of the population of the country? The Government was like the doctor, who, at military flogging, holds the pulse of the wretched soldier to see how much punishment his tortured frame can bear. Sir Robert Peel did the same, he was holding the pulse of the nation; he thought it could endure more flogging; that suffering enough had not been inflicted on it, and that the punishment should continue till all chance of preservation was at an end. He (Mr. Bouverie) must say, that the Minister who could do this—who could see all this going on—who, instead of seeking to avert the threatened calamities, could be amusing himself with a silver spade and mahogany wheel-barrow, in turning up the first sod of the Trent Valley Railway, is incurring an awful responsibility, and ought hereafter to be called to account for the way in which he had dealt with the interests of this great nation. A dinner was given to the hon. gentleman by his constituents in the evening, when the greatest enthusiasm was displayed for the success of Free Trade principles.

PURCHASE OF FREEHOLDS.—We learn with great satisfaction that several gentlemen of Dundee, who are resolved to omit no exertion to repeal the unnatural Corn Law, have transmitted their names to the League with an intimation that they wish to become freeholders in some English county, or counties, where their votes may be of service. They intimated, at the same time, we understand, their wish that some of the border counties, Northumberland, Cumberland, or Durham, might be fixed upon for the sake of greater proximity. We understand their excellent intentions are now being carried into effect, and it is expected this excellent example will in Scotland be followed up to a great extent. Several merchants in Glasgow, we hear, have already intimated their determination to become English freeholders, and it is believed the numbers of persons so resolved are likely to increase speedily. Mr. Liddell, the unwearied and worthy agent of the League here, is, we learn, about to visit Glasgow, and some other influential towns in Scotland, for the purpose of giving the requisite information as well as impressing upon the Free Traders of "Auld Scotland" the importance of this move being followed up with spirit. When once roused, the spirit of Scotchmen was never to be trifled with; and of this truth the vile hag, Monopoly, will now be made aware—to her cost!

VALUE OF HEALTH TO THE WORKING-MAN.—Health is the working-man's fortune, and he ought to watch over it more than the capitalist over his large investments. Health lightens the efforts of body and mind; it enables a man to crowd much work into a narrow compass. Were the mass of the community more enlightened on these points, they would apply their knowledge not only to their private habits, but would insist on municipal regulations favouring general health, and for prohibiting the erection or the letting of such buildings as must generate disease. With what face can the great cities of Europe and America boast of their civilisation, when within their limits thousands and tens of thousands perish for want of God's freest and most lavish gifts? We forbid by law the selling of putrid meat in the market: why do we not forbid the renting of rooms in which putrid, damp, and noisome vapours are working as sure destruction as the worst food? If people understand that they are as truly poisoned in such dens as by tainted meat and decaying vegetables, would they not appoint commissioners for houses, as truly as commissioners for markets?—Dr. Channing.

AGRICULTURE.

AGRICULTURAL DELUSIONS DISPERSING THE USES OF FARMERS' CLUBS.

It is curious as well as instructive to recur to the rise and progress of agricultural societies and farmers' clubs, as part of the history of the great struggle to free the industry of this country from the fetters of monopoly. Created, in the majority of instances, by the political landowners for their own objects—the chief of those objects being the conservancy of the Corn Laws, these meetings were speedily found to be convenient occasions for the discussion of topics not altogether agreeable to the politico-landlord mind. Thence came the rule to exclude politics; a rule invariably infringed by the landed leaders whenever the farmers were likely to be moved in support of monopoly. The absurdity of excluding political discussion in connection with agriculture, which has been nursed, and dandled, and well nigh smothered by political measures intended for its protection, was palpable; but so fragile was the system of "protection," so weak were the arguments by which it was supported, so numerous were the delusions it originated, that its supporters could not endure the slightest discussion of its principles. For a long time leases were deemed a political and consequently a prohibited topic; so that there was the constant spectacle of a squire lecturing the farmers on the necessity of improvements requiring great and permanent outlays of capital; while the farmers, by the rules of the society, were prohibited from stating the inseparable obstacle to such improvements occasioned by the want of leases. Through this absurd restriction, the Harleston Farmers' Club was one of the first, if not the first, to break. Its able discussions and sound resolutions upon leases formed some of the earliest illustrations of agricultural common-sense, as we pointed out to our readers.

Of late, however, leases have been generally voted to be non-political, and have been a good deal considered in most assemblies of agriculturists. Still the rule remained. Farmers might talk about leases, but if they attempt to go into the why and the wherefore of no leases or bad leases, they soon found themselves trespassing upon the forbidden ground. How can agriculture be discussed without reference to politics, and political measures? Take the ordinary case of a farmer showing a friend over his farm. The visitor remarks that there are some wet places on the land, some deficiency of accommodation in the farm buildings, or some other obvious want, which it would be plainly for the farmer's interests to supply; he suggests the improvement, hints that the cost would be repaid with ample interest in a few years, when he is stopped by the information that my Lord This or Sir John That, who owns the farm, is a great politician—requires the votes of his tenants, and does not choose to make them independent by giving them leases. Here, on the very threshold of the farmhouse, before a beast has been handled, or a growing crop inspected, the direct and lamentable dependence of agriculture upon politics has been illustrated. But the friend proceeds, he finds a few beasts, and only a few, being fattened; and perhaps a lot of hungry stores treading down the straw into what is to be by courtesy called manure.

Again, he suggests that the same straw cut up with oat, bean, or pea meal, or—he is a travelled man—Indian corn or rye, would be more profitably employed in feeding stock, with wonderful improvement to the manure. "No," says the farmer, "no; the cost of all kinds of food for fattening stock is so great, and my capital is not quite so large as it should be for the size of my farm, that I can't feed stock as I should like, but must do as well as I can with the store beasts." Here, then, the visitor must come plump into the Corn Law question, or be silent. And yet we were told we must exclude politics from discussions on agriculture. Why, we can't do so! Our lawgivers have said agriculture is a political question, and we can't walk round our own or our neighbours farm without feeling bitterly that it is so. Would that agriculture were divorced from politics, and that the farming interest could be left unencumbered by the onerous protection of landed law-makers.

Such is becoming the general opinion amongst farmers. And here we have again to record good service rendered to agriculture by the Harleston Farmers' Club. We learn from the Norwich Mercury that at the annual meeting of the Club, beyond the ordinary or routine business, a motion for rescinding the eleventh rule of the Club was discussed and decided. That rule was—

"That all political subjects shall be totally excluded from the discussions of this Society."

Those who advocated the abolition of the rule justly said—

"That agriculture is in a different position to what it was 8 years since. However desirable then that practice, in which most are so deficient, and science, to which all are looking up, should form the sole questions of debate, it is maintained now that the constant recurrence of agricultural questions in the Legislature renders it necessary, not only that farmers should make themselves acquainted with these subjects, many of them of vital interest, but also that their opinions on them should be known. It cannot be denied that Farmers' Clubs have exerted a mighty influence in the great changes now going on in agriculture, whether scientific or political, and the most sanguine of their promoters could not have anticipated the benefits which have arisen from them.

"The men who find the capital, the skill, and the industry to cultivate the land, did not then occupy their true position, and although this had been long felt by many of this important class, yet the rare opportunities they possessed of meeting together, except for entirely different objects, had confined such reflections to individuals, and thus prevented their dissemination. The expression of such opinions at the first Farmers' Club found a ready response in the breast of every member; the establishment of other clubs proved how general was the feeling, and thus private became public opinion, which, in this as in every case, is all-powerful and will be obeyed. From this cause has sprung, on the part of the owners of land, the concessions now commencing, and which will soon be general, on leases, covenants, game, timber, &c.; concessions to the tenants from which not only they but the country will derive the greatest benefit."

It was also urged that questions connected with the Poor Law, the Law of Settlement, tithes, and the mode of obtaining the averages on which the amount of tithe rent charge depends, and "last, not least," the CORN LAW, are political subjects, which cannot be excluded from the consideration of any society having in view the promotion of agricultural improvement. Against these and similar arguments, nothing was urged but that "men could not keep their temper on these subjects;" and upon a vote, the rule was finally abrogated.

This is an example which we hope will be generally followed by agricultural societies and farmers' clubs.

Men who cannot keep their temper may keep away from the meetings of rational men. But we suspect that tempers will not only be kept, but greatly improved by regulated and temperate discussion of the politics of agriculture, or agricultural politics, at agricultural meetings. At present, when these topics are introduced, it is always done under the ban, and in spite of the opposition of the great men; and the sense of injustice and unfair opposition always tends to introduce into the observations of the mover more of heat than would happen if the discussion was prepared for and expected by the meeting. On these grounds we say the Harleston Farmers Club has again done good service to agriculture.

A WORD TO THE WISE.

Let any farmer who may again think of attending a "protection" meeting, recollect that by so doing he is throwing away his money, and losing both time and temper, for the maintenance of the Corn Laws has now become impossible. Their repeal is now a question of time only; their future existence must be calculated by months, perhaps by weeks, certainly not by years.

Another seed-time, and the farmer may have to compete with the whole world; and is he then in the meantime to bemuse himself with boozing and shouting for impossible things, instead of looking at his own affairs like a man of business, and calling for the removal of those burdens and restrictions which are imposed on him by the personal fiat of his own landlord?

It is one of the most unfailing symptoms of the failing condition of the protective system, that sensible, moderate men, who may be deemed the bystanders in the conflict which has been going on for some years between national industry and aristocratic monopoly, are now universally declaring that the time has arrived when the restrictive system must come to an end.

Take, for instance, the following remarks by Mr. Justice Coleridge—a moderate and a sensible, and a thinking man, of a thinking family—who, at an agricultural meeting in Devonshire, thus referred to the Corn Laws. After stating he knew nothing of practical agriculture, he said:

"Still every man of common sense—every man who regards dispassionately what is passing in the world, must come to the conclusion that these are times when the agriculturists must exert themselves, and rely more upon their own efforts, if they hope to prosper. They must, like the manufacturers, look to the sciences for aid, and we all know that the application of science has already done much, and might, I am confident, do much more towards the advancement of agriculture."

And again—

"Holding the office that I do, I am anxious to steer clear of politics—a wise rule in these societies; but there is one point upon which, without infringing that rule, I may be permitted to offer one or two remarks. In the course of a not very long life, and with somewhat limited experience, I have observed that there has been scarcely any great public measure which has not been represented on the one hand as pregnant with more evil; and on the other hand, as being likely to produce more good than had been found upon experience to be really the case. This is owing possibly to the fact, that the effect of many public measures has been mistaken or over-rated. I do not pretend to be a prophet, but only speculating as other men do upon the probability of any material alteration in the Corn Laws, I am bound to say that I do not apprehend the harm would be so great, or the benefit so extensive, as some persons are disposed to anticipate, either the one way or the other. (Hear, hear.) I have said already that I am not a practical agriculturist, therefore my opinion may be little worth your attention; but I think that, with the blessing of God upon your industry and skill, good may work its way out of that which you now regard as evil; and that in a little time you would not find yourselves so much worse off as some of you may possibly anticipate. Let us never forget that there are in this country two mighty interests—agriculture and manufactures—both are essential to the well being of the State. It had, I regret to find, been too much the fashion to set the one against the other. It seems to my mind, that these should be co-existent, for they have a common interest. The greatest consumer is the friend of both. I must remind you also that our population is steadily increasing; and it is to the agriculturists that we must chiefly look for food to meet this growing demand. The population was already increasing at the rate of 300,000 per annum; should it continue to advance in the same proportion, we must have additional produce to feed the additional mouths. Under these circumstances, I feel confident that the British corn-grower will find customers at tolerably remunerative prices."

Nor can we omit the learned judge's concluding remark, which the western squirearchy would do well to attend to, rather than shouting for "protection," which is not unlike the errors of their forefathers, who attempted to "hedge in the cuckoo," and to "rake the moon from a pond."

Sir J. T. Coleridge said—

"Before I sit down, I would respectfully but earnestly beg to impress upon you the importance of improving the moral and social condition of the labouring class, with whose well-being your own interest is very closely identified. Many amongst them are wretchedly lodged. From my own experience as a judge, the painful conviction has been forced upon my mind, that very much of the crime which disgraces our country is mainly attributable to the mixture of sexes and of ages in the dwellings of the poor—a practice that debases and demoralises the human mind, and which, unless counteracted, must effectually neutralise every effort made towards the elevation or improvement of the people."

PERSECUTION OF LABOURERS IN WILTSHIRE.

Few Free Traders will forget the meetings of the Wiltshire labourers in support of Free Trade which occurred last winter. Nor will any help recollecting the contrast which the tone and temper of those meetings presented to the monopoly protection meetings, held by their masters, the landlords and farmers of the country. The following statements of two labourers, named Thomas Bullock, and William Pearce, of Beckhampton, near Marlborough, in Wiltshire, show under what peril some, at all events, of these men of Wiltshire have met to make known the evils they endure from the rent-protecting Corn Laws. These are the statements:

"STATEMENT OF THOMAS BULLOCK, OF BECKHAMPTON, IN THE PARISH OF AVEBURY, LABOURER.—In the month of July last, I attended an Anti-Corn Law lecture at Avebury. I was then, and had been for three years previously, in the employ of Mr. John Wentworth, of Beckhampton. I met Mr. Wentworth as I was going to the meeting. He said, 'I hope you are not going to this meeting (meaning the Anti-Corn Law meeting). I shan't go myself; and if you go, you will displease me—but you may please yourself about going.' I did go to the meeting. At the next pay-day Mr. Wentworth discharged me. He said I had pleased myself, and he should please himself: it was the last 14. 8s. I should receive of him. I have no doubt I was discharged in consequence of my attending the meeting. William Pearce also attended the meeting, and he was discharged also. I cannot get regular employment in the parish, although I have applied to nearly all the farmers. I am at present out of work, and have been so for the last fortnight; and ever since the meeting, I have had no regular employ, but have gone from place to place, and got a job where I could."

"STATEMENT OF WILLIAM PEARCE, OF BECKHAMPTON, LABOURER.—I attended the Anti-Corn Law lecture at Avebury in July last. I was then in the employ of Mr. John Wentworth, of Beckhampton, and had been for six years previously. At the next pay-day, Mr. Wentworth expressed his displeasure at my attending the Anti-Corn Law meeting, and said he could do without me. Mr. W. told me, 'You may go and tell Mr. Falvey I have discharged you, and all that he will do will be to put my name in the paper, and I don't care about that.' I have no doubt I was discharged in consequence of my attending the lecture. I have not been in any regular employment since, but have got a job where I could. I am a married man, with one child dependent on me; and about five weeks ago my wife applied to Mrs. Wentworth for work for me, and told her she would tell Mr. Falvey how I had been served, and how she had suffered from want. Mrs. Wentworth then told my wife, if I would ask Mr. Wentworth for employ, he would put me on. I did apply to Mr. Wentworth, jun., and he gave me jobbing-work, at which I can earn about 6s. a week when in constant employ. I have suffered much from want of employment, and from travelling about the country in search of work.
